PREFACE.

NN-1-32

THE first English translation of the Essays of Montaigne was executed by John Florio, Italian and French tutor to Prince Henry, son of James I., and is entitled: "The Essaies, or Morall, Politike, and Militarie Discourses of Lord Michael de Montaigne, Knight of the Noble Order of St. Michael, &c." It was first published in 1603, and was reprinted in 1613, and again in 1632. The form is a single volume folio, and it is dedicated—"To the most Royal and Renowned Majestie of the High-borne Princess Anna of Denmark, by the grace of God, Queene of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, &c." The Essays are prefaced by a copy of verses, in Italian, addressed to the same princess; a preface to the reader, and some complimentary verses to "his deare brother and friende, Mr. John Florio," from "Samuel Daniel, one of the Gentlemen Extraordinary of her Majestie's most Royal Privie Chamber." There is also an engraved title-page, of the most ornate description.

The translation by Charles Cotton appeared somewhere about the year 1680, but I have not been able to ascertain the exact date. It is dedicated in the following terms:—

"To the Right Honourable GEORGE, Marquiss, Earl, and Viscount Halifax, Baron of Eland, Lord Privy Seal, and one of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council.

"My Lord,—If I have set down the only opportunity I ever had of kissing your lordship's hands amongst the happy encounters of my life, and take this occasion, so many years after, to tell you so, your lordship will not, I hope, think yourself injured by such a declaration from a man that honours you; nor condemn my ambition, when I publish to the world that I am not altogether unknown to you. Your lordship, peradventure, may have forgot a conversation so little worthy your remembrance: but the memory of your lordship's obliging fashion to me all that time, can never die with me; and though my acknowledgment arrives thus late at you, I have never left it at home when I went abroad into the best company. My lord, I cannot, I would not flatter you, I do not think your lordship capable of being flattered, neither am I inclined to do it to those that are; but I cannot forbear to say that I then received such an impression of your virtue and noble nature, as will stay with me for ever. This will either excuse the liberty I presume to take in this dedication, or, at least, make it no wonder; and I am so confident in your lordship's generosity that I assure myself you will not deny your protection to a man whose greatest public crime is that of an ill writer. A better book (if there be a better of the kind—in the original I mean) had been a present more fitly suited to your lordship's quality and merit, and to my devotion. I could hardly wish it such: but as it is, I lay it at your lordship's feet, together with, my lord, your lordship's most humble and most obedient servant,

"CHARLES COTTON."

The dedication is followed by this letter from Lord Halifax :—

"Sir,—I have too long delayed my thanks to you for giving me such an obliging evidence of your remembrance: that alone would have been a welcome present, but when joined with the book in the world I am the best entertained with, it raiseth a strong desire in me to be better known, where I am sure to be so much pleased. I have till now thought wit could not be translated, and do still retain so much of that opinion, that I believe it impossible, except by one whose genius cometh up to that of the author. You have the original strength of his thought, that it almost tempts a man to believe the transmigration of souls, and that his, being used to hills, is come into the moor-lands, to reward us here in England, for doing him more right than his country will afford him. He hath, by your means, mended his first edition. To transplant and make him ours is not only a valuable acquisition to us, but a just censure of the critical impertinence of those French scribblers who have taken pains to make little cavils and exceptions to lessen the reputation of this great man, whom nature hath made too big to confine him to the exactness of a studied style. He let his mind have its full flight, and sheweth, by a generous kind of negligence, that he did not write for praise, but to give the world a true picture of himself and of mankind. He scorned affected periods, or to please the mistaken reader with an empty chime of words. He hath no affection to set himself out, and dependeth wholly upon the natural force of what is his own, and the excellent application of what he borroweth.

"You see, sir, I have kindness enough for Monsieur de Montaigne to be your rival; but nobody can now pretend to be in equal competition with you: I do willingly yield it is no small matter for a man to do to a more prosperous lover; and if you will repay this piece of justice with another, pray believe that he who can translate such an author without doing him wrong, must not only make me glad but proud of being his very humble servant,

"HALIFAX."

Mr. Cotton prefaces his translation in the following terms :—

"My design in attempting this translation was to present my country with a true copy of a very brave original. How far I have succeeded in that design, is left to every one to judge; and I expect to be the more gently censured, for having myself so modest an opinion of my own performance, as to confess that the author has suffered by me as well as the former translator; though I hope, and dare affirm, the misinterpretations I shall be found guilty of are neither so numerous nor so gross. I cannot discern my own errors; it were unpardonable in me if I could, and did not mend them; but I can see his (except when we are both mistaken), and those I have corrected; but I am not so ill-natured as to shew where. In truth, both Mr. Florio and I are to be excused, where we miss the sense of the author, whose language is such, in many places, as grammar cannot reconcile, which renders it the hardest book to make a justifiable version of that I ever yet saw in that or any other language I understand; insomuch that, though I do think, and am pretty confident, I understand French as well as any man, I have yet sometimes been forced to grope at his meaning. Peradventure, the greatest critic would, in some place, have found my author abstruse enough. Yet are not these mistakes I speak of either so many, or of so great importance, as to cast any scandalous blemish upon the book, but such as few readers can discover, and they that do will, I hope, easily excuse.

"The errors of the press I must in part take upon myself, living at so remote a distance from it, and supplying it with a slubbered copy from an illiterate amanuensis, the last of which is provided against in the quires that must succeed."

With reference to this translation, the editor of a later edition remarks :—

"Mr. Cotton has, indeed, succeeded to a miracle in his translation of so celebrated a piece, and we are thoroughly persuaded that very few Frenchmen now living, were they to undertake the task, would find themselves capable of turning Montaigne's Essays into modern French with the same spirit and justice to the author; but still our translator was not altogether infallible: he had certainly one of the most difficult books in the world to struggle with, and he complains of it himself in his preface: it is no wonder, then, that he fell into such mistakes, which we should not only have fallen into ourselves, but probably have committed a great many more, had he not first trod the rugged way before us."

The same Editor states that he has altered Mr. Cotton's prose in above three thousand places, and changed his language where fifty years had rendered it obsolete or harsh.

In 1776 appeared a new edition of Cotton's translation, "with very considerable amendments and improvements from the most accurate and elegant French edition of Peter Coste." Of this version there was a reprint in 1811. It exhibits, in many places, just corrections of Mr. Cotton, where that gentleman has obviously misapprehended his author; but it leaves a far greater number of errors untouched; while its constant "improvements," in the way of modernizing Mr. Cotton's style and language, divest his translation of nearly all its spirit and naïveté. I also, no doubt, subject myself, in the opinion of many persons, to the charge of presumption, for having in my turn, ventured to correct Mr. Cotton; and, indeed, I have had it roundly objected, that in any way to alter Cotton is to damage Montaigne. Having, however, read and re-read both the original work and the translation, the careful comparison I have made of the two has shewn me that not to alter Cotton, in many places, were gross injustice to Montaigne; and it is solely with this conviction that I have ventured upon the emendations here made. I most readily admit that Cotton's translation is, as a whole, a master-piece; but then there occur in it, and at no very long intervals, instances of carelessness which greatly detract from the value of the translation, by making it fall short of, and in some cases absurdly misrepresent, the author's meaning. I could easily collect enough of these instances to make a new chapter in the Curiosities of Literature, but this would be as ungracious as it is unnecessary. One or two illustrations will, I conceive, suffice to form my justification. In chapter 55, Montaigne, chatting about smells, remarks, En la plus espesse babarie, les femmes Sycthes, &c. "in an age of the darkest barbarism, the Scythian women," &c.; which in Cotton's version assumes the following shape: "in the wildest parts of Barbary, the Scythian women," &c. In chapter 56, Montaigne, after quoting a curious opinion set forth by Margaret de Valois, who speaks of a young man's saying his prayers in a church regularly after visiting another man's wife, as a testimonial of singular devotion, says,—Mais ce n'est pas par ceste preuve seulement qu'on pourroit verifier que les femmes ne sont guères propres, à traicter les matières de la theologie: "But this is not the only proof we have that women are not very fit to treat of theological matters," which Cotton thus renders:—"But it is by this proof only, that a man may conclude few men very fit to treat of theological affairs!" Again, in chapter 57, Montaigne observes, Il me semble que, considerant la foiblesse de nostre vie et à combien d'escueils ordinaries et naturels elle est exposée, on n'en debvroit pas faire si grande part à la naissance, à l'oysifveté et à l'apprentissage,—"Methinks, considering the frailty of life, and the many natural and ordinary wrecks to which it is exposed, we should not give so large a portion of it to idleness, either in childhood or in apprenticeship to the world,"—which Cotton reads,—"For the frailty of life, and the many natural and accidental rubs to which it is obnoxious and daily exposed, birth though noble, ought not to share so large a vacancy, and so tedious a course of education." Book ii., chapter 2, Montaigne says, Laissons cette autre secte (the Stoic) faisant expresse profession de fierté;—"Let us leave that other sect, which makes an express profession of haughty superiority;" which Cotton converts into this sentence:—"Let us leave that other sect, and make a downright profession of fierceness." In another place, Cotton subjects his author to a sad imputation: Montaigne (book ii. chapter 6), speaking of an accident that threw him into a swoon, says that, however, Je m'advisais de commander qu'on donnast un cheval à ma femme, que je veoyois s'empestrer et se tracasser dans le chemin, qui est montueux et malayse, "I had so much sense about me as to order them to give a horse to my wife, who, I saw, was toiling and labouring along the road, which was a steep and uneasy one;" this Cotton renders, "I had so much sense as to order that a horse I saw trip and falter on the way, which is mountainous and uneasy, should be given to my wife," &c.

I trust that these illustrations will suffice to justify me, even with the warmest admirers of Cotton,—and he has no sincerer admirer than myself,—for the departures which I have made from his translation. They are frequent, it is true, but for the most part, only where absolutely required to restore the author's meaning. The style and spirit of Cotton's version it would be impossible to improve upon; and I have no hesitation in expresssing the opinion that, the inaccuracies in question being now carefully corrected, the present edition of the essays of Montaigne fully comes up to the definition of a good translation suggested by Lord Woodhouselee, viz.—"That in which the merit of the original work is so completely transfused into another language as to be as distinctly apprehended, and as strongly felt, by a native of the country to which that language belongs, as it is to those who speak the language of the original work." Here, indeed, as in the case of Ozell's Rabelais, the position might be even more strongly put.

MICHAEL DE MONTAIGNE.

Michael de Montaigne was born, as he himself tells us, "betwixt eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, the last of February, 1533." He was the third son of Pierre Eyquem,[1] Ecuyer,[2] a brave and loyal soldier, who had seen service in the wars beyond the mountains, and had brought back with him from Italy and Spain a cultivated mind. The description which his son gives of him, is highly interesting:—"He spoke little and well, ever mixing his language with some illustration out of modern authors, especially Spanish; and amongst them Marcus Aurelius was very frequent in his mouth. His behaviour was grave, humble, and modest; he was very solicitous of neatness and decency in his person and dress, whether a-foot or on horseback. He was exceedingly punctual to his word, and of a conscience and religion tending rather towards superstition than otherwise. For a man of little stature, very strong, well proportioned, and well knit; of a pleasing countenance, inclining to brown, and very adroit in all noble exercises. I have yet in the house to be seen canes full of lead, with which, they say, he exercised his arms for throwing the bar or the stone; and shoes with leaden soles, to make him afterwards lighter for running or leaping. Of his vaulting he has left little miracles behind him; and I have seen him, when past threescore, laugh at our agilities, throw himself in his furred gown into the saddle, make the tour of a table upon his thumbs, and scarce ever mount the stairs up to his chamber without taking three or four steps at a time."

This gentleman, with some instinctive prescience apparently, of his son Michael's mental superiority, formed a wish to have him educated in a manner altogether different from the routine then gone through. Even before his birth, he consulted learned and clever men on the subject, and on these consultations and his own admirable judgment, he formed a system, as Mrs. Shelley observes, such as may in some sort be considered the basis of Rousseau's; and which shows that, however we may consider one age more enlightened than another, the natural reason of men of talent leads them to the same conclusions, whether living in an age when warfare party struggles, and the concomitant ignorance, were rife, or when philosophers set the fashion of the day: "The good father that God gave me," says he, "who has nothing of me but the acknowledgment of his bounty, but truly 'tis a very hearty one, sent me from my cradle to be brought up in a poor village of his, and there continued me all the while I was at nurse, and even longer, bringing me up to the meanest and most common way of living. This humour of

[1] Scaliger, in the Scaligerana Secunda, is reported as saying that Montaigne's father was a seller of herrings,—whether in gross or detail is not specified,—but the statement is a mere falsehood. In the supplement to the Chronique Bordelaise, by Jean Darnal, there is an account of the various gradations by which Pierre Eyquem, Seigneur de Montaigne, ascended from the office of first jurat of Bordeaux, in 1530, to that of mayor, in 1533.

[2] Montaigne himself mentions the surname of Eyquem, though it does not appear that he ever made use of it himself. He says the name was still borne by a family in England; its English form was probably Egham.

his yet aimed this end, to make me familiar with those people, and that condition of men, which most need our assistance; believing that I should be more holden to regard them who extended their arms to me, than those who turned their backs upon me: and for this reason also it was that he provided me godfathers of the meanest fortune, to oblige and bind me to them."

Next came the question of education. The Greek and Latin tongues, our author's father felt, are an acquisition of great worth; but at the same time they were somewhat dearly bought under the system which, at that period, universally prevailed, and does so even now, to a great extent. The elder Montaigne's own reading being confined to works written in the living tongues, he was the more anxious that his son should be early made acquainted with the languages of Athens and Rome, and he meditated long on the received modes of introducing youth into these chief vestibules of knowledge. He was struck by the time given to, and the annoyances a child suffers in, the acquirement of the dead languages, and this had been exaggerated to him as a cause why the moderns were so inferior to the ancients in greatness of soul and wisdom. But the difficulty which he felt, the expedient he devised to obviate it, and the result of this expedient, cannot be better told than in Montaigne's own words:—

"My late father having made the most precise enquiry that any man can possibly make amongst men of the greatest learning and judgment, of an exact method of education, was by them cautioned of the inconvenience then in use, and informed that the tedious time we applied to the learning of the languages of those people who, themselves, had them for nothing, was the sole cause we could not arrive to the grandeur of soul and perfection of knowledge of the ancient Greeks and Romans: I do not, however, believe that to be the only cause; the expedient my father, however, found out for this was that, in my infancy, and before I began to speak, he committed me to the care of a German (who since died a famous physician in France), totally ignorant of our language, but very fluent and a great critic in Latin. This man, whom he had sent for out of his own country, and whom he entertained, at a very great salary, for this only end, had me continually with him. To whom there were also joined two others of the same nation, but of inferior learning, to attend me, and sometimes to relieve him; who all of them conversed with me in no other language but Latin. As to the rest of his family, it was an inviolable rule that neither himself, nor my mother, nor man, nor maid, should speak anything, in my company, but such Latin words as every one had learnt to gabble with me. It is not to be imagined how great an advantage this proved to the whole family; my father and my mother, by this means, learning Latin enough to understand it perfectly well, and to speak it to such a degree as was sufficient for any necessary use; as also those of the servants did who were most frequently with me. To be short, we did Latin it at such a rate that it overflowed to all the neighbouring villages, where there yet remain, and have established themselves by custom, several Latin appellations of artizans and their tools. As for myself, I was above six years of age before I understood either French or Perigordian any more than Arabic, and without art, book, grammar, or precept, whipping, or the expense of a tear, had by that time learned to speak as pure Latin as my master himself. If, for example, they were to give me a theme, after the College fashion, they gave it to others in French, but to me they gave it in the words Latin, to turn it into that which was pure and good; and Nicholas Grouchy, who wrote a book de Comitiis Romanorum; William Guerente, who has written a Commentary upon Aristotle; George Buchanan, that great Scotch poet, and Marc Antony Muret, whom both France and Italy have acknowledged for the best orator of his time, my domestic tutors [at college], have all of them often told me that I had in my infancy that language so very fluent and ready that they were afraid to enter into discourse with me. Buchanan, whom I since saw attending the late Mareschal de Brissac, then told me that he was about to write a Treatise of Education, the example of which he intended to take from mine, for he was then tutor to that Count de Brissac, who afterwards proved so valiant and so brave a gentleman."

"As to Greek, of which I have but little smattering, my father also designed to have taught it me by art, but in a new way, and as a sort of sport; tossing out declensions to and fro, after the manner of those who, by certain games, at tables and chess, learn geometry and arithmetic; for he, amongst other rules, had been advised to make me relish science and duty by an unforced will, and of my own voluntary motion, and to educate my soul in all liberty and delight, without any severity or constraint. Which he was an observer of to such a degree, even of superstition, that some being of opinion it troubles and disturbs the brains of children suddenly to wake them in the morning, and to snatch them violently and over-hastily from sleep (wherein they are much more profoundly involved than we), he caused me to be waked by the sound of some musical instrument, and was never unprovided of a musician for that purpose. By which example you may judge of the rest, this alone being sufficient to recommend both the prudence and affection of so good a father; who, therefore, is not to be blamed if he did not reap the fruits answerable to so excellent a culture. Of which, two things were the cause: first, a sterile and improper soil; for though I was of a strong and healthful constitution, and of a disposition tolerably gentle and tractable, yet I was, withal, so heavy, idle, and sluggish, that they could not rouse me even to any exercise of recreation, nor get me out to play. What I saw, I saw clear enough; and under this lazy complexion nourished a bold imagination, and opinions above my age. I had a slothful wit, that would go no faster than it was led, a slow understanding, a languishing invention, and, above all, an incredible defect of memory; so that it is no wonder if, from all these, nothing considerable could be extracted. Secondly, like those who, impatient of a long and steady cure, submit to all sorts of prescriptions and receipts, the good man being extremely timorous of any way failing in a thing he had so wholly set his heart upon, suffered himself, at last, to be over-ruled by the common opinion, which always follows the lead of what has gone on before, like cranes; and falling in with the method of the time, having no longer about him those persons he had brought out of Italy, and who had given him his first models of education, he sent me, at six years of age, to the College of Guienne, at that time the best and most flourishing in France. And there it was not possible to add anything to the care he had to provide me the most able tutors, with all other circumstances of education, reserving also several particular rules contrary to the College practice; but so it was that, with all these precautions, it was a College still. My Latin immediately grew corrupt, and, by discontinuance, I have since lost all manner of use of it; and so this new plan of education served me to no other end than only, at my first coming, to prefer me to the first forms: for at thirteen years old, that I left the College, I had gone through my whole course, as they call it, and, in truth, without any manner of improvement, that I can honestly brag of, in all this time." The vigorous idiom of Tacitus and Seneca, which had thus become his natural language, had doubtless, through life, an influence in him greatly over the French, which he learned at a later period, as it were a foreign tongue, and which, having only just been nationalized by Francis I., was as yet anything but a langage fait, took the more freely, in an organ still young, the form given it by the earlier impressions. Locke, in his Treatise on Education, seems to have paid great attention to that of Montaigne; so far admitting the plan pursued with our Essayist, that, while he requires that a child should, in the first instance, learn his maternal language, he at the same time lays it strongly down that he should be provided with a master to teach him Latin also, by conversing with him in that tongue.

As a child, though of a gentle and tractable disposition, it was difficult to rouse him from his quiet, even to join in boyish games; but when he once began to play, then all the sports of his youthful companions seemed to him in the light of serious actions; and he had an entire repugnance to mix up with them any finesse or trickery, going always the straight way to play as to work, and keeping to it. Yet his mind, which seemed inactive, did not fail to form judgments upon the objects which he became acquainted with, and he digested his thoughts freely and at leisure. "Yet for all this heavy disposition of mine," says he, "my mind, when retired into itself, was not altogether idle, nor wholly deprived of solid inquiry, nor of certain and clear judgments about those objects it could comprehend, and could also without any helps digest them; but, amongst other things, I do really believe it had been totally impossible to have made it to submit by violence and force. Shall I here acquaint you," he adds, "with one faculty of my youth? I had great boldness and assurance of countenance, and to that a flexibility of voice and gesture to any part I undertook to act; for before

Alter ab undecimo tum me vix ceperat annus,

I played the chief parts in the Latin tragedies of Buchanan, Guerente, and Muret, that were acted in our college of Guienne with very great form; wherein Andreas Govеanus, our pro-

cipal, as in all other parts of his undertaking, was, without comparison, the best of that employment in France, and I was looked upon as one of his chief actors." The first taste for reading that Montaigne acquired, arose in the manner which he himself thus relates:—"The first thing that gave me any taste of books was the pleasure I took in reading the fables of Ovid's Metamorphoses; and with them I was so taken that, being but seven or eight years old, I would steal from all other diversions to read them, both by reason that this was my own natural language, the easiest book that I was acquainted with, and for the subject the most accommodated to the capacity of my age: for as for Lancelot of the Lake, Amadis of Gaul, Huon of Bourdeaux, and such trumpery, which children are most delighted with, I had never so much as heard their names, no more than I yet know what they contain; so exact was the discipline wherein I was brought up. This made me think the less of the other lessons prescribed me; and here it was infinitely to my advantage to have to do with an understanding tutor, who was wise enough to connive at this and other truantries of the same nature; for by this means I ran through Virgil's Æneids, and then Terence, and then Plautus, and some Italian comedies, allured by the pleasure of the subject; whereas had he been so foolish as to have taken me off this diversion, I do really believe I had brought nothing away from the college but a hatred of books, as almost all our young gentlemen do. But he carried himself very discreetly in that business, seeming to take no notice, and heightened my appetite by allowing me only such time for this reading as I could steal from my regular studies. For the chief things my father expected from them to whom he had delivered me for education, was affability of manners and good humour; and, to say the truth, my temper had no other vice but sloth and want of mettle. The fear was not that I should do ill, but that I should do nothing. Nobody suspected that I should be wicked, but most thought I should be useless; they foresaw idleness, but no malice in my nature; and I find it falls out accordingly. There is nothing," he adds, "like alluring the appetite and affection, otherwise you make nothing but so many asses laden with books, and by virtue of the lash give them their pocket full of learning to keep." Montaigne thus grew towards maturity, with an education more like that of our day than of his own. In the management of those first years of life, it is impossible not to see the source of much that afterwards marked him out from others. The main principle of teaching him every thing without requiring any conscious effect, or producing any sense of struggle on his part, doubtless disinclined him, as such a system always must, to encounter hardships, or engage in conflict: whence partly the indolence, though a busy indolence, of his life: hence, too, in a great degree, his reluctance to admit any views of man and duty which required him to regard life as a long battle against ignorance and weakness, in a word, against evil; and which estimate the highest and best of our thoughts and feelings as only then pure and active, when consciously toiling against the stream of self-indulgence. But as his education gave him not only ease, but also knowledge, and opened to him an inexhaustible source of mental pleasure, no wonder that he became a literary epicure, and made the gratification of every whim in speculation, and to a great degree in practice, the only aim, if so it can be called, of his existence. Thanks, however, to the sound structure of mind and body, to the sturdy manly nature which he partly inherited from his father, partly owed to his care, to the strong and honest minds and the admirable books with which he was early familiarized, there is under and around all this capricious idleness pre-eminent, clear, homely sense and apprehensiveness for truth, accompanied by sincerity and kindness of will, the natural yoke-fellows of such endowments, which give both the most sterling value and the most exquisite charm to his works.

On attaining the age of thirteen, Montaigne's taste for study, and perhaps his dislike to military discipline and vexation, were so decided that, although the son of a gentleman and soldier of the sixteenth century, he preferred the business of a law-court to that of a camp; and although the same distaste for restraint must have disinclined him for the study of the mass of custumal jurisprudence which at that time overwhelmed not only justice, but law, he went through the requisite preparations, and became, in the year 1554, one of the counsellors of the Parliament of Bordeaux, to which office he, in all probability, succeeded in place of his paternal uncle Busaguet, who died young. The functions of this office he fulfilled until the death of an elder brother gave him an independent income. He has been accused by Balzac of allowing his quality of gentleman to make him so ashamed of having filled this situation, that he never makes mention of it; but this is a mistake, for even so late as 1563, in writing publicly to his father, he signs himself, counsellor of Bordeaux. It is true that, in the long course of so egotistical a work as the Essays, he but very rarely refers to this period of his life; but whatever may have been his feelings with regard to his own professional career, it is certain that, while engaged in it, he gained, and through life retained, a bitter and scornful disgust at the mass of arbitrary pedantries and cruel wrongs involved in the system which then regulated all the social interests of his countrymen. Notwithstanding the ordonnance of Francis I., in 1539, by which all public acts were ordered to be drawn up in French, these acts continued, in Gascony, to be written in Latin. Montaigne protested against this practice:—"What can be more strange," he observes, "than to see a people obliged to obey and pay a reverence to laws they never heard of, and to be bound in all their affairs, both private and public, as marriages, donations, wills, sales, and purchases, to rules they cannot possibly know, being neither writ nor published in their own language, and of which they have, of necessity, to purchase both the interpretation and the use?" He was, besides, a warm advocate for simplifying the law and making it uniform. He observes, in his Essays, that there are more books to explain law-books than books on any other subject. There is no end, he says, of commentary upon commentary.

During his life as a counsellor at Bordeaux, he seems to have made, probably on business connected with his office, frequent journeys to Paris and to the Court, where his conversational powers obtained for him the favour and patronage of Henry II., by whom he was appointed a gentleman of the king's bed-chamber. From this monarch, also, according to Dom de Vienne, he received the collar of the order of St. Michael, which, when young, he tells us, he had coveted above all things, it being at that time the utmost mark of honour among the French nobles, and rarely bestowed; but at the time Montaigne received it, it had got into discredit. Pasquier, his contemporary and personal friend, tells us, however, that this latter distinction was conferred upon Montaigne by Charles IX. As to his fulfilment of his duties, his close intimacy with the Sieur de Pibrac and Paul de Foix, his countrymen and fellow-counsellors, and, above all, his familiar connexion with the Chancellor de l'Hospital and de Thou, announce the high degree of confidence with which he was honoured, more especially as a magistrate representing the interests of an important town, in a period full of the most important events. It is quite clear that he was at different times consulted by men of a prominent position in that most troublous and intricate whirl of politics which then agitated France. The result for us is, that Montaigne knew mankind on many sides, and in the most different classes. He was in a station to associate early with the highest ranks, even with kings, and of habits and a temper that smoothed his intercourse even with the lowest. He had learning to make him an apt companion for scholars; practical shrewdness and knowledge to procure him respect from the world; and the secure and easy circumstances which gave him perfect leisure to indulge his tastes and fancies, to speculate upon those of others. But the most important event of his counsellor's life at Bourdeaux, was the friendship which he there formed with Stephen de la Boëtie, an affection which makes a streak of light in modern biography almost as beautiful as that left us by Lord Brook and Sir Philip Sydney. Our essayist and his friend esteemed, before they saw each other. La Boëtie had written a little work, entitled "De la Servitude Volontaire,"[1] in which Montaigne recognized sentiments congenial with his own, and which, indeed, bespeak a soul formed in the mould of classic times. Of Montaigne, La Boëtie had also heard accounts, which made him eager to behold him, and at length they met at a large entertainment given by one of the magistrates of Bordeaux. They saw and loved, and were thenceforward all in all to each other. The picture that Montaigne in his Essays draws of this friendship is in the highest degree beautiful and touching; nor does La Boëtie's idea of what is due to this sacred bond betwixt soul and soul, fall short of the grand perception which filled the exalted mind of his friend. In the treatise just named, its youthful author thus expresses himself on the subject:—"Friendship is a sacred name; it is a holy thing; it never arises but between good men; exists only by mutual esteem; supports itself not so much by services on either part as by goodness of life. That which makes one friend certain of the other, is the knowledge he has of his integrity. The sureties which he has for him are his good disposition, fidelity, and steadfastness. There cannot be friendship where there is cruelty, where there is disloyalty, where there is injustice." Indeed, judging from the whole of this brief but admirable work, La Boëtie, observes Mrs. Shelley, evidently deserved the high esteem in which Montaigne held him, though apparently very dissimilar from him in character. Boldness and vigour mark the thoughts and style; love of freedom, founded on a generous independence of soul, breathes in every line; the bond between him and Montaigne rested on the integrity and lofty nature of their dispositions, on their talents, on the warmth of heart that distinguished both, and a fervid imagination, without which the affections seldom rise into enthusiasm. The friendship of Montaigne for this admirable person yielded only in force to his tenderness for his father, if even to that; for while, it is true, he speaks of his father, in several places of his Essays, with the highest veneration and love, to Friendship he dedicates one whole chapter, in which it is observable that his style rises and becomes as energetic as it is full of soul. Nor was this friendship, glowing and enthusiastic as it was, a passing effervescence. Nine years after the death of La Boëtie,—whose calm and considerate last moments, Montaigne, in a letter to his father, has described in the most eloquent and touching manner,—he tells us: From the day that I lost him, I have only had a sorrowful and languishing life; and the very pleasures that present themselves to me, instead of administering any thing of consolation, double my affliction for his loss. We were halves throughout, and to that degree that, methinks, by out-living him, I defraud him of his part." Nay, even eighteen years after, during his journey in Italy, in 1580, he tells us that, while writing to the Cardinal d'Ossat, the recollection of his loss came across his mind, and il se trouva mal, en pensant à son ami. Montaigne did not regard women as capable of the same high order of friendship, but his physical complexion was such as made him fond of female society, and the character of his mind led him more especially to seek the friendship of those ladies of his time who were distinguished for their wit and imagination, or for their graver powers of mind. It was this that induced him, in the one case, to pay his court to the authoress of the Heptameron, the gay and spirituelle Marguerite de Valois, at whose request he wrote one of the longest and most carefully studied chapters of his Essays; and, in the other, to address to Diana de Foix his chapter "On the Education of Children," and to Madame d'Estissac that "On the Affection of Fathers to their Children." It is possible that his notion of a perfect tender friendship, which he in vain sought for among his female acquaintance, might have been realized in Mademoiselle de Gournay, had she been born twenty-five years earlier; and, indeed, Madame de Bourdic, in her Eloge de Montaigne, describes the lady in question as being in existence at the same time with La Boëtie, and sharing with him the heart of Montaigne; but this is a mere poetic fiction, the offspring of a wild enthusiasm.

[1] This little book, observes a writer in the Westminster Review, seems to have been written when the author was only sixteen. It is a declamation against the lawless government of many by one, with much that recals Tacitus, and something that resembles the political writings of Milton, but having a pervading tone of idle, imitative rhetoric, which is all but inevitable in the work of one so young. Though doubtless in some degree prompted by the miseries of France in that day, it is chiefly a reproduction of the sonorous and statuesque republicanism of the classical writers; the eloquent, headlong, youthful utterance of a sharp, clear brain and glowing heart, to whom the world was yet but a stage for declamation, while almost all the outward facts of life lay concealed from him, behind the scene-curtain. Warmth and reasonableness are finely blended in the book, though weakened by a kind of abstract vagueness, a dateless no-where-ness of the facts and topics. There is no trace of the wayward, fantastic self-questioning which gives such charm and peculiarity to Montaigne. But probably, at La Boëtie's age, his friend's writings would have shown much less of this than now appears in them. For passionate life and keenness of style, the "Treatise" is more remarkable even than the Essays.

Montaigne married at the age of thirty-three; but, as he informs us, not of his own wish or choice. "Might I have had my own will," says he, "I would not have married Wisdom herself, if she would have had me: but 'tis to much purpose to evade it, the common custom and use of life will have it so; the most of my actions are guided by example, not choice. And yet I did not go to it of my own voluntary motion; I was led and drawn to it by extrinsic occasions; and I was persuaded to it when worse prepared and more backward than I am at present, that I have tried what it is. And as great a libertine as I am taken to be," he adds, "I have in truth more strictly observed the laws of marriage than I either promised or expected." His wife, Françoise de la Chassaigne, was the daughter of Joseph de la Chassaigne, one of the most celebrated counsellors of the Parliament of Bordeaux, and sister of Geoffroi de la Chassaigne, Sieur de Pressac, author of several works. She found, in Montaigne, a husband kind and considerate, though not enthusiastically attached. We read, for instance, that on the occasion of an accident, of which he gives a picturesque description, the first thing he did on arousing from the swoon into which he had fallen, was to give a horse to his wife, "who he saw was toiling and labouring along the road, which was a steep and uneasy one." Again, when at Paris, he heard of the death of a daughter of theirs, he sent his wife a letter full of sympathy and kindness, accompanying it with Plutarch's Letter of Consolation to his Wife, written under similar circumstances.

It was from the same natural kindness and ready disposition to oblige and please those whom he loved, that at the desire of his father he translated and addressed to him the Natural Theology of Raymond Sebond. The elder Montaigne, animated with the ardour which influenced Francis I. in encouraging literature, had for a long time kept his house open to learned men, though not a learned man himself. Among others, he had received as a guest Peter Bunel, who warmly recommended to him this work of Sebond's as one very useful to read, at a period when the innovations of Luther were beginning to get into credit, and menaced to shake in many places the ancient faith. Montaigne hastened to translate the volume, and presented it, in its French dress, to his father, who was so delighted with its contents that he had it printed and published. It is from proofs drawn from natural reason that Sebond, after the example of Raymond Lully, here undertook, not to explain the mysteries, but simply to oppose to the innovators, in support of the old faith, the same reason with which they sought to combat it. The work had great success, especially with the ladies; and Montaigne, as their champion, and as the vindicator of the book he had translated, afterwards came forward in its defence, both against those who charged the author with unlicensed boldness in his opinions, and those who sneered at his arguments as devoid of strength or foundation.

It was soon after the publication of this translation that Montaigne succeeded to the château and estate[1] of Montaigne, in consequence of the death of his excellent father, who, according to our essayist, was somewhat apprehensive that the inheritance in the hands of his son Michael, would be wasted by his indolence and carelessness; but Montaigne's faults were negative; and he easily brought himself to regard his income as the limit of his expenses, and even kept within it. His hatred of business and trouble, joined to sound common sense, led him to understand that ease could be best attained by limiting his desires to his means; and by the degree of order necessary to know what these means were; and his practice accorded with this conclusion.

One of the first things that engaged our author's attention, on thus becoming entirely master of himself, was the publication of La Boëtie's Opuscula, which, together with his library, that beloved friend had bequeathed him, and which he now sent forth to the world, dedicated to the writer's relations. To the volume thus published, Montaigne added his own account, as addressed to his father, of the circumstances of La Boëtie's death; but, probably out of consideration for those of the author's connections who were attached to the court or to the public service, Montaigne did not deem it advisable to reprint on this occasion the Treatise on Voluntary Servitude, which he perhaps thought might be made a sinister use of by party spirit, in a time of fierce faction and civil trouble.

From this period Montaigne seems to have lived chiefly at his château. At the time of his succeeding to this property, he was under thirty-nine, and thenceforth his time was chiefly spent in reading and writing. It is not to be supposed, however, that he loved a wholly sedentary and inactive life. Though he adhered to no party, and shewed no enthusiasm in the maintenance of his opinions, his disposition was inquisitive to eagerness, ardent, and fiery. The troubles that desolated his country throughout his life, fostered the activity of mind of which his writings are so full. He often travelled about France, and, above all, was well acquainted with Paris and the Court. He loved the capital, and calls himself a Frenchman only through his love of Paris, which he names the glory of France, and an ornament of the world. In one of his essays, he says that a chief reason with him for wishing to live longer, is that he may see the completion of the Pont-Neuf, which was then in course of construction. He attended the Court at the same time with the famous Duc de Guise, and the King of Navarre, afterwards

[1] The estate to which he succeeded comprised the château, and eighteen metairies, or farms, around it, comprising one or two small villages. The revenue thence accruing was about 2,000 crowns of the money of the time.

Henry IV. He predicted that the death of one or the other of these princes could alone put an end to the civil war, and he even foresaw the likelihood there was that Henry of Navarre would change his religion. At a later period he was at Blois, when the Duc de Guise was assassinated; and he was a contemporary of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, at the particular period of which our philosopher, humane from sentiment, tolerant from reason, kept himself at home, apart altogether from either party, and attached to his king by an affection, as he says, "purely and entirely legitimate and political; neither attached nor repelled by private interest." In the whole course of the fierce contest between the Catholic party and the Huguenot, Montaigne, though a firm Catholic, abstained from mingling in the mortal struggles that were going on. One of his reasons for not attacking the Huguenots may perhaps be found in the circumstance that one of his brothers, M. de Beauregard, had been converted to the reformed religion. So high an opinion, however, was entertained, not only of his knowledge of the events that were passing around, but of his honesty and good faith, that he was requested to draw up the history of them, but he declined. "I am solicited," he says, "to write the affairs of my own time, by some who fancy I look upon them with an eye less blinded with prejudice or partiality than another, and have a clearer insight into them, by reason of the free access fortune has given me to the heads of both factions; but they do not consider that to purchase the glory of Sallust I would not give myself the trouble, sworn enemy as I am to all obligation, assiduity, and perseverance: besides that there is nothing so contrary to my style as a continued and extended narrative, I so often interrupt and cut myself short in my writing, only for want of breath."

We have now come to a period in the life of Montaigne, to which the highest interest attaches. It was towards the year 1572 that he commenced, in his retreat, the composition of his Essays. "When I lately retired myself to my own house," says he, "with a resolution, as much as possibly I could, to avoid all manner of concern in affairs, and to spend in privacy and repose the little remainder of time I have to live, I fancied I could not more oblige my mind than to suffer it at full leisure to entertain and divert itself, which I hoped it might now the better be entrusted to do, as being by time and observation become more settled and mature; but I find, that, quite the contrary, it is like a horse that has broken from his rider, who voluntarily runs into a much wilder career than any horseman would put him to, and creates me so many chimæras and fantastic monsters, one upon another, without order or design, that, the better at leisure to contemplate their strangeness and absurdity, I have begun to commit them to writing, hoping in time to make them ashamed of themselves." "This faggotting-up of so many divers pieces," he adds elsewhere, "is done in this way: I never set pen to paper but when too great idleness becomes troublesome, and never any where but at home; so that it is made up at several interruptions and intervals. I never correct my first by my second conceptions: perhaps I may alter a word or so; but it is only to vary the phrase, and not to omit my former meaning." In this particular, however, Montaigne's statement of the matter is not consistent with fact; for the edition of 1588, for example, contains several passages, which the author afterwards altered, or entirely omitted, to the advantage certainly of the work. The materials which he possessed for adding to the wealth of his own mind, the stores of classic intellect and experience, were unusually great for that period. His own library was already a good one, when it was considerably enlarged by the collection of books bequeathed him by La Boëtie. In this library he spent the principal portion of his time, reading, meditating, and writing, or dictating. His custom was to walk about as he read and meditated, "for," says he, "my thoughts go to sleep, if I sit down." His mode of proceeding appears to have been altogether of a most desultory character. He would turn over the leaves, now of one book, then of another, without order or apparent design; now he noted, then he meditated, and anon dictated, as he walked, what he had thus digested, more or less maturely. He had a memory, rather of ideas, than of words; what remained in his mind, he no longer remembered as the property of another. But let us hear his own account of the matter: "I make no doubt but that I often happen to speak of things that are much better, and more truly handled by those who are masters of the trade. You have here purely an essay of my natural, and not acquired, parts; and whoever shall take me tripping in my ignorance, will not in any sort displease me; for I should be very unwilling to become responsible to another for my writings, who am not so to myself, nor satisfied with them. Whoever goes in quest of knowledge, let him fish for it where it is to be found; there is nothing I so little profess. These are fancies of my own, by which I do not pretend to discover things, but to lay open myself. They may, perhaps, one day be known to me, or have formerly been, according as fortune has put me upon a place where they have been explained; but I have forgotten them; and if I am a man of some reading, I am a man of no retention; so that I can promise no certainty, if not to make known to what point the knowledge I now have rises. Therefore let nobody insist upon the matter I write, but my method in writing it: let them observe in what I borrow, if I have known how to choose what is proper to raise or help the invention, which is always my own; for I make others say for me what, either for want of language or want of sense, I cannot so well myself express. I do not number my borrowings, I weigh them. And, had I designed to raise their value by their number, I had made them twice as many. They are all, or within a very few, so famed and ancient authors, that they seem, methinks, themselves sufficiently to tell who they are, without giving me the trouble. In reasons, comparisons, and arguments, if I transplant any into my own soil, and confound them amongst my own, I purposely conceal the author, to awe the temerity of those forward censurers that fall upon all sorts of writings, particularly the late ones, of men yet living, and in the vulgar tongue, forsooth, which puts, it would seem, every one into a capacity of judging, and which seems to convict the authors themselves of vulgar conception and design. I would have them give Plutarch a fillip on my nose, and put themselves in a heat with railing against Seneca, when they think they rail at me. I must shelter my own weakness under these great reputations. I shall love any one that can unplume me, that is, by clearness of understanding and judgment, and by the sole distinction of the force and beauty of reason: for I, who, for want of memory, am at every turn at a loss to pick them out by their national livery, am yet wise enough to know, by the measure of my own abilities, that my soil is incapable of producing any of those rich flowers that I there find set and growing; and that all the fruits of my own growth are not worth any one of them. I have no other officer to put my writings in rank and file, but fortune. As things come into my head I heap them in; sometimes they advance in whole bodies, sometimes in single files. I am content that every one should see my natural and ordinary pace, ill as it is. I let myself jog on at my own rate and ease. Neither are these subjects which a man is not permitted to be ignorant in, or casually, and at a venture, to discourse of. I could wish to have a more perfect knowledge of things, but I will not buy it so dear as it will cost. My design is to pass over easily, and not laboriously, the remainder of my life. There is nothing that I will break my brain about; no, not knowledge, of what price soever."

Variam semper dant otia mentem,

The extraordinary knowledge that Montaigne displays of man, in all his several relations, and the infinite variety of historical illustrations, ancient and modern, foreign and domestic, that he adds to his own experiences, have induced many persons to suppose that he had travelled beyond the limits of France, at the time he composed his work, and M. Villemain, among others, appears to entertain this opinion, but it is certain that Montaigne's journey into Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, was posterior to the publication of the Essays, in March, 1580. That which has deceived some biographers, is the circumstance that several features in the Journey were inserted by Montaigne himself, as early as 1582, in the edition of the Essays which preceded that wherein that work received the last form it assumed under its author's hands. But this circumstance proves nothing; for in every new edition that Montaigne published, he added something or other, by way of bonus, to those former purchasers, who might thereby be induced to buy a copy of the new edition. But Montaigne had travelled sufficiently about France, and in sufficiently stirring times, to give him an extensive and varied insight into human character; indeed, for that matter, there is hardly a village so small, wherein a man who understandingly seeks for this sort of information may not learn a great deal, and our philosopher was precisely the person to obtain it. "I observe in my travels this custom," he says, "ever to learn something from the information of those with whom I converse (which is the best school of all others), and to put my company upon those subjects they are the best able to speak of." We have mentioned his frequent visits to Paris, where, indeed, his attendance was required at intervals, by the place he filled of one of the gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber. He was at Bar-le-Duc with Henry II., and he accompanied Charles IX. to Rouen, probably at the time of the declaration of the majority of this prince, to whom, at our author's instance, were presented the South American Indians, of whom he speaks in his chapter On Cannibals. The Abbé Talbert, in his Eloge de Montaigne, speaks of it as a well known fact, that Montaigne not only acted as secretary to Catherine de Medici, when she wrote her letter of instructions to Charles IX., but that the letter itself was the composition of our essayist, a statement which some of the recent editors of Montaigne have concurred in.

As Montaigne advanced in life, he lost his health. The stone, which he believed he inherited from his father, and painful nephritic cholics that seized him at intervals, put his philosophy to the test. He would not allow his illnesses to disturb the usual tenor of his life, and, above all, refused medical aid, having also inherited, he tells us, from his father, a contempt for physicians. There was a natural remedy, however, by which he laid great store, one much in favour at all times on the continent—mineral and thermal springs. The desire to try these, as well as a wish to quit for a time his troubled country, and the sight of all the misery multiplying around him, caused him to make a journey into Italy. His love of novelty and of seeing strange things sharpened his taste for travelling; and, as a slighter motive, he was glad to throw household cares aside; for though the pleasures of command were something, he received perpetual annoyances from the indigence and sufferings of his tenants, or the quarrels of his neighbours: to travel was to get rid of all this at once.

Of course his mode of proceeding was peculiar: he had a great distaste for coaches or litters; even a boat was not quite to his mind; and he only really liked travelling on horseback. Then he let every whim sway him as to the route; it gave him no annoyance, but rather pleasure, to go out of his way: if the road was bad to the right, he took that to the left; if he felt too unwell to mount his horse, he remained where he was till he got better: if he found he had passed by any thing he wished to see, he turned back. On the present occasion, his mode of travelling was, as usual, regulated by convenience: sumpter-mules or hired vehicles carried the luggage, while he proceeded on horseback. He appears to have been accompanied on this journey by four gentlemen, his brother, the Sieur de Mattecoulon, M. d'Estissac, M. de Caselis, and M. de Hautoy; Montaigne retaining throughout the direction of the journey, and having things apparently all his own way.

Our traveller set off from the Chateau de Montaigne on the 22d June, 1580, and after stopping for a short time at the camp of the Marshal de Matignon, who was then besieging the town of La Fere; and, after accompanying to Soissons the body of the Count de Grammont, who had been killed at the siege, he went on to Beaumont-sur-Oise, where he arrived on the 5th of September, and where he was joined by M. d'Estissac; the other gentlemen were already, apparently, with him. The party then proceeded through the north-east of France to Plombieres, where Montaigne took the waters; and then went on by Basle, Baden, in the canton of Zurich, to Constance, Augsburg, Munich, and Trent. It is not to be supposed that he went to these places in a right line: he often changed his mind when half-way to a town and came back; so that at last his zig-zag mode of proceeding rendered several of his party restive. They remonstrated; but he replied that, for his own part, he was bound to no place, but that in which he was at the time; and that he could not go out of his way, seeing that the only object he had proposed to himself, was to wander in places before unknown to him; and so that he never followed the same road twice, nor visited the same place twice, his scheme was accomplished. If, indeed, he had been alone, he tells us, he had rather have gone towards Cracovia, or overland to Greece, instead of at once to Italy; but, he adds, he could not impart the pleasure he took in seeing strange places, which was such as to cause him to forget ill health and suffering, to any other of his party; so that he was obliged to pursue the uneven tenor of his way to Italy; and, after many windings, having visited Venice, which "he had a hunger to see," he at length found himself at Rome, on the last day of November, having the previous morning risen at three hours before daylight, in his eagerness to behold the Eternal City. Here he had food in plenty for his inquiring mind; and, getting tired of his guide, rambled about by himself, finding out remarkable objects, making his shrewd remarks, and trying to discover those ancient spots with which his mind was familiar; for Latin being his mother-tongue, and Latin books his primers, he was more familiar with Roman history than with that of France; and the names of the Scipios and the Metelli were less strange to his ear than those of many Frenchmen of his own day. He was well received by the pope, Gregory XIII., who felt almost grateful to any man of talent and rank who would still abide by, and stand up in defence of, the old religion. Montaigne, before he left home, had printed two books of his Essays; a copy of these was taken from him at the Custom-house at Rome, and underwent a censorship; several faults were found, which he particularizes in the Diary, but Montaigne took this fault-finding very easily, saying that he had put down the things in question as his real opinions, and did not regard them as errors, and that, in several cases, the censor had altogether mistaken his meaning. The authority to whom the matter was referred was a man of sense, who readily admitting the explanations offered by our essayist, the censures were not insisted upon; and when Montaigne left Rome, and took leave of the prelate who had discoursed with him on the subject, the latter paid him a high compliment as to the uprightness of his intentions, his affection for the church, and his talents; adding, that the authorities at Rome thought so highly of his candour and conscientiousness, that they left it entirely to him to make what alterations he thought necessary, in another edition; and, finally, our author was earnestly requested to continue to aid the church with his eloquence, and to remain where he was, away from the troubles of his native country. Montaigne's vanity was highly tickled with all these courtesies, though he speaks of them as mere words of course; and his satisfaction was completed by his being invested with the citizenship of Rome, in a papal bull, pompous in seals and golden letters, and most gracious in its expressions. Nothing, he tells us, ever pleased him more than this honour, empty as it might seem, and he had employed to obtain it, he says, all his five senses, for the sake of the ancient glory and present holiness of the city.

The descriptions (observes Mrs. Shelley) which he gives of Rome, of the Pope, and all he saw, are short, but drawn with a master's hand—graphic, original, and just; and such is the unaltered appearance of the Eternal City, that his pages describe it as it now is, with as much fidelity as they did when he saw it in the sixteenth century. Its gardens and pleasure-grounds delighted him; the air seemed to him the most agreeable he had ever felt; and the perpetual excitement of inquiry in which he lived, his visits to antiquities, and to various beautiful and memorable spots, delighted him; and neither at home nor abroad was he once visited by gloom or melancholy, which he calls his death.

On the 19th of April, he left Rome, and, passing by the eastern road and the shores of the Adriatic, he visited Loretto, where he displayed his piety by presenting a silver ex-voto, and performing various religious duties, which prove the sincerity of his Catholic faith. In the month of May he arrived at the Baths of Lucca, whither he had repaired for the sake of the waters, and took up his abode at the Bagno della Villa, where, with the exception of a short interval, during which he visited Florence and Pisa, he remained till September. On the 7th of that month, he received letters to inform him that he had been elected mayor of Bordeaux, a circumstance which forced him to hasten his return, though he did not leave Italy without again visiting Rome. His journey home during winter, although rendered painful by physical suffering, was yet tortuous and wandering among the northern Italian towns. He re-entered France by Mont-Cenis, and, visiting Lyons, continued his route through Auvergne and Perigord, and arrived at the Château de Montaigne on the 30th of November, having been absent seventeen months and eight days.

Of the journey thus performed, we have a Diary, written partly in Montaigne's own hand, partly dictated to his valet, who, though he speaks of his master in the third person, evidently wrote only the words dictated. This work, observes Mrs. Shelley, is singularly interesting. It seems to tell us more of Montaigne than the Essays themselves; or rather, it confirms much said in those, by relating many things omitted, and throws a new light on various portions of his character. For instance, we find that the eager curiosity of his mind led him to inquire into the tenets of the Protestants; and that at the Swiss towns he was accustomed, on arriving, to seek out with all speed some theologian, whom he invited to dinner, and from whom he enquired the particular tenets of the various sects. There creeps out, also, an almost unphilosophical dislike of his own country, springing from the miserable state into which civil war had brought it. The work abounds, too, with amusing illustrations of the vanity which formed so prominent a feature in our author's character. He loved to stop at places where, taking him for a noble of high degree, the local authorities waited upon him in state, bearing the portion of wine, accustomed to be offered to the more distinguished of their visitors, and accompanying it with long complimentary harangues, to which he would gravely reply with all corresponding dignity, and at proportionate length.

Montaigne, though, of course, highly flattered by the unsought-for, and, by him, utterly unexpected, election of the citizens of Bordeaux, which he himself affects to attribute solely to their recollection of his father's former good administration of the office, yet, from ill health, and constitutional dislike to public employments, would have excused himself, as he tells us, had not the king interposed with his commands. On his arrival, he represented himself to his electors, such as he conceived himself to be, "a man without memory, without vigilance, without experience, and without vigour; but withal, without hatred, without ambition, without avarice, and without violence." It has been, indeed, insinuated against him, by M. Balzac, who, however, assigns no grounds for the imputation, that he exhibited indolence and indifference in the execution of the duties of his office; while he himself deemed his negative merits deserving praise, at a time when France was distracted by the dissensions of contending factions; and the citizens themselves gave unequivocal proof of their approbation of his administration, by conferring upon him a second election to the two years' mayoralty, an honour so distinguished and rare, that it had never occurred but twice before, in the persons, namely, of M. de Lansac, and of Marshal de Matignon, to whom Montaigne succeeded, and proud was he, he tells us, of so noble a fraternity.

For some time after his return home, Montaigne, amidst all the fierce and licentious struggles of the contending parties, was suffered to remain unmolested in his retreat. "Peradventure," he writes, "the facility of entering my house, amongst other things, has been a means to preserve it from the violence of our civil wars; defence allures an enemy, and mistrust provokes him. I enervated the soldiers' design by depriving the exploit of danger, and all matter of military glory, which is wont to serve them for pretence and excuse. Whatever is bravely is ever honourably done, at a time when justice is dead. I render them the conquest of my house cowardly and base; it is never shut to any one that knocks. My gate has no other guard than a porter, and that of ancient custom and ceremony, who does not so much serve to defend it, as to offer it with more decency and the better grace. I have no other guard or sentinel than the stars. A gentleman would play the fool to make a show of defence, if he be not really in a condition to defend himself. He that lies open on one side is every where so. Our ancestors did not think of building frontier garrisons. The means of assaulting, I mean without battery or army, and of surprising our houses, increase every day, above all the means to guard them; men's wits are generally bent that way; invasion every one is concerned in; none but the rich in defence. Mine was strong for the time when it was built; I have added nothing to it of that kind, and should fear that its strength should turn against myself; to which we are to consider that a peaceable time would require it should be dismantled. There is the danger never to be able to regain it, and it would be very hard to keep it, for in intestine dissensions your valet may be of the party you fear; and where religion is the pretext, even a man's nearest relation may be distrusted with a colour of justice. The public exchequer will not maintain our domestic garrisons; it would be exhausted; we ourselves have not means to do it without ruin, or, which is more inconvenient and injurious, without ruining the people. As to the rest, you there lose all, and even your friends will be more ready to accuse your want of vigilance and your improvidence than to pity you, and the ignorance and heedlessness of your profession. That so many garrisoned houses have been lost, whereas this of mine remains, makes me apt to suspect that they were only lost by being guarded; this gives an enemy both an invitation and colour of reason; all defence shows a face of war. Let who will come to me, in God's name; but I shall not invite them. 'Tis retirement I have chosen, for my repose from war. I endeavour to withdraw this corner from the public tempest, as I also do another corner in my soul. Our war may put on what forms it will, multiply and diversify itself into new parties; for my own part, I shall not budge. Amongst so many garrisoned houses, I am the only person of my condition, that I know of, who have purely entrusted mine to the protection of Heaven, without removing either plate, deeds, or hangings. I will neither fear nor save myself by halves." His quiet, however, was at length intruded on, and he was made to feel in his own person the disturbances that desolated his country. It is a strange and instructive thing to picture France divided into two parties, belonging to which were men who risked all for the dearest privilege of life, freedom of thought and faith; and were either forced, or fancied that they were forced, to expose life and property to attain it; and to compare these religionists in arms with the tranquil philosopher, who dissected human nature in his study, and sounded the very depths of all our knowledge in freedom and ease, because he abstained from certain watch-words, and had no desire for proselytes or popular favour. "I regard our king," he says, "with a merely legitimate and political affection, neither attached nor repelled by private interest; and in this I am satisfied with myself. In the same way, I am but moderately and tranquilly attached to the general cause, and am not subject to entertain opinions in a deep-felt and enthusiastic manner. Let Montaigne, if it must be so, be swallowed up, in the public ruin; but, if there is no necessity for it, I shall be thankful to Fortune to save it. I treat both parties equally; I say nothing to one that I could not say to the other, with the accent only a little changed; and there is no motive of utility that could induce me to lie." It was in 1585 that the factious, excited by their chief, the Duc de Guise, at once against the Navarrese and against the king himself, who had now entirely given himself up to the society of his favourites, began to make onslaughts both against the sincere royalists and against the moderate Catholics.

Montaigne's account of the Reformers, it may be observed, is by no means flattering; he represents them as men who "go towards reformation by the worst of deformations; who advance towards their salvation by the most express causes that we have of most assured damnation; who by overthrowing the govérnment, magistracy, and laws, in whose protection God has placed them, by tearing their mother (the Church) to pieces, and giving the lacerated limbs to her old enemies to gloat over, by inspiring fraternal minds with parricidal animosities, by calling devils and furies to their aid, think they can assist the holy sweetness and justice of the divine laws. Ambition, avarice, cruelty, and revenge, have not sufficient natural impetuosity of their own; let us bait them with the glorious titles of justice and devotion. The common people," he proceeds, "then suffered therein very much, not present damages only, but future too: the living were to suffer, and so were they who were yet unborn: they pillaged them, and consequently me too, even of hope, taking from them all they had laid up in store to live on for many years. - - - Besides this shock, I suffered others; I underwent the inconveniences that moderation brings along with it in such diseases; I was curried on all hands; to the Ghibelline I was a Guelph; to the Guelph a Ghibelline. The situation of my house, and my friendliness to my neighbours, presented me with one face; my life and my actions with another. They did not lay formal accusations against me, for they had no hold. I never slink from the laws, and whoever would have questioned me, would have done himself a greater prejudice than me; they were only mute suspicions that were whispered about, which never want appearance in so confused a mixture, no more than envious or idle heads. I commonly assist the injurious presumptions that fortune scatters abroad against me, by a way I have ever had of evading to justify, excuse, or explain myself, conceiving that it were to compromise my conscience to plead in its behalf: Perspicuitas enim augmentatione elevatur. - - - At what then befel me an ambitious man would have hanged himself, and a covetous one would have done the same. I have no manner of care of getting; but the losses that befel me by the injury of others, whether by theft or violence, go almost as near my heart as they would do to that of the most avaricious man. The offence troubles me, without comparison, more than the loss. A thousand several sorts of mischief fell upon me in the neck of one another; I could better have borne them all at once. - - - - I had already begun considering," he continues, "to whom amongst my friends I might commit a necessitous and degraded old age: and, having turned my eyes quite round, I found myself altogether at a loss. At last I concluded that it was safest for me to trust to myself in my necessity; and if it should fall out that I should be put upon cold terms in Fortune's favour, I should so much more recommend me to my own, and so much the closer attach me to myself."

It was well for him that he had philosophy to bear him up against all the evils that now assailed him; for, to complete his misery, and that of his countrymen, a pestilent fever broke out in 1586, and devastated Guyenne. Montaigne's own account of this horrible visitation runs thus:—"But behold another aggravation of the evil, which befel me in the tail of the rest. Both without doors and within, I was assaulted with a plague, most violent in comparison of all others: I had to suffer this pleasant condition, that the sight of my house was frightful to me; whatever I had there was without guard, and left to the mercy of every one. I myself, who am of so hospitable a nature, was myself in very great distress for a retreat for my family; a wild and scattered family, frightful both to its friends and itself, and filling every place with horror where it attempted to settle; having to shift abode as soon as any one's finger began to ache; all diseases are then concluded to be the plague, and people do not stay to examine what they are. And the mischief is, that, according to the rules of art, in every danger that a man comes near, he must undergo a quarantine in the suspense of his infirmity, your imagination all that while tormenting you at pleasure, and turning even your health itself into a fever. Yet all this would have gone the less to my heart, had I not withal been compelled to be sensible of others' sufferings, and miserably to serve six months together for a guide to this caravan; for I carry my own antidotes within myself, which are resolution and patience. Apprehension, which is particularly to be feared in this disease, does not much trouble me; and if, being alone, I should have taken it, it had been a more sprightly and a longer flight: 'tis a kind of death that I do not think of the worse sort; 'tis usually short, stupid, without pain, and consoled by the public condition; without ceremony, without mourning, and without a crowd. But as to the people about us, the hundredth part of them could not be saved. In this place, my greatest revenue is manual: what a hundred men ploughed for me lay a long time fallow."

In another place he gives a very interesting account of how, on one occasion, by presence of mind and self-possession, he saved his castle from pillage; and elsewhere he relates a somewhat similar anecdote of the manner in which he got out of the clutches of a party of the gentlemen freebooters, who then perambulated the country, seeking what they might devour.

Montaigne's family were long-lived; but he himself attained no great age, and his latter years were disturbed by great suffering. Living in constant expectation of death, he was always prepared for it; his affairs were arranged, and he was ready to fulfil all the last duties of his religion, as soon as he felt himself attacked by any of the frequent fevers that assailed him. One of the last and most agreeable events of his life was his friendship with Mademoiselle de Gournay. In his Third Book he tells us nothing of this friend, so worthy of the name, who came to console the philosopher, suffering under the public miseries and his own afflictions of body; but he makes her the subject of an addition to the 17th chapter of Book II.; where, in the enumeration he gives us of the persons of his own time, possessed of more than ordinary greatness of mind, he distinguishes his fille d'alliance, Marie de Gournay. His picture of her is not only delightful as a testimony of her merits, but a proof of the unfailing enthusiasm and warmth of his own heart, which even in suffering and decay equally allied itself to kindred merit. Mademoiselle de Gournay was afterwards esteemed one of the most learned and excellent women of her time, and was honoured by the abuse of pedants, who attacked her personal appearance and her age, in revenge for her transcending even their sex in accomplishments and understanding; while, on the other hand, she was regarded with respect and friendship by the first men of the day.[1] At the time when Montaigne first saw her, which was during a long visit he made to Paris, after his mayoralty at Bordeaux was ended, she was very young, but she had conceived an enthusiastic love and admiration of him from reading his Essays, and she called upon, and requested and obtained his acquaintance, which soon ripened into earnest friendship. She afterwards, in company with her mother, visited him at Montaigne, and he paid them, in return, several visits at their chateau in Normandy, where he remained, on the whole, three months. Another adoption, very agreeable to his vanity, was that of his philosophy by Charron, who became acquainted with him at Bordeaux, in 1589, and with whom he afterwards contracted a warm friendship. The theologian became the pupil of the philosopher, and his Treatise on Wisdom is little more than a development of the maxims and lessons of his master, fully justifying, if it were needed, the title of Breviaire des honnetes gens, that Cardinal du Perron assigned to Montaigne's Essays. The pupil, however, was much less read than the master, who, very soon after the first publication of his work, was so much in vogue,—notwithstanding Mademoiselle de Gournay's somewhat unaccountable complaint as to the coldness of its reception,—that edition after edition was called for, and the Essays of Montaigne were to be found on the table of every gentleman in France that could read aught beyond his other breviary, and, ere long, became known, by the medium of translations, in Italy, England, and other countries.

The disease which more immediately occasioned the death of Montaigne was a quinsy, that brought on a paralysis of the tongue, in which condition he remained three whole days, with all his senses about him, but unable to speak. Even now his presence of mind, his philosophy, and his kind heart, did not forsake him. It is related of him, by Bernard Antoine, in his Commentaire sur la Coutume de Bordeaux, that Montaigne, "feeling the approach of death, got out of bed in his shirt, and, putting on his dressing-gown, opened the door of his chamber, and, writing word for all his servants and others, to whom he had left legacies, to be called together, paid them the sums he had respectively bequeathed them, foreseeing the difficulty they might have in obtaining the amount from his heirs." Getting worse and worse, he requested his wife, in writing, to send for some gentlemen, his neighbours; and when they were all assembled, he caused mass to be celebrated in his chamber. At the moment of the elevation, he attempted to rise, but could not, and, with his hands crossed, fell back fainting, and in this act of devotion expired, on the 13th September, 1592, in the sixtieth year of his age, presenting in his death, says Pasquier, a fine mirror of the interior of his soul. He was buried at Bordeaux, in the church of the Feuillans, where his widow had a monument erected to him, with inscriptions in Latin and Greek, as follow:—

Montaigne's adopted daughter and her mother, to whom information of his illness had been immediately forwarded by the family, hastened from their chateau in Normandy, by the assistance of passports, to traverse almost the entire of France, disturbed as it was, but arrived only in time to mix their tears and lamentations with those of the philosopher's widow and daughter.

The only child that Montaigne left was a daughter, Leonora, who was afterwards twice married: she had no children by her first husband, but by her second, Charles, Viscount de Gamaches, she had a daughter, Marie de Gamaches, who married Louis de Lur de Saluces, Baron de Fargues, to whom she bore three daughters. The youngest, Claude Madeline de Lur, married Elias Isaac de Segur, whose son, Jean de Segur, was grandfather to M. le Compte de la Roquette, to whom the chateau of Montaigne duly descended, in accordance with the testamentary arrangements of the philosopher from whom it received its sole celebrity.

The present may, perhaps, be the most suitable place for inserting a very interesting account of this chateau, as it appeared, a few years ago, to the eyes of an intelligent contributor to the Westminster Review.

"At Castellan we exchanged our caleche for a small char-a-banc, with one horse, which took us to Montaigne St. Michel, along a detestable road, mostly somewhat ascending. We found the higher ground to be a wide, broken plain, out of sight of the Dordogne, and studded with small stone windmills, each carrying a conical roof.

"The first memorial of the days of Montaigne which we discovered was the parish church, a very old building. There is a massive square tower, covered by a slightly pointed roof, and having two large openings near its summit, in each side, which look like windows, but are without shafts, and seem to distinguish a good deal of the church architecture of the neighbourhood. There is a round apsis beyond the tower, at the east end, with only two small loop-hole windows, and at the west end is raised a small, curiously complicated wooden superstructure, designed to contain the bell of a large clock, to which access is obtained by a rude, external wooden gallery, painted red, and stretching all the length of the body of the church, close under the eaves. From this building runs a straight road, perhaps a quarter of a mile long, to the chateau.

"The part of Montaigne's house which we first reached was the tower, described by him in his essay 'On the Three Commerces' (iii. 3.) as containing his library and study. It is a plain round structure, at the south-eastern corner of the chateau; a dead-wall runs from it on either side, at right angles, and rises to about half its height. This is in reality the exterior of ranges of out-buildings, which form two sides of the court-yard. In this wall, close to the tower, and facing us as we approached, was a small gate, through which we found entrance. The chateau itself was now on our left, running along the western side of the quadrangle. It is a high building of grey stone, evidently very ancient, and probably untouched, except for repairs, since the days of Montaigne's father. There are a considerable number of windows scattered very irregularly over the front. Near the middle, at either side of the small unornamented entrance, are two large and high towers, of unlike architecture; the one with deep machicolations, the other without them, and both with conical roofs. If erected, as I presume, by Montaigne's father, the building must be about three hundred years old; the whole place has now an air of sluttish neglect, though not at all of decay. It is now inhabited by an old gentleman, formerly a military man, whose civility we should ill repay by recording any idle accounts of his simple establishment and very agreeable conversation. The house is only one room deep, and behind it runs a long and broad terrace, covered with grass, and with some trees growing upon it, among others, a large horse-chesnut. It is bordered by a stone ballustrade, which rises on the edge of a steep, wooded bank, and has beyond it a very extensive prospect over a flat country, with slight eminences on the horizon, marked towards the north by the village and chateau of Mont Peyroux, which in Montaigne's day was a sort of dependence on his seigneurie, and belonged to his younger brother. Near it, and still higher against the sky, are the ruins of the chateau of Gurson, destroyed in the Revolution, and which seems to have been a castle in our English sense of the word, that is, a feudal abode constructed for defence. It was probably the residence of the lady to whom Montaigne addresses his "Essay on Education" (i. 25). The whole prospect is woody and cultivated, but without water or any remarkable outlines, open, airy, quiet, and sufficiently prosperous. The old gentleman told us that he was possessed of eleven métairies or farms, with the chateau, but that Montaigne had held eighteen. The property had come by marriage to the Ségur family, who had taken the name of Ségur de Montaigne. They sold the estate to the present owner, who, in turn, was ready to dispose of it, if he could find a purchaser.

"After taking leave of our host, we returned to the corner tower, which we examined throughout, and were much interested by the minute agreement of its present state with everything recorded in Montaigne's description. This, too, was evidently not a modern and factitious correspondence, but secured by the abstinence of the successive owners from any changes, however slight. The ground-floor retains the appearance of having been once a small chapel, though now dark and dilapidated. The first floor, which was the sleeping apartment of the Gascon philosopher, does not look as if it had been applied since his day to any other purpose. The third and last story is that so particularly described by its occupant, as having contained his library and study, and his words would answer in most respects as a description of the spot at this hour, though he who wrote them has been dead two hundred and fifty years. The room still overlooks the entrance of the chateau, and from three windows, in different sides of the circuit, commands the garden, the court, the house, and the out-houses. The books, indeed, are gone; but the many small rafters of the roof are inscribed in their lower faces with mottoes and pithy sentences, which recal, as by a living voice, the favourite studies and thoughts of Montaigne. Such are these few hastily transcribed in a note-book:—'1. Solum certum nihil esse certi, et homine nihil miserius aut superbius. 2. Αλλοιων ἀλλου θεων τε χάνθρωπων μηδε 3. Ταρασσει τους ανθρωπους ὁυ τα γραμματα, ἀλλα ταπεσι χάνθρωπον δογματα. 4. Quid superbis, terra et cinis?—Eccl. x. 5. Væ qui sapientes estis in oculis vestris.—Eccl. v. 6. Favere jucunde præsentibus. Cætera extra te. 7. Παντι λογω λογος ισος ἀντιχειται. 8. Nostra vagatur in tenebris, nec cæca potest mens cernere verum. 9. Fecit Deus hominem similem umbræ post solis occasum.—Eccl. vii.'

"The chapel still shows the recess where stood the altar, and there are the remains of colours and gilding on the defaced coats-of-arms around the walls. The bed-room floor presents nothing remarkable; but that above, in which are the inscriptions on its rafters, preserves the exact form described by its ancient occupant. The paces of Montaigne must have been of about a foot and a half, for the diameter of the tower inside is about twenty-four feet. The circle is at one part cut by two straight walls, joining in an angle, being the portion which he speaks of as adapted for his seat and table. The three windows, affording a rich and free prospect, are still unchanged. There is a sort of closet opening off the room, with the traces of painted ornaments on the walls, a fire-place, as he mentions, at one end, and a window, which entitles it to be spoken of as très plaisammant percé—having a pleasant window-light—and which, though directly overlooking the court-yard, furnishes a view, above the northern line of offices, towards Mont Peyroux and Gurson.

"The whole appearance and position of this apartment seem especially characteristic of Montaigne. The cheerfulness, the airiness, the quiet, the constant though somewhat remote view of natural objects, and of the far-spread and busy occupations of men—all are suitable to him. The ornamenting the joists of his chamber-roof with several scores of moral sentences was the work of a speculative idler, and their purport is always, so far as I saw, suitable to his sceptical but humane and indulgent temper. The neglect of all elegance and modern convenience in the house, together with its perfect preservation from decay, add to the interest, and seem to prove that it is maintained in its old completeness and bareness, not from any notion of use, but out of respect for the memory of its celebrated owner."

Montaigne had five brothers: Captain St. Martin, who was killed at the age of twenty-three, by the blow of a tennis-ball; the Sieur d'Arsac, possessor of an estate in Medoc, that was buried under the sea-sands; the Sieur de la Brousse, not mentioned by Bouhier in his Life of Montaigne, but referred to in the Essays, ii. 5; the Sieur de Mattecoulon, who accompanied him on his journey through Italy; and the Sieur de Beauregard, who became a convert to Protestantism. Montaigne had one sister, named Eleonora, who married the Sieur de Cumain, counsellor to the Parliament of Bordeaux, and of whom mention is made in the will of Charron, in which the grateful disciple leaves the bulk of his property to the family of his master.

We have thus brought together the principal facts connected with the life of our philosopher. It would have been easy to fabricate a very long biography, by reprinting in a consecutive form the information which the Essays themselves afford, for these are nearly taken up by narrations of what happened to himself, or dissertations on his own nature, so that there is scarcely any man into whose character we have more insight than that of Montaigne. The reader, however, will find in the Index a complete reference to all those passages in which our author thus speaks of himself; and the critical opinions and éloges that precede the body of the work, will afford those who as yet have not read Montaigne, but have bowed their heads at his name, on the authority of prescription—an authority that empowers so many thousands to look unutterable things, as they repeat of men of whose works they know nothing—abundant justification for the faith that is in them, and will lead them on, with a prepared and understanding mind, to the Essays themselves.

END OF THE LIFE OF MONTAIGNE.

CRITICAL OPINIONS

UPON

MONTAIGNE AND HIS WORKS.

I.
MADEMOISELLE DE GOURNAY.

Si vous demandez au Vulgaire quel est Cesar, il vous respondra que c'est vn excellent Capitaine: si vous le luy monstrez luy-mesme sans nom, voire en guerre, à l'exercice de ces grandes qualitez par lesquelles il estoit tel: sa prudence, labeur, vigilance, preuoyance, precautions, perseuerance, ordre, art de mesnager le temps, et de se faire aymer et craindre, sa resolution, sa vigueur à ne rien relascher, et ses admirables conseils sur les nouuelles et promptes occurrences: plus, ces contrarietez d'action en temps et lieu: craindre, oser, reculer, courre sus, prodiguer resserrer, et mesmes rauir ou besoin est: cruauté, clemence, simulation, franchise. Si, dis-ie, apres luy auoir fait contempler toutes ces qualitez et ces actions où y mesmes en guerre, comme il est dit, mais hors l'apparat de Chef et hors la victoire, vous luy demandez quel homme c'est-là; il vous donnera s'il nient à poinct, pour vn des fuyars de la bataille de Pharsale: parce qu'il ne sçait si c'est par telles parties qu'on se rend grand Capitaine: et que pour iuger sur elles purement, d'vn qui le soit ou puis estre, il le faut estre soy-mesme, ou capable de le deuenir par instruction. Enquerez semblablement ce mesme vulgaire, ce qu'il luy semble de Platon, il vous rebattra l'oreille des loüanges d'vn celeste Philosophe: mais si vous laissez tomber en ses mains le Sympose ou l'Apologie desnuez de ce haut nom de leur pere, il en fera des farces: et s'il entre en la boutique d'Apelles, il emportera bien tost son tableau, mais il n'achetera que le nom du Peintre. Ces considerations m'ont tousiours mise en doute de la valeur des esprits, que le credit populaire suiuoit de son mouuement, et sans authorité precedente des belle ames: authorité certes encore, meurie par diuers âges: i'entens, passée en vsage fixe, qui est l'vnique estoille du Pole, qui peut droitement guider les approbations populaires. Car le Peuple n'a garde de connoistre par luy-mesme, la valeur des esprits, manquant d'esprit: ny de mettre à prix, ou de suiure sainement en cela, vne approbation ou authorité, pour equitable qu'elle soit, qui pour estre nouuelle, reste, debatue: puis qu'il ne sçauroit par ce mesme defaut d'esprit, connoistre le poids des tenans et des assaillans en ce debat. Celuy qui gaigne multitude d'admirateurs parmy la commune, et de son iugement propre, ne peut pas estre grand: puis que pour auoir beaucoup de bons iuges, il faut auoir beaucoup de [illegible], outre qu'il est vray, que la fortune et la vertu fauorisent rarement vn mesme sujet. Le Peuple est vne foule d'aueugles; quiconque se vante de son approbation, se vante de paroistre honneste homme à qui ne le void pas: adioûtons, que c'est vne espece d'iniure d'estre loüé de ceux que vous voudriez pas ressembler. Qu'est-ce que le dire de la presse? (si cette question n'est desia trop vuidée par les anciens) ce que nulle ame sage ne voudroit ny dire ny croire: qu'est-ce que la raison? le contrepoil de son opinion: et ie trouue la reigle de bien viure aussi certaine, à fuir l'exemple et le sens du siecle, qu'à suiure la Philosophie ou la Theologie. Il ne faut entrer chez le Peuple spirituellement ou corporellement, que pour auoir le plaisir d'en sortir: or Peuple et vulgaire s'estant iusques-là, qu'il est en vn Estat, sur tout en nostre saison, moins de personnes entierement non vulgaires, que de Princes, pour rares que les Princes y soient. Ie lairray toutefois à Senecque, touchant, ce me semble, cette corde de la neantise populaire, la charge de lire le reste mieux que moy. Xerxes contemplant ses dixsept cens mil hommes, s'escria de douleur, sur ce que dans cent ans il n'en resteroit vn seul en vie. Il nous faudroit tous les iours faire vn cry bien diuers, sur pareille nombre; de ce qu'il ne s'y trouueroit pas à l'aduenture vn sage, ny qui pis est vn iuste. Tu deuines desia, Lecteur, qui ie veux rechercher les causes du froid recueil, que nostre vulgaire fit d'abord aux Essais: mais trouuées, ou non, laissons-là ses opinions, qui ne nous doiuent peut-estre pas engendrer plus de soucy, hors les suiets ausquels elles blessent nostre fortune, qu'elles engendrent d'honneur à leur maistre. Le Prouerbe est tres-vray; que s'il faut souhaiter de la loüange, c'est de ceux qui sont loüable. Certes ie rends à ce propos vn sacrifice au bonheur, qu'vne si fameuse et digne main que celle de Justus Lipsius, ait ouuert par Escrit public les portes de la loüange aux Essais: et en ce que la fortune l'a choisi pour en parler le premier de cette part, elle a, ce me semble voulu luy deferer vne prerogatiue de suffisance en son siecle, et nous aduertir tous l'escouter comme nostre maistre. L'admiration dont ils me transsirent, lors qu'il me furent fortuitement mis en main au sortir de l'enfance, m'alloit faire reputer visionnaire: si quelqu'vn pour me remparer contre vn tel reproche, ne m'eust descouuert l'Eloge tres-sage, que ce Flamand en auoit rendu depuis quelques années à leur Autheur mon pere.

Lecteur, ayant à desirer de t'estre agreable, ie me pare du beau titre de cette alliance, puisque ie n'ay point d'autre ornement: et n'ay pas tort de ne vouloir appeller que du nom paternel, celuy duquel tout ce que ie puis auoir de bon en l'ame est issu. L'autre qui me mit au Monde, et que mon desastre m'arracha dés l'enfance, tres-bon pere, orné de vertus, et habile homme, auroit moins de ialousie de se voir vn second, qu'il n'auroit de gloire de s'en voir vn tel.

Le don du iugement est la chose du Monde que les hommes possedent de plus diuerse mesure: le plus digne et auare que Dieu leur fasse: leur perfection; Tous biens ouy les essentiels, leur sont inutiles, si cettuy-là ne les mesnage: et la vertu mesme tient sa forme de luy. Le seul iugement esleue les humains sur les bestes, Socrates sur eux, les Anges sur Socrates: et le seul iugement nous met en droite possession de Dieu: cela s'appelle l'ignorer et l'adorer en la foy. Pythagoras disoit aussi, que la connoissance de Dieu ne pouuoit estre en nous, que l'extréme effort de nostre imaginatiue vers la perfection. Or vous plaist-il auoir l'esbat de voir eschauder plaisamment les froids estimateurs des Essais? mettez leur iugement sur le troittoir à l'examen des Liures anciens. Ie ne dis pas pour leur demander, si Plutarque et Senecque sont de grands Autheurs, car la reputation les dresse en ce point-là, mais pour sçauoir de quelle part ils le sont plus: si c'est en la faculté de iuger, si c'est en elle d'inuenter et de produire, et comme eux que deuisent de ces facultez les entendent ou comprennent: qui frappe plus ferme que son compagnon en tel endroit: quelle a deu selon leur matiere estre leur conduite et leur fin en escriuant, quelle des fins d'escrire est la meilleure en general: quelles de leurs pieces ils pourroient perdre auec moins d'interest: quelles ils deuroient conseruer auant toutes, et pourquoy. Faites leur apres esplucher vne comparaison de l'vtilité de la doctrine de ces deux ou de leurs semblables, contre celle des autres Escriuains: et finalement trier en raisonnant sur les causes, ceux de cette plantureuse bande des Muses et Minerue, qu'ils aymeroient mieux ressembler et dissembler. Quiconque sçaura pertinemment respondre de tout cela, ie luy donne loy de gouuerner, sceller et canceler ma creance sur nostre Liure.

Pour venir aux reproches que ces personnes font aux Essais, ie ne les daignerois rabattre, à dessein de les mettre en grace auec elles, malades non curables par les mains de la raison: toutefois i'en veux dire vn mot en consideration de quelques esprits, qui meritent bien qu'on employe vn aduertissement afin de les garder de chopper apres les choppeurs; si desormais le credit qu'vn Ouurage de telle excellence s'est acquis aupres de toutes les belles ames, par la force de la verité, ne nous releue de ce besoin: et sans doute la guerre qu'il a soufferte entre les cerueaux foibles, et la faueur qu'il a nettement gaignée entres les forts, ont esté aussi necessaire appendances de son merite l'vne que l'autre. Premierement on l'accuse de quelque vsurpation du Latin, de la fabrique de nouueaux mots, et d'employer quelques phrases nonchalantes ou Gasconnes. Ie responds, que ie leur donne gaigné, s'ils peuuent dire, pere, ny mere, frere, sœurs, boire, manger, dormir, veiller, aller, voir, sentir, ouïr et toucher, ny tout le reste en somme des plus communs vocables qui tombent en nostre vsage, sans parler Latin. Ouy, mais le besoin d'exprimer nos conceptions, dit quelqu'vn d'eux, nous a contraints à l'emprunt de ceux-cy. Ma replique est, que le besoin de mon Pere tout de mesmes, l'a contraint de pa.ter en ceux-là ses emprunts outre les tiens, pour exprimer ses conceptions, qui sont outre les tiennes. Ie sçay bien qu'on a tourné les plus nobles conceptions, et les plus excellens Liures en nostre langue, où les traducteurs se sont par fois rendus plus superstitieux d'innouer et puiser aux sources estrangeres: mais on doit considerer, que les Essais resserrent en vne ligne, ce que ces traducteurs osent alonger en quatre: ioint que nous ne sommes peut-estre pas assez sçauans, ny moy, ny ceux qui deuisent ainsi, pour sentir si ces traductions sont par tout aussi vigoureuses que leur texte. I'ayme à dire Gladiateur, i'ayme à dire, Escrimeur à outrance, aussi fait ce Liure: cependant qui m'astreindroit à quitter l'vn des deux, ie retiendrois Gladiateur: et si sçay quel bruit on en menera: par tout en chose semblable, ie ferois de mesme. I'entens bien, qu'il faut vser de bride aux innouations et aux emprunts: mais n'est-ce pas vne sottise de dire, que si l'on n'en defend que l'abus, et qu'on reconnoisse qu'auec la bride et la prudence il soit loisible de les employer, on defende aux Essais de l'oser entreprendre comme incapables, le Roman de la Rose en ayant esté iugé capable autrefois? veu mesmes que le langage de son siecle, n'estoit pressé non plus que les nostre, sinon de la seule necessité d'amendment: et qu' auant ce vieil Liure, on ne laissoit pas de parler et de se faire entendre autant qu'on vouloit. Horace vrayement ne s'en tairoit pas.

> Ce que Rome a souffert de Plaute et de Cæcile,
> Le peut-elle interdire à Varie ou Virgile?
> Ne doy-ie orner langue, enflañt mes vers hardis,
> Puis qu'Ennie et Caton l'osoient orner jadis?
> Il semerent de fleurs le Poëme et la Prose,
> Prestans de nouueaux noms à mainte et mainte chose,
> Et tousiours à bon droict les chemins sont ouuers,
> A forger par les temps phrases et mots diuers.

A qui la force d'esprit manque, comme à ceux du temps de ce Roman; les vocables suffisans à s'exprimer, ne manquent iamais: et suis en doute au contraire, qu'en cette large et profonde vberté de la langue Grecque, ils ne se trouuassent encore souuent manques et taris chez Socrates et chez Aristote et Platon. On ne peut representer que les imaginations communes, par les mots communs: quiconque a des conceptions ou pensées extraordinaires, doit chercher des termes inusitez à s'exprimer. N'ont-ils pas aussi raison ie vous prie: qui pour huict ou dix mots qui leur sembleront estrangers ou hardis, ou pour trois manieres de parler Gasconnes, et vingt bisarres ou nonchalantes, et desreglées s'ils veulent, qu'ils espieront en cette piece si transcendante par tout, et mesmement au langage; n'y trouueront à parler que pour mesdire? Est-il defendu d'appliquer quelques lustre sur vn beau visage, pour en releuer la blancheur? Quand ie defend mon Pere des charges du dialecte, ie me mocque. Pardonnerions-nous à ces correcteurs, s'ils auoient forgé cent dictions à leur poste, pourueu que chacune d'elles en signifiast deux ou trois ordinaires: et dictions qui perçassent vne matiere iusques à la mouëlle, tandis que les autres la frayent ou frappent simplement? S'ils nous representoient mille nouuelles phrases tres-delicates, viues, basties et inuentées d'vne forme inimitable; qui dissent en demy signe, le sujet, le succez et la louange de quelque chose? mille metaphores esgalement admirables et inouyes, mille tres-propres applications de mots enfoncez et approfondis à diuers et nouueaux sens?

(car voila l'innouation qu'ils nous repriment, et qu'ils craignent que les Essais fassent passer en exemple) et tout cela, dis-je, sans qu'vn Lecteur y pût rien accuser que nouueauté, mais bien Françoise? Or à mesure que iardiner et prouigner à propos vne langue, est vne plus belle enterprise, à mesure est-elle permettable à moins de gens, ainsi que remarque mon Pere. C'est à quelques ieunes discoureurs du siecle, qu'il faudroit donner de l'argent pour ne s'en mesler plus, soit pour edifier ou démolir: comme à ce mauuais flusteur antique, qui prenoit simple loyer pour sonner, et double pour se taire. Ayant traité du langage ailleurs, i'y renuoye le Lecteur: et la seule necessité de l'occasion presente est cause que ie range icy ce dernier des Essais, il le faut transcrire: il n'ennuye iamais le Lecteur que quand il cesse, et tout y est parfait, s'il n'auoit point de fin. Vn si glorieux langage, deuroit estre par edict assigné particulierement à proclamer les grandes victoires, absoudre l'innocence, faire sonner le commandement des Loix, planter la Religion aux cœurs des hommes, et à loüer Dieu. C'est en verité l'vn des principaux cloux, qui fixeront la volubilité de nostre vulgaire François, continué iusques icy: son credit qui s'esleuera chaque iour, empeschant que de temps en temps on ne trouue suranné ce que nous disons auiourd'huy, parce qu'il preseruera de le dire: et le faisant iuger bon, d'autant qu'il sera sien.

On proscrit apres non seulement pour impudique et dangereuse, mais pour ie ne sçay quoy de nefas, vsons de ce terme, sa liberté d'anatomiser l'Amour surquoy ie n'oserois respondre vn seul mot, ny consequemment sur plusieurs autres articles touchez en cette Preface, apres les belles responses que luy-mesme y fait: n'estoit que nos hommes qui iugent toutes choses par opinion, gousteront à l'aduenir mieux sa defense d'vne autre main, bien que pire, qu'ils ne feront de la sienne propre. Cela s'appellera prester ma foiblesse, à seruir de lustre à sa force: mais c'est tout vn, ie luy dois assez pour subir cét inconuenient. Est-il donc raisonnable de condamner la theorique de l'Amour pour coupable et diffamable, establissant sa pratique pour honneste, legitime et sacramentale par le Mariage? Consentons neantmoins, s'il plaist à ces gens, qu'elle soit coulpable, et diffamable, il reste à nier qu'elle soit impudique, pour celuy qui la traitte, ny pour son Lecteur: specialement traitée par vn personnage, qui demeslant cette fusée, comme correcteur et scrutateur perpetuel des actions et des passions humaines, presche soigneusement la modestie et la bien-seance exemplaire aux Dames, et les dissuade de faire l'amour, ainsi que l'Autheur dont il est question. Car outre que ce Liure prouue fort bien le maquerelage, que l'art de la ceremonie et ses exceptions prestent à Venus; quels suffragans de chasteté sont ceux-cy, ie vous prie, qui vont encherissant si haut la force et la grace des effets de Cupidon, que de faire accroire à la ieunesse, qu'on n'en sçauroit pas simplement ouïr deuiser sans peril et sans transport? s'ils le disent à des femmes, n'ont-elles pas raison de mettre leur abstinence en garde contre vn prescheur qui soustient, que c'est chose impossible, d'ouïr seulement parler de la table sans rompre son ieusne? Ie diray donc, qu'à peine S. Paul eust-il refusé la langue ou l'oreille au besoin, sur l'examen de l'Amour, puis qu'il fonde sa vertu à sentir et supporter les aiguillons mesmes de cette passion en son corps: nam virtus in infirmitate perficitur. Et quoy, Socrates, qui se leuoit continent d'aupres ce bel et brillant sujet, dont la Grece, à ce qu'on disoit, n'eust sceu porter deux; faisoit-il alors moins acte de chasteté, d'autant qu'il auoit oüy, veu, dit et touché que ne faisoit Timon, se pourmenant seul tandis en vn desert? Liuia, selon l'opinion des Sages, parloit en Imperatrice et capable Dame, telle qu'on l'a reconnuë, soustenant qu'aux yeux d'vne femme chaste, vn homme nud n'estoit non plus qu'vne image. Que si quelqu'vn croid neantmoins que cela veüille dire, qu'elle leur eust conseillé d'aller voir vn tel spectacle exprés, ou de se leuer plus matin, pour lire toutes les folies des Poëtes Grecs et Latins, il declare assez, sa bénevë. Cette Princesse iugeoit, sans doute, qu'il faut que le monde bannisse du tout l'Amour et sa mere au loin: ou que s'il les reserue chez luy, c'est vne basteleric à quiconque ce soit de faire le pudique, pour sequestrer des yeux, de la langue et des oreilles les images et les discours de la cabale de ce Dieu. Outre que les hommes et les femmes pour qui l'Amour est banny; i'entens qui n'ont aucune part reelle ou presente en luy; sont forcez d'aduoüer, qu'ils y ont part presomptiue, ou du moins acceptable, par le mariage: raison qui les doit diuertir de refuser au besoin l'œil, la langue ou l'oreille, à telles appendances de ce mesme Dieu, cela s'appelle telles images, et tels discours. Ie n'approuue pas pourtant les licences de ces Poëtes-là, non plus que l'allegation que mon Pere en fait par fois, ny mesmes quelque emancipation de son creu; tant pource qu'elles repugnent à mon goust, que d'autant que ie suis tousiours d'auis que chacun contienne autant qu'il peut ses faicts et ses paroles sous le ioug des formes et ceremonies communes: mais i'accuse encores plus que telles erreurs ceux qui les accusent outre leur mesure. La plus legitime consideration que les Dames puissent apporter au refus et fuite d'escouter ces choses, c'est de craindre qu'on ne les tente par leur moyen. Mais outre qu'au contraire, ainsi que i'ay dit, la ceremonie est ministre de Venus, soit par son intention originaire, soit par accident; ces Dames doiuent auoir grand'honte de ne se sentir de bon or que iusques à la coupelle, et continentes, que parce qu'elles ne rencontrent rien qui hurte la continence. L'assaut est le labeur du combattant, mais est aussi pere de sa victoire et de son triomphe, et toute vertu desire l'espreuue, comme tenant son essence mesme du contraste. Si n'entens-ie pas pourtant, que la chasteté deust désirer ou souffrir l'assaut, en plus amples termes, que ceux dont il est question: c'est à dire vagues, generaux, et hors tout interest et dessein particulier qui pût estre aposté pour la surprendre. Ce ne sont pas donc les discours francs et speculatifs sur l'Amour, qui sont dangereux; ce sont les mols et delicats, les recits artistes et chatoüilleux des passions amoureuses, et de leurs effets, qui si voyent aux Romans, aux Poëtes, et en telles especes d'Escriuains: dangereux dis-je tousiours, mais que le seroient beaucoup moins, sans l'encherissement et le haut prix où les loix de la ceremonie et leurs exceptions, ont esleué Cupidon et Venus. Toutesfois certes i'ay grand peur, que le genre humain ne puisse sçauoir plus dangereusement quel Animal est l'Amour, que quand personne ne luy dit. Ie crains, en somme, que si l'on conjoint en vn la ieunesse, l'inclination naturelle, les delices, vne gentillesse natale auec vne nourritute polie, animées d'abondant par l'art et le succez des ceremonies alleguées; on ne loge Cupidon à tel degre parmy ceux où toutes ces choses se trouueroient ensemble, que pour beau que ces Romans, et Poëtes, et le grand Platon mesme le peussent, descrire, il ne reste profondement inferieur, à l'image que des gens de cette dangereuse trempe luy supposent: en vn mot, la plus friande peinture de l'Amour qu'on leur puisse tracer, ternit en leur imagination l'idée qu'ils conçoiuent de luy naturellement.

Pour quelque legere obscurité qu'on reprend apres en nos Essais, ie diray; que la matiere n'estant pas aussi bien pour les nouices, il leur a deu suffire d'accommoder le style à la portée des profez seulement: on ne peut traitter les grandes choses, selon l'intelligence des petites et basses ames: car la comprehension des hommes ne va guerre outre leur inuention. Ce n'est pas icy le rudiment des apprentifs, c'est l'Alcoran des maistres: Oeuure non à gouster par vne attention superficielle, mais à digirer et chilifier, auec vne application profonde: et de plus, par vn tres-bon estomach? encore est-ce d'auantage, vn des derniers bons Liures qu'on doit prendre comme il est le dernier qu'on doit quitter. Qu'est-ce diray-ie à ce propos, que Plutarque trouueroit plus à dire au bon-heur de son siecle, que le manquement de la naissance de ce Liure? et que feroit plus volontiers Xenophon, s'il retournoit, que de l'estudier auec nous? Il se peut enfin nommer la quintessence de la vraye Philosophie, le throsne iudicial de la raison, l'hellebore de la folie, le hors de page des esprits, et la resurrection de la verité morale et humaine; c'est à dire la plus vtile et seule accessible: ie laisse toûjours à part celle que Dieu nous communique par le don l'Euangile, et de sa grace paternelle.

Ie voy qu'on le galoppe en suitte du reproche de foiblesse, sur la peu d'obligation qu'on pretend qu'il s'est donné, de traitter les matieres au long. Surquoy considerant s'ils auoient raison, ie n'ay seu trouuer aux Opuscules de Plutarque, guere ou point du tout, de sujets traittez à pleine voile, outre le nombre qui s'en void aux Essais: Comme de l'Amitié, sur laquelle il a recontré ce que les autres semblent auoir seulement cherché iusques icy: de la Neantise et vanité de l'homme en l'Apologie de Sebond, piece si pleine en son espece, que le souhait n'y peut qu'adiouster: de la Vertu: de l'Art de conferer: le discours qu'il manie sur des Vers de Virgile: contre la Medicine: de l'institution des enfans: du Pedantisme: de la Solitude: Que le goust des biens et des maux dépend en partie de l'opinion que nous en auons: du Repentir: de la Diuersion: de l'Experience: de l'Exercitation: sur la Simplicité des discours de Socrates au Traitté de la Physionomie: le poinct des Fins de l'homme qu'il agite si pleinement en diuers lieux: comme aussi celuy de l'Erreur des opinions vulgaires, accompagné de leur correction: sa Peinture: le tres-difficile Examen du poids et merite de tant de diuerses actions des hommes et l'Anatomie parfaite de leurs passions et mouuemens interieurs: sur lesquelles actions, passions et mouuemens interieurs des hommes, ie ne sçay si iamais autre Autheur dit ny considera ce qu'il a dit et consideré. Somme, faisant exception des choses qu'il a traittées amplement, ie les trouue en tel nombre, qu'elles occupent presque la masse complete de l'ouurage. Mais à bon escient quand il n'auroit approfondy qu'vn de ces articles de la sorte, qu'ils le sont, luy pourroit-on imputer que sa foiblesse l'empeschast d'en faire autant des autres? ou si bien Hercules n'auoit battu qu'vn homme, seroit-il peu vaillant, pourueu que celuy-là fust Anthée ou Gerion? La cause qui fait sembler que cét Autheur comprenne moins de matieres pleines que les autres; c'est que, parce qu'il ressetre en vn volume toutes les matieres de la Philosophie Morale, il est force qu'outre les pleines et combles il entasse de surcroist, infinies manques ou courtes, plus que cés autres-là ne font: lesquelles à l'aduis de ces repreneurs excluent les pleines et combles, ou font qu'elles ne doiuent pas estre considerées: outre la bestise de ces gens, de manquer maintefois de reconnoistre la suitte par laquelle il continuë et accomplit les matieres afin d'y apporter ce comble, à trauers de quelque gaillardise d'intermede où son style est porté. Mais qu'est-ce que de traitter les matieres tout du long? il n'est rien, dit-il, dont il voye le tout: et moins le voyent ceux qui luy promettent de l'escrire. Quiconque n'espuise vn theme sans laisser que dire apres soy, ne le traitte pas tout du long: toutefois ie ne voy point que Platon, escriuant de Lysis, ait soustrait le moyen à son disciple Aristote, à Ciceron, à Plutarque, à Lucien, et fraischement aux Essais, de nous entretenir de l'Amitié: ny que luy-mesme par sa Republique, pour entiere et plantureuse que nos accusateurs la reconnoissent ait empesché de composer cent autres Republiques: ainsi du reste. Voila doncques, que manier à leur mode vn poinct tout entier, ce n'est autre chose, que le laisser à manier tout entier encores comme vne source inépuisable, à cent autres Escriuains qui viendront apres. Que si corrigeans leur plaidoyer, ils disent; qu'on le doit au moins manier amplement: ie leur consens, que cette amplitude soit quelque chose; mais non pas de tel poids, qu'elle ne se puisse trouuer en vn ouurage indigne de recommendation: tant s'en faut que son manquement, accordé qu'il fust en nostre Liure pût stestrir par coherence, la transcendante sagesse de ses conceptions. Ie leur demande s'ils n'aymeroient pas autant auoir escrit ce seul mot d'Aristote; Que l'amitié est vne ame en deux corps, que tout le Toxaris, bien que ce soit vn bon Escrit, voire le Lælius peut-estre, qui vaut encores plus? Enquerez Platon, s'il n'ayme au Sympose l'Oraison d'Agathon, que parce que celle d'Aristophanes l'accompagne, estendant l'Oeuure: mais aduisez que deuient Platon en ses plus amples et longs Ouurages mesmes, si c'est le plus, et non le mieux dire, qu'on cherche? Or si c'est le poids des conceptions qui fait valoir vn Ouurage, autant le fait-il en celles de diuers obiets ramassez ensemble, que d'vn seul, oüy plus à mon aduis: de ce qu'outre que l'on void par cette diuersité, que l'esprit qui parle est plus vniuersel, il paroist aussi qu'il est plus grand: puis qu'il a pû frapper de bons coups, si bons coups y a, sans se donner l'aduantage de s'ouurir si à plein qu'il feroit, s'il prenoit loisir de s'acharner sur vne matiere: en laquelle d'abondant vn trait enfante l'autre, lors qu'on vient à la filer de long, relayant et secondant l'ouurier. Celuy qui prend six fueilles de papier pour escrire vn Traité de la Medecine, ie ne me soucie gueres s'il n'en occupe que deux sur ce texte, pourueu qu'il me rechausse les quatre autres feüilles, de quelque aussi riche couleur: qui perd morceau pour morceau, ne perd rien. Et me rapporte bien au Lecteur, sçauoir, si la couleur dont les Essais luy rechaussent les Chapitre des Boiteux, des Choses, de la Physionomie, de la Vanité, sans aller plus loin; se doit contenter d'estre simplement appellée aussi riche que celle qu'on luy promettoit par la tiltre. Puis qu'estans hommes on ne nous peut faire voir vne chose pleinement et parfaitement; il faut que les Autheurs s'efforcent à mettre ordre que nous les voyons toutes ou plusieurs, le moins imparfaitement qu'ils se puisse. Ainsi quand mes parties auroient prouué, que ce Liure ne traite rien amplement, qu'ils choisissent à leur poste autant de sujets qu'il en comprend, pour nous donner sur chacun à son exemple, vn des meilleurs mots qui s'y puissent dire: et lors i'ay recouuré maistre en eux, auec pareille ioye qu'vn autre le trouua jadis en Socrates: quand apres l'auoir oüy haranguer, il quitta ses disciples, afin d'estre disciple luy-mesme. Il n'est point de discours ny trop longs ny trop briefs, ny diuagans indeuëment, pour toucher vne de leurs autres censures, si l'on ne perd temps à les lire.

Dauantage, ie viens de rencontrer deux ou trois nouuelles obiections contre mon pere en Baudius: autheur que ie respecte ailleurs, et par son esprit, et par obligation, m'ayant du fond de la Holande honoré de ses Eloges. Il le dément, de publier pour foible sa memoire, qui paroist vigoureuse, à son aduis, par les authoritez, les allegations, et les exemples des Essais. Il se trompe: car mon mesme pere escriuant sans aucune prouision de ces choses, il lisoit aux interualles de sa composition les descouurant de hazard çà et là dans les Liures: et puis assortissoit chaque piece, en sa place. Baudius l'arguë aussi de vanité, de ce qu'il escrit, que ce defaut de memoire le portoit à ne pouuoir retenir le nom de ses gens, que par celuy de leur nation: semblant à cét autheur, que cela doit presupposer vn nombre infiny de domestiques. Qu'elle conclusion? Nostre dame! veu que le nostre ne parle nullement qu'ils fussent en quantité: et veu qu'il ne peut non-plus esperer, de faire par ce recit imaginaire le nombre grand: puis que s'il eust esté tel, il estoit aussi facile d'en oublier les nations, ou les prouinces, que les noms propres. Cét objet est assez rabattu par vn seul mot: c'est qu'en tout son liure, il ne s'attribuë pas seulement secretaire ny maistre d'hostel, et n'appelle pas gouuernante, la femme dont il parle, qui seruoit l'enfance de sa fille: l'vn et l'autre de ces titres neantmoins, estans en nostre siecle si commun parmy les domestiques des maisons mediocrement qualifiée, et moindres que la sienne. Qui plus est, Baudius pretend, que bien qu'il triomphe en metaphores, il s'y laisse par fois emposter de licence à l'exemple, dit-il, des grand orateurs. Ie ne voy point ces licences: il en deuoit remarquer quelques-vnes, à faute dequoy son propre silence luy sert de response. Il le querelle apres d'estimer la science indigne de sa noblesse, pource qu'il presche en diuers lieux son ignorance. Cette atteinte est encores autant indirecte: car parmy ses defauts il est forcé d'aduoüer cettuy-là, puis qu'il est veritable, d'ignorer certaines et plusieurs choses: ayant promis sa peinture complete et iuste. S'il honore la science ou non, au partir de là, nous le pouuons comprendre de cette parole, qu'il prononce autrepart; que ceux qui la dédaignent monstrent assez leur bestise: et dit au chapitre, De l'art de conferer; que le sçauoir en son vray et droict vsage est le plus noble ot le plus puissant acquest des hommes. Baudius en toutes ces censures, se deuoit souuenir d'vn mot de Sertorius, ce me semble, ayant battu son ieune ennemy, qui ne se deffioit et ne s'armoit que d'vn costé; qu'vn suffisant capitaine doit autant regarder derriere luy, que deuant: ce que si Baudius eust fait, il auroit trouué en vn passage le correctif de l'autre; quand le besoin l'eust requis.

Au surplus, ceux qui pretendent calomnier la pieté de nostre autheur, pour auoir si meritoirement inscrit vn heretique au roolle des excellens poëtes de ce temps, ou sur quelqu'autre puncti̇lle de pareil air; me ietteroient volontiers en soupçon, qu'ils essayassent à nous faire croire, qu'ils ont des compagnons en la desbauche de la leur. Tout ainsi qui iamais homme ne voulut p.us de mal aux illegitimes et querelleuses religions, que celuy dont est question; de mesme par consequent, il fust partysan formel de ce qui regardoit respect de la vraye: et la touche de celle-cy, c'estoit pour luy, comme les essais le publient, et pour moy sa creature, la saincte loy de nos peres, leur tradition et leur authorité. Qui pourroit aussi supporter ces nouueaux tirans du siecle, ces escheleurs de ciel; qui pensent arriuer à connoistre Dieu par leurs moyens, et circonscrire luy, ses œuures et leur creance aux limites de leur perquisition et de leur raison: ne voulans rien receuoir pour vray, s'il ne leur semble vray-semblable? Ou toutes choses sont plus immenses et plus incroyable, là sont Dieu et ses faicts plus certainement: Trismegiste à costé de ce propos, appellant la Deïte, cercle dont le centre est par tout, et le circonference nulle part. Quant à Baudius qui touche aussi cette corde, il nous deuoit marquer en quoy consistoient ces passages contre la mesme religion, qu'il dit meriter la liture en nos Essais: ou se resoudre à souffrir luy-mesme, vne liture, de celuy par lequel il accuse en eux ce defaut. Mais il est bien vray, que ce liure estant ennemy profez des sectes nouuelles, plus Baudius huguenot l'accuse en l'article de la Religion, et plus il magnifie son triomphe, et le declare loüable en ce poinct-là. Sur ce lieu principalement, faut-il escouter nostre Liure d'aguet; et se garder de broncher en quelque inique interpretation de ses intentions, par sa libre, brefue et brusque façon de s'exprimer. M'amuseray-ie à particulariser quelques regles, pour se gouuerner en cette lecture: il faut dire en vn mot; ne t'en mesle pas, ou sois sage. Aucuns liures ne sont sages, pour ceux qui ne sont point assez sages pour eux: En effect ie n'ay iamais veu personne l'attaquer, soit du costé de la religion ou d'autre, qui n'ait rabattu son atteinte de luy-mesme; faisant voir sur le champ, qu'il luy imposoit, ou qu'il ne l'entendoit pas.

Pro captu lectoris habent sua fata libelli. Ce que ie ne dis nullement pour Baudius, lequel comme i'ay remarqué, n'a choqué ce lieu que par interest et passion. Ie rends graces à Dieu, que parmy la confusion des creances effrenées qui trauersent et tempestent aujourd'huy son Eglise, il luy ait pleu de l'estayer d'vn si puissant pillier humain. La foy des simples ayant à desirer d'estre fortifiée mondainement contre tels assauts, ainsi qu'elle l'estoit spirituellement par cette faueur diuine, qui luy est acquise auant les siecles; la bonne fortune luy fit vn present tres-propre à ce besoin, de luy produire vne ame de si haute suffisance, qui la verifiast par son approbation. En effect, si la Religion Catholique, à la naissance de ce personnage, eust sceu combien il deuoit estre excellent, quelle apprehension eust esté la sienne de l'auoir pour aduersaire? Certes il a rendu vraye sa proposition, que des plus habiles et des plus simples ames, se faisoient les bien-croyans; comme aussi la mienne, que de ces deux extremitez se faisoient les gens de biens. Car ie tiens le party de ceux que iugent que le vice procede de sottise, et consequemment, que plus on approche de la haute suffisance, plus on s'esloigne de luy : proposition que ie me suis peut-estre efforcé de prouuer en autre lieu. Quelle teste bien faite, ne fieroit à Platon sa bource et son secret, ayant seulement leu ses oeuures ? Par cette consideration, ie m'esprisay le reproche d'extrauagance dont on me chargeoit, alors que i'honorois et cherissois si fort cét esprit sur la simple lecture des Essais ; qu'auant l'auoir ny pratiqué, ny veu, i'estois aussi cordialement sa fille que depuis. Ie me representois, que toute bien-veillance estoit mal fondée, si elle ne l'estoit sur la suffisance et la vertu de son objet, et que non seulement la suffisance de l'ouurier paroissoit en ces escrits là, mais y paroissoit en appareil si haut, que le vice ne pouuoit loger chez luy, ny la vertu luy manquer : et que par consequent, nul ne deuoit differer à luy departir cette bien-veillance, iusques à l'entreueuë ; si ce n'estoit quelqu'vn auquel il faschast de confesser, que sa raison eust plus de credit à luy noüer vne alliance, que les yeux ; et faschast d'aduoüer consequemment encores qu'il pust rien faire de bien, s'il les auoit bandez. Pour engendrer l'amour, intelligence corporelle et spirituelle, la presence et la veue sont autant requises que le discours : mais la bien-veillance ou amitié, comme estans vne intelligence toute spirituelle, doit germer spirituellement par le pur discours et la connoissance : bien qu'elle se puisse enrichir de presence, par la conuersation assistée et confortée des offices qui la peuuent suiure.

Reuenons cependant, pour dire, que la plus generale censure qu'on fasse sur nostre liure, c'est que son autheur s'y depeint. Quoy le vulgaire le blasme, d'auoir parlé de soy-mesme, et ne loue pas de n'auoir rien fait qu'il n'ait osé dire en public, ny de la plus meritoire verité de toutes, celle qu'on dit de soy pleinement et sincerement ? Il n'adjouste pas aussi, que ceux qui le rabroüent le plus asprement de nous auoir donné sa peinture, osent encore moins qu'ils ne veulent en faire ainsi de la leur : et que nul ne peut auoir bonne grace à l'accuser de produire sa vie nuë aux yeux du monde, sauf celuy-là, qui perd de la gloire à s'abstenir d'en faire autant. Il est aduis au peuple qu'il seroit bien loisible, d'exposer au iour quelques actions publiques, suiuant Cesar et Xenophon, mais non pas les priuée. Veritablement, outre que ces deux-là declarent aussi force menuës actions de leur vie, comme de nostre âge, Messieurs de Monluc et de Noüe racontent iusques à leurs songes ; le peuple n'entend pas que valent, ny les privées, ny les publiques, ny que public mesme n'est fait que pour le particulier. Mon Pere a pensé ne te pouuoir rien mieux apprendre, que l'vsage de toy-mesme : et te l'enseigne tantost par raisons, tantost par espreuue : si sa pointure est vicieuse ou fausse, plains-toy de luy : si elle est bonne et vraye, remercie-le, de n'auoir pas voulu refuser à ta discipline le poinct plus instructif de tous, c'est l'exemple. Tu prends, au reste, singulier plaisir, qu'on te fasse voir, ou qu'on te fasse toy-mesme vn chef d'armées et d'estat : il faut estre honneste homme auant que d'estre l'vn ny l'autre parfaitement ; nos Essais te donnent, aux exemples de leur ouurier, tablature de particuliere efficace pour deuenir tel : oüy certes, il est requis de passer par leur escole, pour esueiller tes facultez à la capacité de monter en ces deux grades, quand besoin seroit. Præcepta docent, exempla mouent. Il est bien vray, que le commun estime la science de viure, c'est à dire de se rendre honneste homme et sage, si facile, qu'il croid que c'est chose superfluë de l'enseigner : car mesmes, ainsi que Plutarque remarque, il sent bien que les enfans ne sçauroient dancer, ny piquer cheuaux, ny trancher à table, ny saliier encore, qui ne le leur apprend : mais quant à l'art de viure, cét animal à plusieurs testes ne l'y trouua iamais à dire. Il s'abuse fort : il est beaucoup plus aisé de vaincre que de viure, et plus triomphans que de sages : dont il arriue, que mon pere imagine bien Socrates en la place d'Alexandre, Alexandre en celle de Socrates, il ne peut. Les exemples de ce personnage te semblent-ils bons : remercie la fortune qu'ils soient tombez deuant tes yeux : te semblent-ils mauuais ? ne crains pas aussi que beaucoup de gens soient pour les suiure. Ouy, mais apres tout, on n'a pas accoustumé de se dépeindre soy-mesme ; voila le gref. N'est-ce pas vn grand cas, de la tyrannie de la coustume sur le vulgaire ? ou n'est elle pas importune en cét endroit sur tous ; de le reduire à ne s'*en*querir iamais de ce qui se doit faire, mais de ce qui se fait ? Vulgaire prest à commettre toute vilenie par bien-seance, si ses voisins continuent vn temps de la commettre : renonçant à faire tout bien, voir à soy-mesme, si comme leur singe ils ne l'y traisnent par exemple : et prest dauantage à iustifier tous maux que les puissans s'aduiseront de luy faire souffrir ; pourueu que par la suitte d'vne année, ces excez occupent quelque mine d'vsage. La coustume luy met-elle l'homme en honneur ? il n'adore plus les Dieux mesmes que sous sa forme. Au reste ie ne consens non plus au sous-reproche qu'on fait à nostre autheur, de ce qu'il rapporte en cette sienne peinture, iusques aux moindres particularitez de ses mœurs ; et la iuge autant instructiue par ces punctilles que par les traicts plus solemnels ; tant à cause que les grands efforts dépendent ordinairement des petites actions, que d'autant aussi que la vie mesme n'est qu'vne contexture de punctilles et niaiseries. Obseruez pour vne des preuues de ma these, sur quelles matieres le propre conseil des roys prend de trois fois l'vne ses mœurs deliberations. Les autres escriuains ont eu tort, de ne s'arrester pas à nous instruire en des actions pour petites qu'elles fussent, où plusieurs pouuoient faillir, et que nul ne pouuoit éuiter : et n'est aucune chose meslée dans les interests de l'homme, qui soit petite ou legere de poids : elle pese assez si elle touche. Il a certainement eu raison d'enseigner comme il se portoit en l'amour, au deuis, à la table, et à la garderobe encore : puis que tant de gens se sont perdus, ou fort incommodez, pour ne sçauoir pas se gouuerner en ces choses là.

Quelqu'vn le lapide d'inuectiues en particulier, de ce qu'il declare ses erreurs et ses fautes en cette description de soy-mesme. Vrayement c'est vne chose monstrueuse ! comme le monde est composé, nul de ses compagnons ne l'estime pire, pour estre défaillant de cette part qui le dit estre : ou plutost, chacun d'eux auroit à plaisir qu'on creust qu'il seroit semblable, si mesme il n'en estoit rien ; mais il l'estiment pire, de ne s'estre feint autre : et se presument fort honnestes gens et bien exemplaires, parce qu'ils se gardent d'aduoüer leurs vices. Heureux les trouuay-ie certes, qui pour se rendre vertueux, n'ont qu'à dénier leur vice. Mais quand ses fautes et preuarications seroient plus odieuses, seroit-il pourtant blasmable de les confesser ? veu mesmes qu'il les confesse sans impudence, et auec reconnoissance d'auoir tort. Dieu reduit toutes les loix à ce mot: Ayme-moy sur toutes choses, et ton prochain comme toy-mesme: et nous voyons que de mille outrages que nous faisons à nostre prochain, nous ne luy en ferions pas quatre, si nous n'estions déguisez: parle déguisement font leur coup, les larrons, les empoisonneurs, assassins, liureurs de villes, brigands, tyrans en herbe, faux contracteurs, faux amis, faux Iuges, et qui non? En somme leuez le masque d'entre nous, vous en extirpez presque du tout l'offence sur autruy: l'uniuers est au calme: car les hommes seroient bons par tout, si par tout on les voyoit. Aussi sçauons-nous qu'il n'est rien, que Iesus-Christ reproche si griefuement aux Pharisiens que l'hypocrisie: et notez aux Pharisiens, ausquels il auoit lors pourtant à reprocher le complôt de sa mort. Dont il arriue que Dauid n'escrit pas plus de loüanges à son Seigneur, que de publiques confessions de ses delicts: et Sainct Augustin ny S. Ierosme ne se sont pas oubliez aux mesmes confessions. Outre plus, la Iustice ne tire son effet que de la découuerte des crimes: donnant la gehenne aussi, pour y contraindre les hommes: et l'Eglise parfait sa confession auriculaire, par la generale et publique. Chacun au reste se doit constituer Iuge sur soy-mesme: comme tel, mon Pere declare et foüette ses vices, non en priué seulement, mais en public: puis que le preuost ne se contente pas de punir son coupeur de bource, si ce n'est en pleines hales: afin que le chastisement de celuy que plusieurs peuuent ressembler, aduertisse plusieurs de ne luy ressembler pas. Nos correcteurs disent; qu'il y a de l'effronterie à prescher ses imperfections et ses tares: noble information, qui veut guarantir l'ordure du faict par la pudeur de la negation! reformation que le plus meschant ayme le mieux, et soustient le plus entre les bourreaux et les tourmens! Or apres tout, celuy vers qui la pudeur n'a point eu la force de le pouuoir garder d'estre ingrat, lasche ou traistre; s'il le cele ou dénie, ce n'est pas la pudeur qui peut desormais auoir la force de le luy faire dénier: c'est quelqu'autre respect. Grande faueur au criminel, que ce luy soit vertu de voiler ou démentir la verité. Ceux qui craignent, que qui nous permettroit de publier nos vices, nous leueroit le frein de la vergogne, se trompent: il est plus de personnes qui feroient banqueroute à la paillardise, s'ils estoient contraints de dire tout ce qu'ils font; qu'ils n'en est qui osassent continuer d'estre larrons, meurtriers et traistres, estans necessitez de se declarer tels. Sans doute vne telle coustume sçauroit arracher seule à dix millions d'hommes, des crimes que l'apprehension de la corde ne leur arrache pas. Puis comme dit nostre penitent: Il faut voir son vice, et l'estudier pour le redire: ceux qui le celent à autruy, le celent ordinairement à eux-mesmes: ils ne le tiennent pas pour assez couuert, s'ils le voyent: et les maux de l'ame s'obscurcissent en leur force, le plus malade les sent le moins: d'autant que l'ame perd le sentiment, perdant la santé, au contraire du corps. Voila pourquoy il les faut souuentefois remanier au iour: les ouurant et les euentrant du fond de nos entrailles, d'vne main impiteuse. Ce sont ses mots enuiron. Or de la méconnoissance de nos vices et de nos taches vient, outre l'empirement, le defaut de satisfaction vers Dieu, comme de la plus ample connoissance, vient la satisfaction plus ample. Ioint que pour nous apprendre à hayr la crasse, qui nous difforme le visage de la conscience, il sert de luy presenter à toute heure son miroüer; obtenez qu'elle trauaille à se contempler en cét estat, comme elle fait en s'estudiant pour se décrire, vous la portez à l'auoir en horreur. Mais laissons ce propos, aussi bien ne sçaurions-nous dire que se sornettes sur ce sujet, apres les excellentes choses que nostre autheur dit luy-mesme, aux Chapitres qui s'appellent, Sur des Vers de Virgile, et de l'Exercitation. Il est bien vray qu'en saison telle que la nostre, où les choses plus excellentes ont moins de credit, il faut que les sornettes en esperent.

Quant à quelques gros bonnets, qui le pretendoient taxer d'ignorance, ils montrent assez qu'ils veulent deuiser, et nous contenterons de les escouter pour toute réponse. Non seulement pour les respect des discours et considerations que cét Escriuain apporte sur l'ignorance et sur la science, si riches et sublimes, qu'on reconnoist assez, qu'il ne peut estre ignorant qu'où, et quand il luy plaist: et quiconque connoist l'ignorance, et n'est ignorant qu'à sa mode et à son mot, surpasse la science que d'autant qu'il publie aussi; que celuy qui le surprendra en ce vice, ne fera rien contre luy, voire mesmes que l'ignorance est sa maistresse forme; adjoûtons qu'encores ces gens ne la connoissent-ils en son ouurage, que par la profession qu'il fait d'estre son partysan. Nul ne doit auoir honte d'ignorer, s'il n'ignore les choses necessaires à l'homme en general, ou à luy en particulier par sa condition, ou celles qu'il veut qu'on croye qu'il sçache. Or non seulement nostre Autheur n'est blessé d'aucune de ces trois ignorances; mais toutes les fois qu'il parle de quelque science que ce soit, parlant presque de toutes par occasion, s'il n'en parle fort amplement, au moins ne s'y differre-t'il iamais, nonobstant sa profession d'ignorance. A quel prix ie vous supplie se tailleroit la science, telle que ces Messieurs mesmes la puissent figurer et allonger sa portée; si l'ignorance de cettuy-cy se taille au prix de l'Apologie de Sebonde, et du Chapitre de la Medecine, pour ne toucher que ces deux pieces seules de son liure? et notamment considerables, en cette occasion de monstrer, en cas que besoin fust, s'il est sçauant, ou s'il ne l'est pas; veu qu'elles sont hors de son principal gibier en la plus-part de leur estenduë, et presque vniuerselles en ce qu'on appelle vulgairement science et doctrine. Quel precieux ignorant, au surplus, qui conçoit si pompeusement l'ignorance que cettuy-cy? ignorant qui se connoist, qui se proclame, et qui reconnu pour tel, que par où il luy plaist qu'on le reconnoisse? quel precieux ignorant, qui fait voir où bon luy semble, que s'il n'a appris les sciences, c'est qu'il a senty qu'il pouuoit enseigner les meilleures sans les apprendre? ignorant enfin, qui sçait choisir aux mesmes sciences ce qui luy fait besoin; taxer à iuste prix la part qu'il en eslit, et celle qu'il en rebutte, et nous montrer le droict vsage de cette-là. Certes les sciences sont de si facile acquisition et distribution, qu'eux mesmes qui parlent, et deux mille autres dans Paris, feroient en trois ans dix mille docteurs en toutes les parties de la doctrine, qui peuuent à leur compte mesme défaillir à ce personnage; langue Grecque, Grammaire, Physique, Metaphysique, Mathematique: mais ie leur donne quinze, s'ils peuuent, s'amissans tous ensemble, forger en l'espace entiere de leur vie, ie ne dy pas vn pareil esprit et iugement; ouy bien seulement, vn esprit qui ait aussi bonne grace à tympaniser la science, que cettuy-cy l'ignorance. Qui peut trouuer telles sciences de College, où communes, a dire, en cette hautesse d'entendement et de iugement, au cas mesmes qu' elles luy manquassent du tout; sinon celuy qui ne sçait que valent l'entendement ny le iugement en autruy, pource qu'il ne les possede pas? Si la science outre plus, se vante d'enrichir la suffisance, la suffisance se vante aussi d'auoir engendré la science: et le sçauant ne porte pas son talent par tout, ce que le suffisant fait: ny la science ne controlle iamais la suffisance: si fait bien la suffisance, la science: et l'instruit des mesures de sa force et de sa foiblesse, non au reuers. De plus, l'effet de celle-là s'exprime souuent à limiter, par fois à recuser de tout celle-cy: dont nostre Sage escrit; que le suffisant est suffisant à ignorer mesmes. Or l'appelle Sciences de College, ou communes, ces disciplines que ie viens de nommer, et toutes celles en vn mot qui sont hors la discipline de l'homme et de la vie: c'est à dire hors la Morale, consistant en la faculté d'agir, raisonner et iuger droitement: doctrine pour laquelle assister et seruir apres tout, les autres doctrines sont forgées, où elles le sont auec nul ou peu de fruict. Partant quiconque la tient en haut degré, comme faisoit ce mesme personnage, peut oublier ou negliger toutes les autres, quand il luy plaira: qui s'appellent purs amusemens scholastiques eu ceux qui ignorent celle-cy: et simples ornemens et adminicules en ceux qui la sçauent. Alcibiades trouuant vn iour Pericles empesché à dresser les comptes de son administration pour les rendre au peuple, iugea qu'il se deuoit plutost occuper à chercher le moyen de n'en rendre point. Et combien donc a plus dignement fait, que d'acquerir les sciences vulgaires dont il est question, celuy qui a releué son esprit à tel degré de hauteur par vne autre seule bien choisie, en luy dédiant tout ce soin que le commun des sçauans dissipe entre-elle et cette quantité de ses compagnes; que le manquement de celles-là ne luy peut apporter aucune imperfection ou perte, ny l'assistance aucun lustre, qu'il ne puisse pertinemment negliger? et qui sçait comprendre, et faire comprendre en suite à tout homme sage, que cette abstinence ou negligence est bien fondée? Ceux qui apprennent ces doctrines-là s'égalent à elles: celuy qui fait ce trait de les negliger à telle condition d'auantage, s'esleue par dessus elles: et Socrates, Monarque de la sagesse et du genre humain, éleut par son partage cette espece de sapience, sçauante aux mœurs, et par tout ailleurs ignorante, et s'y borna toute sa vie. Pour le regard de quelques-vns, qui veulent estendre les effets de cette pretenduë ignorance de l'esprit dont nous parlons, iusques au changement de quelques termes vsitez en l'art vulgairement, libertinage de sa methode, suite décousuë de ses discours, et manque de relation des Chapitres auec leurs tiltres mesmes par fois: s'ils sont capables de croire qu'vne teste de ce calibre ait manqué par incapacité à faire en cela, ce que tout escolier de quinze ans peut et fait, ie trouue qu'ils sont si plaisans à parler, que ce seroit dommage de les faire taire. Ces messieurs auec leurs belles animaduersions ont volontiers cueilly l'vne des branches de cette ignorance doctorale, laquelle mon pere vous aduertit en quelque lieu, que la science fait et engendre, comme elle défait la populaire. Ie dis qu'ils ont cueilly l'vne des branches de cette ignorance-là: car enfin il est vne autre ignorance haute et philosophique, qu'ils ne connoissent point, et qui nous est d'vne autre sorte, apportée et enseignée par la science, s'il est besoin de le dire apres ce que i'ay representé: science à laquelle apres elle montre le chemin qu'elle doit tenir, luy taille sa part, et luy fait voir, qu'elle n'est ny sage ny clair-voyante, si elle ne reconnoist releuer d'elle.

Il se voit vne espece d'impertinens iuges des essais, entre ceux-mesmes qui les ayment; ce sont ceux qui les loüent sans admiration, signamment en vn siecle si esloigné de ceux où tels fruicts germoient aultrefois. La vraye touche des esprits, c'est l'examen d'vn nouuel autheur: et celuy qui le lit, se met à l'espreuue plus qu'il ne l'y met. Cettuy-cy sans doute, feroit parler en homme rauy, le lecteur qui le sçauroit connoistre. Quiconque dit de Scipion, que c'est vn gentil Capitaine et desirable citoyen, et de Socrates, vn galand homme, leur fait plus de tort, que tel qui totalement ne parle point d'eux: à cause que si l'on ne leur donne tout, quand il est question de leur attribuer des aduantages, on leur oste tout. Vous ne sçauriez loüer telles gens, en les mesurant mediocrement, ny peut estre amplement: ils passent toute mesure, i'entens mesure qui dit et retient à dire: et peut-estre qu'ils passent encores celle qui ne retient rien. C'est à moy de cotter combien i'ay veu peu de cerueaux capables de mettre cét ouurage à iuste prix: moy certes qui ne l'y mets aussi qu'imbecilement. Nos gens pensent bien sauuer l'honneur de leur iugement, quand ils luy donnent ce gentil eloge: c'est vn gentil liure: ou, c'est vn bel ouurage: vn enfant de huict années en diroit bien autant. Apres tout ie leur demande, par où et iusques où beau? quels raisonnemens, quelle force, quels argumens des anciens luy font honte; et veux finalement qu'ils me notent, que c'est que vous y pouuez surprendre, que Plutarque et gens de sa marque, n'eussent pris plaisir d'escrire s'ils s'y fussent rencontrez? quel iugement s'est oncques osé si pleinement esprouuer? s'est offert si nud? nous a laissé si peu que douter de sa profondeur, et que desirer de luy? ie laisse à part sa grace et son elegance. Au surplus ie ne daignerois pas loüer les essais, d'estre du tout à leur autheur; si plusieurs mesmes des liures anciens et fameux, n'estoient pour la pluspart dérobez. I'auoue qu'il a fait des emprunts: mais ils ne sont pas si frequens qu'ils puissent vsurper la proprieté de son oeuure, comme il nous aduertit. Et ceux qui pensent auoir appris de la bouche de son liure mesme, qu'il est basty des despoüilles de Plutarque et de Seneque; trouueroient s'ils auoient tourné feüillet, qu'il entend que ces deux autheurs l'assistent, non pas qu'ils le couurent. A quoy nous deuons adjoûter, que les emprunts sont si dextrement adaptez, que le benefice de l'application, ou maintefois quelque enrichissement dont il les rehausse de son cru, contrepesant ordinairement le benefice de l'inuention. Et qui plus est, ce qui necessairement se fait reconnoistre pour sien, ne doit rien au meilleur du reste: sur tout où la solide vigueur des conceptions et le iugement font leur ieu. Ceux qui ne connoistroient pas d'ailleurs cette vertu de nostre liure, d'estre entierement fils de son pere, sentent au genie, enfonçant sa lecture, qu'il est tout d'vne main. Mais quiconque veut sçauoir ce que c'est, de sentir au genie d'vn liure qu'il est tout d'vne main, l'apprenne par contrelustre aux escrits de Charron, perpetuel copiste de cettuy-cy, reserué les litences où il s'emporte par fois: si bon on mauuais copiste pourtant encore, hors de là mesme, ie croy l'auoir assez exprimé.

Adjoûtons, que cette égale et plaisante beauté de ce liure, son nouuel air, son intention et sa forme inconnuës iusques à nos iours, expriment assez, que quiconque l'ait escrit, l'a conceu. Nouuel air, dis-je; car vous le voyez d'vn particulier et special dessein, scrutateur vniuersel de l'homme interieur, et de plus, correcteur et fleau continu des erreurs communes. Ses compagnons enseignent la sagesse, il desenseigne la sottise; et a bien eu raison, de vouloir vuider l'ordure hors du vase, auant que d'y verser l'eau de naffe. Les autres discourent sur les choses; cettuy-cy sur le discours mesme, autant que sur elles. Ceux-là sont l'estude du Physicien, du Metaphysicien, du Dialecticien, du Mathematicien, ainsi du reste; cettuy-cy, l'estude de l'homme. Il esuente cent mines nouuelles, mais combien difficilement esuentables? Dauantage, il a cela de propre à luy, que vous diriez qu'il ait espuisé les sources du iugement, et qu'il ait tant iugé, qu'il ne reste plus que iuger apres. Et me semble qu'il ait encores quelque chose de nouueau et de peculier, en delices et floriditez perpetuelles. Comme aussi l'a-t'il en excellence et delicatesse dont il applique non seulement ses emprunts, desquels ie viens de parler, mais encore ses allegations et ses exemples; en sorte qu'autant d'applications ce sont presque autant de belles inuentions; loüange au demeurant qu'on peut estendre à la pluspart des coustures, de la tissure, et du bastiment de ses discours et de son langage.

Combien nous diront heureux les grandes ames qui naistront apres nous, de ce que la fortune nous ait produits en vne saison, ou nous ayons pû pratiquer la communication et la bien-veillance de celuy qui nous a porté ce beau fruict? et combien regretteront-elles, qu'elle leur ait dénié ce bien? Les grands esprits sont desireux outre mesure, de rencontrer leurs semblables; la conference et la societé leur estant plus necessaires et desirables qu'à tous autres, et ne se pouuans edifier ou rencontrer bien à poinct que de pareil à pareil. Or nous auons escrit vn mot de ce sujet en autre lieu; tant pour la merite de la chose, que pour le respect d'vn autheur qui a parlé si noblement et si precieusement, s'il se peut dire, de ces dons celestes, sous le tiltre de l'amitié.

Au surplus, l'opinion qu'ont euë les imprimeurs, que la table des matieres pourroit enrichir la vente des Essais, est cause qu'ils l'y ont plantée: contre mon aduis neantmoins; parce qu'vn Ouurage si plain et si pressé n'en peut souffrir. Autant suis-ie contraire à cette vie de l'autheur, qu'ils ont logée en teste, estant complette dans le volume. Quant aux noms des autheurs citez, qui se voyent icy, ou pourront voir encores, en quelques impressions; i'ay reueu et confronté sur leur texte, tous ceux qu'vn inconnu y auoit appliquez; retenu les vrais, rejetté les faux, augmentant ces veritables d'vne moitié. Si bien qu'il ne reste pour ce regard, qu'enuiron cinquante vuides, ou noms à remplir, en ce plantureux nombre de prés de douze cens passages. C'estoit pourtant vne assez espineuse difficulté, que de trouuer la source d'vne bonne partie des authoritez de ce liure; l'autheur en ayant par fois mesle deux ou trois ensemble, par fois donné tour de main de sa façon à quelqu'autre, qui les rend de plus obscure recherche. Quoy que ce soit, ie ne me fusse iamais demeslée de leur queste, si des personnes d'honneur et doctes que i'ay nommées autre part, ne m'eussent presté la main. Apres tout, ie reconnois que cette recherche et ces cottes d'autheurs, eussent esté negligées par mon pere; et moy-mesme ne me fusse pas mise en peine de couure apres: mais trois raisons m'ont forcée de les entreprendre: en premier lieu, cét aduancement de prés de moitié: secondement, la bestise d'vne part du monde, qui croit beaucoup mieux la verité sous la barbe chenuë des vieux siecles, et sous vne nom d'antique et pompeuse vogue: tiercement, l'interest et priere des imprimeurs. Leur mesme priere expresse m'a contrainte, non pas de changer, oüy bien de rendre seulement moins frequens en ce liure, trois ou quatre mots à trauers champ, et de ranger la syntaxe d'autant de clauses: ces mots sans nulle consequence, comme aduerbes ou particules, qui leur sembloient vn peu reuesches au goust de quelques doüillets du siecle: et ces clauses sans aucune mutation de sens, mais seulement peut leur oster certaine dureté ou obscurité, qui sembloient naistre à l'aduenture de quelque ancienne erreur d'impression, ou au pis aller de ce genereux mépris de telles niaiseries, que leur ouurier affectoit. Ie ne suis pas si inconsideré ou si sacrilege, que de toucher en plus forts termes que ceux-là, ny à mot ny à phrase d'vn si precieux ouurage: edifié d'ailleurs de telle sorte, que les mots et la matiere sont consubstantiels. Si quelqu'vn prend la peine d'en faire vne confrontation sur le vieil et bon exemplaire in folio, il pourra dire quelle a esté ma religion en cela. Cependant il n'appartiendroit iamais à nul apres moy, d'y mettre la main à mesme intention, d'autant que nul n'y apporteroit, ny mesme reuerence ou reteuë, ny mesme gdueu de l'autheur, ny mesme zele, ny peut-estre vne si particuliere cognoissance du liure. En ce seul poinct ay-ie esté hardie, de retrancher quelque chose d'vn passage qui me regarde: à l'exemple de celuy qui mit sa belle maison par terre, afin d'y mettre auec elle l'enuie qu'on luy en portoit. Ioint que ie veux démentir maintenant et pour l'aduenir, par cette voye, ceux qui croyent, que si ce liure me touoit moins, ie le cherirois et seruirois moins aussi.

Les imprimeurs m'ont encore pressée de tourner les passages latins des essais, sur le desir qu'ils pretendent, que plusieurs ignorans de ce langage, ont de les entendre. Ce desir est assez crud: veu qu'vn lecteur qui connoist ces passages-là, n'est pas plus prest de démesler bien à poinct l'ouurage auquel ils sont enchassez, que celuy qui ne les connoist pas, s'il n'est d'autre part ferré à glace. Neantmoins afin de seruir à l'vtilité des mesmes imprimeurs ou libraires, ie me suis portée à les traduire. Si i'ay rendu la poësie comme l'oraison, sous le seul genre de la prose, pour estre plus fidelle traductrice, à l'exemple d'autres versions authorisées de nostre siecle; on peut dire, que i'ay esté soûlagée de temps, non de solicitude aigue: la moins espineuse et scabreuse circonstance d'vne telle version estant de la representer en vers. Ie le dis, parce que cette masse, ou plûtost nuée et moisson d'autheurs latins, est la cresme et la fleur choisie à dessein, comme on void, de l'ouurage des plus excellens escriuains, et plus elegans et riches de langage comme d'inuention: adjoûtons, figurez et succincts. Or d'exprimer la conception d'vn grand ouurier, estoffée de telles qualitez d'elocution, et l'exprimer en vne langue inferieure auec quelque grace, vigueur et brifueté, qui d'vn pertinent traducteur, ce n'est pas leger effort. Mais combien plus est-ce, d'exprimer pres de douze cens passages de ce qualibre, amples, mediocres ou petits? Or nonobstant ma prose generale, ie n'ay pas laissé de rendre en vn ou deux vers, les brefues sentences, ou autres traicts d'eslite, i'entends ceux des poëtes: tant pour n'estre astrainte par aucune religion, à renoncer ce priuilege de passer de la prose aux vers, que parce qu'ils sont plus faciles à retenir qu'elle. Et si la rithme de telles sentences est par fois diuerse, n'importe à l'oreille, puis qu'elle ne passe point le nombre de deux. I'ay tourné d'autre part en vers, quelques passages d'estenduë, vn autre à l'entrée du liure, d'autres au chap. Sur des vers de Virgile: tant par esbat, que pour piquer si ie puis quelqu'vn par exemple à faire le mesme du reste. I'ay traduit les Grecs aussi, sauf deux ou trois que l'autheur a traduits luy-mesme, les inserent en son texte. Ny ne presente point d'excuse d'auoir laissé dormir iés libertins, sous le voile de leur langue estrangere, ou d'auoir tors le nez à quelque mot fripon de l'vn d'entr'eux: si ce mot a esté le seul qui me pust empescher d'en faire present au lecteur. Aussi peu m'excuseray-ie, d'auoir au besoin vsé de locutions vn peu hardies pour la prose: y estant forcée par la nature de vers qu'elle exposoit. Au surplus, en deux ou trois lieux seulement; ie me suis donné liberté d'vn mot de paraphrase: iugeant la lumiere necessaire en cét endroit, pour leuer au foible lecteur l'occasion de supposer vne pathologie. Comme aux lieux, (qui sont courts de nombre pourtant) où ie l'ay iugé plus en train d'ignorer et de chercher, que de supposer; ie me suis restrainte dans les loix d'vne austere traductrice. I'adjoûteray sur le latin des Essais; que si par fois on trouue quelque dissonance entre le texte originaire et luy, comme de temps, personnes, et autres legeres circonstances; on le doit attribuer non à l'inaduertance, mais au dessein et ménagement de l'autheur, qui par ce tour de souplesse se l'est approprié: comme il s'est approprié certains passages, à sens tout diuers, et par fois opposite de leur intention natale, par vne excellente application. C'a esté certes vne de mes peines, me trouuant sur quelque passage contourné ou frelaté, de l'exprimer en telle sorte, qu'il quadrast sortablement s'il estoit possible, à la composition originaire et à l'application. Enfins s'il se trouue quelque faute en mon ouurage, i'espere qu'elle sera faute, non de circonspection, mais bien de connoistre les menus suffrages du Donat, ausquels ie suis peu versé, pour auoir appris cette langue plustost, afin de gouster son genie et celuy de ses grands autheurs, que sa grammaire: ainsi i'espere qu'vn Lecteur habile homme, prendra la peine de m'aduertir plutost que de me quereller.

Excuse, Lecteur, les fautes d'impression qui nous peuuent estre eschapées; ceux qui sçauent ce que c'est d'imprimer, te diront, qu'il est si difficile de s'empescher de broncher à ce pas, que le meilleur ouurage de la presse n'est autre chose que le moins défaillant de cette part, comme est certes cettuy-cy: duquel apres tout, nous auons pris la peine de corriger la pluspart des erreurs auec la plume, et recueilly en vn Errata bien exact le reste de celles qui peuuent importer. Au contraire pourtant du dessein assez ordinaire, de ceux qui font imprimer pour autruy, lesquels fuyent d'en appliquer aux liures: doutant qu'ils ayment mieux que la reputation de la suffisance d'vn autheur demeure fort blessée, que si celle de leur vigilance l'estoit vn peu. Passe legerement les moindres fautes: comme par fois quelques ponctuations, soit au François ou au Latin, et par fois encores quelque manque d'orthographe, vn affaire, pour vn à faire, conte pour comte, cœur pour chœur, et les manquemens de pareil air ou de la façon d'orthographier du temps que le Liure fut premierement imprimé. Si ton esprit est digne de sa lecture, tu les sçauras bien r'habiller: et ie pense que tu croiras bien qu'aussi eussions-nous fait, si nous les eussions apperceues auant qu'elles eschapassent. Or de peur qu'il n'en reste quelqu'vne, apres ma recherche precedente; ie te promets de la repeter encores, et d'en mettre apres vn Exemplaire en la Bibliotheque du Roy, et l'autre en celle de Monseigneur le Garde des Sceaux, corrigez des derniers traits de ma plume: afin que la posterité y puisse auoir recours au besoin. I'ose dire que la connoissance toute particuliere que i'ay de cét ouurage, merite que la mesme posterité s'oblige de mes soins, et s'y fie. Que si quelqu'vn accusoit tant de menus soins comme poinctilieux, i'estime au contraire, qu'ils ne le peuuent estre assez, sur l'ouurage d'vn esprit de si haute sagesse, que ses fautes pourroient seruir d'exemple, si nous permettions qu'il en eschapast icy. Pour les accents du Grec, ie n'y entends rien: et cela n'importe guere à ce liure, qui n'en couche que fort peu: ny telle ignorance à moy, si i'en suis creue. Quant aux cottes des autheurs en marge, on ne s'est pas tousiours amuse à obseruer toutes les particules de la syntaxe, vn de, un apud, &c., tant pour estrecir le champ des fautes au compositeurs, que parce que chacun entend ces choses à demy mot.

Remercie au reste de cette impression les Grands de la France, desquels ma gratitude a tellement fait sonner le nom par tout, qu'il n'est pas besoin de le repetir icy: car sans leurs dons, mon zele de te rendre ce digne seruice en mourant, restoit inutile. Les libraires et imprimeurs, que ie sollicite il y a sept ou huict ans par tout de l'entreprendre eux-mesmes, comme on sçait, estoient sourds quand ie leur proposois mes precautions, quoy qu'elles ne consistassent seulement qu'à les obliger d'apporter à leur ouurage vne iuste correction. Deux raisons causoient ce refus: la premiere, c'est, qu'ils veulent communement tout prendre, et ne rien mettre: la seconde que ce liure est en verité d'vne correction tres-particulierement difficile; dont la brefueté du langage, et son bastiment aussi nouueau, qu'admirable, sont causes; en sorte qu'vn compositeur et vn correcteur ordinaire, y perdent leur ourse. Outre qu'il arriue souuent, que ces libraires et imprimeurs n'y mettent point de correcteur du tout, s'ils n'y employent par forme les premiers ignorans, qu'ils trouuent à bon marché. En effet la seule correction de cette impression m'a autant cousté, qu'vne de leurs impressions entiere leur couste, sans compter ma propre peine et mon soin; et si ie tiens en cela ma dépense pour bien employée: Sçache donc, Lecteur amoreux de ce diuin ouurage, que les seules impressions de l'Angelier, depuis la mort de l'autheur, t'en peuuent mettre en possession; notamment celle in folio, dont ie vis toutes les espreuues; et celle-cy sa sœur germaine. Si tu prends soin de confronter toutes les autres, en quelques lieux et volumes qu'elles se soient faites, ou se fassent à l'aduenir, par la seule entreprise des mesmes imprimeurs ou libraires, contre ces deux; tu pourras connoistre si ie dis vray; et en conceuras autant d'horreur que moy, si la fortune ne fait vn miracle pour les suiuantes, qu'elles n'a iamais fait pour les precedentes. I'acheuois cecy à Paris en Iuin mil six cens trente cinq.

PREFACE TO THE EDITION OF THE ESSAYS, 1635.

II.

PASQUIER.

Vous desirez sçavoir de moi quel jugement je fays des Essais du feu Seigneur de Montaigne, amy commun de nous deux quand il vivoit. Je le vous diray en un mot. Rien ne me desplaist en iceux, encore que tout ne m'y plaisé. Il étoit personnage hardy, qui se croyoit et comme tel se laissoit aysement emporter à la beauté de son esprit. Tellement que par ses escrits il prenoit plaisir de desplaire plaisamment. De là vient que vous trouverez en luy plusieurs chapitres, dont le chef ne se rapporté aucunement à tout le demeurant du corps, fors aux pieds; je veux dire au dix ou douze lignes dernieres du chapitre, ou en peu de paroles, vers un autre endroit; et neantmoins le chapitre sera quelquefois de douze feuillets et plus. Tels trouverez-vous ceux dont les titres sont: l'histoire de Spurina; des Coches; de la Vanité; de la Physiognomie; de la Resemblance des enfans à leurs Peres; des Boyteux; et surtout, celui des Vers de Virgile, qu'il pouvoit à meilleur compte intituler, Coeq à l'asne; pour s'etre donné pleine liberté de santer d'un propos à autre, ainsi que le vent de son esprit donnoit le vol à son plume. Tout de ceste mesme façon s'est il dispensé plusieurs fois d'user de mots inaccoustumez, ausquels, si je ne m'abuse, malaisément vaillera-il vogue; gendarmer pour braver; abrier pour mettre à l'abry; silence parlier; reduit en enfantillage, pour ce que nous disons, au rang d'enfance; asture, pour à cette heure; et autres de mesme trempe: pour le moins, ne voy-je point que jusques à huy ils soient tombez en commun usage; et surtout, je n'ay sceu jamais entendre ce qu'il vouloit dire par ce mot diversion, sur le modelle duquel toutefois il nous a servy d'un bien long chapitre. Mais quoy? je vous respondray à tout ce que dessus pour luy (car je veux, estre son advocat; et m'asseure que s'il vivoit, je ne serois par luy desadvoué). Prenez de luy ce qui est bon, sans vous attacher à aucune courtizance; ne jettez point l'œil sur le titre, ains sur son discours; il vous apporte assez de matière pour vous contenter. C'est en quoy il s'est voulu de propos deliberé moquer de nous, et paraventure de luy mesme par une liberté particuliere que estoit née avec luy. Il n'y a chapitre plus long que celuy qu'il intitule, l'Apologie de Raimond Sebond, n'y auquel il se doit donné si ample carriere; car il contient 80 feuillets. Sebond estoit à nous auparavant incogneu; et neantmoins la moindre partie est de cest Espaignol, tout le demeurant est de nostre Montaigne; car mesmes, comme il ne s'oublie jamais, il nous a fait expresse mention de l'Ordre de St. Michel, dont il avoit esté honoré. Il n'y avoit homme moins chiquaneur et practicien que luy; car aussi sa profession estoit toute autre: toutes fois en son chapitre des noms, il a par une forme de guet-apens, pris plaisir de faire commencer trois ou quatre clauses, par ce mot de, Item, reservé specialement à la practique. Et je ne trouve rien en tout cecy de mauvais, sinon que luy, qui sur sa prime-vere avoit fait gloire de nous braver par ces contre pointes et piaffes; toutefois en quelque endroit de son troisiesme livre, par luy composé long temps après les deux premiers, il s'en voulut aucunement excuser: chose que j'imputé à la foiblesse de son âge, qui emportoit lors à la balance, la force de son naturel.

Tout ce que j'ay ci-dessus touché fût par luy fait à dessein, ce que je diray maintenant sera autre. Nous étions luy et moy familiers et amis, par une mutuelle rencontre des Lettres, fusmes ensemblement en la ville de Blois, lors de cette fameuse Assemblée des trois Estats, de l'an 1588, dont la fin produisit tant de malheurs à la France. Et comme nous nous promenions dedans la cour du chasteau, il m'advint de luy dire, qu'il s'étoit aucunement oublié de n'avoir communiqué son œuvre à quelques siens amis, avant que de publier; d'autant que l'on y recognoissoit en plusieurs lieux, je ne scay quoy du ramage Gascon, plus aysément que Pollion n'avoit autrefois faict le Padonan de Tite-Live; chose dont il eust peu recevoir advis par un sien amy. Et comme il ne m'en voulust croire, je le menay en ma chambre où j'avois son livre, et là je luy montray plusieurs manières de parler familieres non aux Francois, ains seulement aux Gascons, un Patenostre, un debte, un couple, un rencontre, les bestes nous flatent, nous requierent, et non nous à elles; ces ouvrages sentent à l'huile et à la lampe. Et sur tout je luy montray, que je le voyois par aller le mot de jouir, du tout à l'usage de Gascoigne, et non de nostre langue Francoise; "n'y la santé que je jouy jusques à present; la lune est celle mesmes que vos ayeuls ont jouyé; l'amitie est jouyé, —à mesme qu'elle est desirée; c'est la vraye solitude, qui se peut jouyr au milieu des villes, et des cours des sois, mais elle se peut jouyr plus commodement à part; je reçois ma santé les bras ouverts, et aiguise mon goust à la jouyr. Plusieurs autres locutions luy representay-je, non seulement sur ce mot, ains sur plusieurs autres, dont je me suis proposé de vous faire icy l'inventoire, et estimoy qu'à la premiere et prochaine impression, que l'on ferait de son livre, il donneroit ordre de les corriger. Toutesfois non seulement il ne le fit; mais comme ainsi soit qu'il fust prevenu de mort, sa fille par alliance, l'a fait l'imprimer, tout de la mesme façon qu'il estoit, et nous advertit par son Epistre Liminaire, que la Dame de Montaigne le luy avoit envoyé tout tel que son mary projettoit de le remettre au jour. J'adjouteray à tout cecy, que pendant qu'il faict contenance de se desdaigner, je ne leu jamais auteur qui s'estimast tant que luy; car qui auroit rayé tous les passages qu'il a employé à parler de soy, et de sa famille, son œuvre seroit l'accourci d'un quart à bonne mesme, spécialement en son troisiesme Livre, qui semble estre une histoire de ses mœurs et actions; chose que j'attribue aucunement à la liberté de sa vieillesse, quand il le composa. Vous jugerez, par tout ce que je vous ay ci dessus deduit, que le Sieur Montaigne, après sa mort a un ennemy profez en moy, qui m'estimay pendant sa vie, bien heureux d'estre honoré de son amitié. J'a à Dieu ne plaise, j'aime, respecte, et honore sa mémoire, autant et plus que nul autre. Et quant à ses Essais (que j'appelle chefs d'œuvre) je n'ay livre entre les moins que j'aye tant caressé que celuy-la. J'y trouve tousjours quelque chose à me contenter. C'est un autre Seneque en nostre langue. A toutes ces manières de parler de Gascoigne et autres mots inusitez, que je ne puis faire passer à la monstre j'oppose une infinité de beaux traits François et hardis, une infinité de belles pointes, qui ne sont propres qu'à luy, selon l'abondance de son sens; et ne me puis encore offenser, quand il se desbonde à parler de luy, cela est dit d'un tel air, que j'y prens autant de plaisir, comme s'il parloit d'un autre. Mais surtout son livre est un vrai seminaire de belles et notables sentences, dont les unes sont de son estre; et les autres transplantées si heureusement, et d'une telle naifveté dans son fonds, qu'il est malaisé de les juger pour autres que siennes. - - - Tout son livre n'est pas proprement un parterre, ordonné de divers carreaux et bordures; ains comme une prairie diversifiée pesle-mesle et sans art de plusieurs fleurs. Vous n'y rencontrerez que sentences, les unes courtes, les autres plus longues; mais toutes en general pleines et moëlle.—LETTRE I. LIB. XVIII. A MONSIEUR PELGE, MAISTRE DES COMPTES.

JUSTUS-LIPSIUS.

MICHAELI MONTANO. BURDIGALI.

- - - NON blandiamur inter nos. Ego te talem censeo, qualem publicè descripsi uno verbo (he had called him the French Thales). Inter septem illos te referam, aut, si quid sapientius illis septem. Nam externa et polita ista doctrinarum, sermonis et linguarum ad fastum et fastidium (audi intimum meum sensum) sperno ego valde, nisi cum prudentiâ quadam et recti judicii normâ conjuncta dirigantur ad usum vitæ. Ea duo postrema in te esse vidi, et illa non deesse - - - —Epist. Cent. II. 41. (May, 1588).

MICHAELI MONTANO.

- - - cum gaudio me litteras tuas accepisse, et legisse cum voluptate. Diu est cum te novi, nec novi, à monte et scriptis, non a corpore; et admiratus sum (nihil hic vanum) rectitudinem judicii tui, eo magis fortasse quòd in plerisque simillimum id meo. Nam fateor: in Europâ non inveni, qui in his talibus sensu mecum magis consentiret. Utinam plura tibi scribere mens, aut otium! Quamquam istud fortasse, non illa; quia aversum te ab omni gloriâ video, etiam verâ. Non debebas, et habere in oculis si non æternitatem temporum, at miseriam hominum; qui talibus monitorum auxiliis omnino ducendi, fulciendi.—ID. ib., Ep. LV.

MARIÆ GORNACENSI. CAMERACUM.

- - - Homulli sumus, id est pars optima et cœlestis in terram inclusa: felices, qui liberi ab eâ et soluti. Tuus pater jam est. Nuncio tibi, si nescis; renovo, si jam scis, periisse; quid dixi? abiisse a nobis magnum illum virum, Montanum, inquam, nostrum, ad alta et æthereos illos montes. Ita scriptum ad me Burdegalis, et quia litteras tuas veteres esse video, arbitror te quoque sensum jam habere hujus plagæ. Sed quid mali factum? rideat ille nos, si sciat dolere; quem opinor in ipsâ morte hilarem eam suscepisse, et victorem etiam ejus, cum ab ipsâ vinceretur. Ivit, ibimus: - - - —ID. Ep. ad Belgas, I. 15.

DE THOU.

ANTE eum, Michael Montanus Eques haud sexagenario major vitæ ultimum diem clausit XX. Kal. Oct. in Montibus Petrocoriorum, à quibus nobili familio nomen, ita dictus, âlim in Burdigalensi senatu assessor dignissimus cum Stephano Boëtiano, quem et vivum indissolubili amicitiâ prosecutus est, et mortuum summa religione coluit. Vir libertatis ingenuæ, quam CONATUS ejus, sic enim immortalia sui ingenii monumenta indigitavit, ad omnem posteritatem testabuntur: ob prudentiam cum eruditione eximia ac animi candore conjunctam, Thales Gallicus, a Justo Lipsio cognominatus est. Burdigalæ Major, quæ dignitas primaria provinciæ proceribus, atque adeo profectis defertur, dum Venetiis esset, electus; et a Jacobo Matignone Aquitaniæ præside consiliis de rerum summâ per nos motus adhibitur; mihi, dum in ea provinciâ, in aulâ, atque adeo Lutetiæ postea cum ipso versarer, studiorum et voluntatum consensione conjunctissimus; cujus amicitiæ ac virtuti hoc grati animi sui testimonium me debere existimavi. — Historiarum, Lib. 104. Ad. an. 1592, p. 264. *Edit. BALZAC.

- - - - Nous demeusrames d'accord, que l'autheur qui veut imiter Seneque, commence partout, et finit partout. Son discours n'est pas un corps entier: c'est un corps en pièces; ce sont des membres couppez; et quoyque les parties soient proches les unes des autres, elles ne laissent pas d'estre separées. Non seulement il n'y a point de nerfs qui les joignent; il n'y a pas mesme de cordes, ou d'aiguillettes, qui les attachent ensemble; tant cest autheur est ennemi de toutes sortes de liaisons, soit de la nature, soit de l'art.

Ma pensée étoit donc, et je suis encore de mesme advis, que Montaigne sçait bien ce qu'il dit; mais sans violer le respect que luy est deu, je pense aussi qu'il ne sçait pas tousjours ce qu'il va dire. S'il a dessein d'aller en un lieu, le moindre objet que luy passé devant les yeux, le fait sortir de son chemin, pour courir après ce second objet. Mais l'importance est, qu'il s'egare plus heureusement qu'il n'alloit tout droit. Ses digressions sont très agreables et très instructives. Quand il quitte le bon, d'ordinaire il trouve le meilleur, et il est certain, qu'il ne change guères de matière, que le lecteur ne gaigne en ce changement. Il faut advouer qu'en certain endroit il porte bien haut la raison humaine; il l'esleve jusqu'où elle peut aller, soit dans la politique, soit dans la morale. Pour le jugement qu'il fait des livres et des autheurs, c'est une autre chose. Assez souvent il prend la fausse monnoye pour la bonne, et le bastard pour le legitime. Il hasarde les choses comme il les pense d'abord, au lieu de les examiner après les avoir pensées; au lieu de se desfier de sa propre cognoissance, et de s'en rapporter à son Turnebe, plustost que de s'en croire soi-mesme.

Aux autres lieux de son livre, je suis tout à fait pour sa liberté. Ce qu'il dit de ses inclinations, de tout le detail de sa vie privée, est très agréable. Je suis bien aise de cognoistre ceux que j'estime, et, s'il y a moyen, de les cognoistre tout entiers, et dans la pureté de leur naturel. Je veux les voir, s'il est possible, dans leurs plus particulieres et leurs plus secrètes actions. Il m'a donc fait grand plaisir de me faire son histoire domestique. — Dissertation Critique, 19.

- - - Celui de qui je vous parlois hier, vivoit sous le regne des Valois, et de plus il estoit Gascon. Par conséquent, il ne se peut pas que son langage ne se sente des vices de son siècle et de son pays. Il faut advouer avec tout cela que son âme estoit éloquente; qu'elle se faisoit entendre par des expressions courageuses; que dans son stile il y a des graces et des beautez au-dessus de la portée de son siècle.—Dissertation 20.

VI.

PASCAL.

Les défauts de Montaigne sont grands: il est plein de mots sales et déshonnêtes. Cela ne vaut rien. Les sentimens sur l'homicide volontaire et sur la mort, sont horribles. Il inspire une nonchalance du salut, sans crainte et sans repentir. Son livre n'étant point fait pour porter à la piété, il n'y étoit pas obligé; mais on est toujours obligé de n'en pas détourner. Quoiqu'on puisse dire, pour excuser ses sentimens trop libres sur plusieurs choses, on ne sçauroit excuser, en aucune sorte, ses sentimens tous payens sur la mort; car il faut renoncer à toute piété, si on ne veut au moins mourir chrétiennement: or il ne pense qu'à mourir lâchement et mollement partout son livre.—Pensées, ch. 28.

Le sot projet que Montaigne a eu de le peindre, et cela non pas en passant, et contre ses maximes, comme il arrive à tout le monde de faillir; mais par ses propres maximes et par un dessein, premier et principal: car de dire des sottises par hasard et par foiblesse, c'est un mal ordinaire; mais d'en dire à dessein, c'est ce qui n'est pas supportable, et d'en dire de telles que celles-là.*—Ib. ch. 29.

Ce que Montaigne a de bon, ne peut être acquis que difficilement. Ce qu'il a de mauvais, j'entends hors les mœurs, eût pu être corrigé en un moment, si on l'eût averti qu'il faisait trop d'histoires, et qu'il parloit trop de soi.—Ib. ch. 31.

EXPILLY.

A M. de Montaigne.

Que tu es admirable en ce masle langage,
Mais plus en ces raisons qui dorent tes escrits,
Capables d'enhardir les plus laches esprits,
A défier du temps l'inconstance et l'orage.
Montaigne, qui nous peins ta vie et ton courage,
En quelle antique eschole as-tu si bien appris,
De l'effroyable mort le glorieux mespris,
Que tu soutiens sans peur l'horreur de son visage.
Magnanime Stoique, en ces braves Essais,
Tes fideles tesmoins tu montres que tu scais
Fouler dessous les pieds le soin que nous devore.
Les siècles à venir chanteront à bon droit,
Montaigne par lui-mesme enseigna comme on doit
Et bien dire, et bien vivre, et bien mourir encore.

MALLEBRANCHE.

C'est la beauté, la vivacité, et l'étendue de l'imagination qui font passer pour bel esprit. Le commun des hommes estime le brillant, et non pas le solide, parceque l'on aime davantage ce qui touche les sens que ce qui intéresse la raison. Ainsi, en prenant beauté d'imagination pour beauté d'esprit, Montaigne avoit l'esprit beau, et même extraordinaire. Ses idées sont fausses, mais belles; ses expressions irrégulieres ou hardies, mais agréables; ses discours mal raisonnés, mais bien imaginez. On voit dans tout son livre un contraste d'original qui plaît infiniment: tout copiste qu'il est, il ne sent point son copiste, et son imagination forte et hardie, donne toujours le tour d'original aux choses qu'il copie. Il a enfin ce qu'il est nécessaire d'avoir pour imposer; et - - - ce n'est point en convainquant la raison qu'il se fait admirer de tant de gens, mais en leur tournant l'esprit à son avantage, par la vivacité toujours victorieuse de son imagination dominante. —Recherche de la Verité, book ii., part iii., ch. 5.

IX.

LA BRUYERE.

Deux écrivains ont blâmé Montaigne, que je ne crois pas, aussi bien qu'eux, exempt de toute sorte de blâme. Il paraît que tous deux ne l'ont estimé en nulle manière. Balzac ne pensoit pas assez pour gouter un auteur qui pense beaucoup; le père Mallebranche pense trop subtilement pour s'accommoder de pensées qui sont naturelles.—Caractères, ch. 1

NICOLE.

Montaigne me représente un homme qui, après avoir promené son esprit sur toutes les choses du monde, pour juger ce qu'il y a en elles de bien et de mal, a eu assez de lumières pour en reconnoître la sottise et la vanité.

Il a très-bien découvert le néant de la grandeur et l'inutilité des sciences; mais comme il ne connoissoit guères d'autre vie que celle-ci, il a conclu qu'il n'y avoit donc guères rien à faire qu'à tâcher de passer agréablement le petit espace qui nous est donné.—Pensées.

XI.

VOLTAIRE.

Montaigne, avant Corneille, était le seul livre qui attirât l'attention du petit nombre d'étrangers que pouvaient savoir le français; mais le style de Montaigne n'est ni pur ni correcte, ni précis, ni noble: il est énergique et familier; il exprime naïvement de grandes choses; c'est cette naïveté qui plaît; on aime à voir le caractère de l'auteur; on se plaît

* In reply to this miserable, narrow-minded pensee of Pascal's, Voltaire says:—
"Le charmant projet que Montaigne a eu de se peindre naïvement, comme il a fait! Car il a peint la nature humaine; et le pauvre projet de Nicole, de Mallebranche, et de Pascal, de decrier Montaigne!"—Lettres Philosophiques.

a se retrouver dans ce qu'il dit de lui-même, à converser, à changer de discours et d'opinion avec lui. J'entends souvent regretter le langage de Montaigne, c'est son imagination qu'il faut regretter: elle était forte et hardie; mais sa langue était bien loin de l'être.—Discours à l'Académie.

- - - - - Quelle injustice, de dire que Montaigne n'a fait que commenter les anciens! Il les cite à propos, et c'est ce les commentateurs ne font pas. Il pense, et ces messieurs ne pensent point; il appuie ses pensées de celles des grands hommes de l'antiquité; il les juge; il les combat; il converse avec eux, avec son lecteur, avec lui-même: toujours plein d'imagination, toujours peintre, et, ce que j'aime, sachant toujours douter. Je voudrais bien savoir, d'ailleurs, s'il a pris chez les anciens tout ce qu'il dit sur nos modes, sur nos usages, sur le Nouveau Monde découvert presque de son tems, sur les guerres civiles dont il était le témoin, sur le fanatisme des deux sectes qui desolaient la France?—Lettre à M. Tressan.

Montaigne, cet auteur charmant,
Tour-à-tour profonde et frivole,
Dans son château paisiblement,
Loin de tout frondeur malévole,
Doutait de tout impunément,
On se moquait très-librement
Des bavards fourrés de l'école;
Mais quand son élève Charron,
Plus retenu, plus méthodique,
De sagesse donna leçon,
Il fut près de périr, dit-on,
Par la haine théologique.
Epitre sur l'Envie.

XII.

DIDEROT.

L'IGNORANCE et l'incuriosité sont deux oreillers fort doux; mais pour les trouver tels, il faut avoir la tête aussi bien faite que Montaigne.—Pensées Philosophiques.

Je connais les dévots, ils sont prompts à prendre l'alarme - - Si je ne suis qu'un déiste et un scélérat, j'en serai quitte à bon marché. Il y a long tems qu'ils ont damné Descartes, Montaigne, Locke, et Bayle, et j'espère qu'ils en damneront bien d'autres. Je leur déclare, cependant, que je ne me pique d'être ni plus honnête homme, ni meilleur Chrétien, que la plupart de ces philosophes.—Ibid.

XIII.

DELILLE.

RICHE du fonds d'autrui, mais riche par son fonds,
Montaigne les vaut tous: dans ses brillans chapitres,
Fidèle à son caprice, infidèle à ses titres,
Il laisse errer, sans art, sa plume et son esprit,
Sait peu ce qu'il va dire, et peint tout ce qu'il dit.
Sa raison, un peu libre et souvent negligée,
N'attaque point le vice en bataille rangée;
Il combat en courant, sans dissimuler rien;
Il fait notre portrait en nous faisant le sien.
Aimant et haïssant ce qu'il hait, ce qu'il aime,
Je dis ce que d'un autre il dit si bien lui-même:
C'est lui, c'est moi. Naïf, d'un vain faste ennemi,
Il sait parler au sage, et causer en ami.
Heureux on malheureux, à la ville, en campagne,
Que son livre charmant toujours vous accompagne.
De l'Imagination, chant. vi.

XIV.

DE LA HARPE.

MONTAIGNE était sans doute un esprit d'une trempe fort superieure; ses connaissances etaient plus étendues et mieux digérées que celles de Rabelais: aussi se proposa-t-il un objet bien plus relevé et plus difficile à atteindre. Ce ne fut pas la satire des vices et des abus de son tems, attaqués déjà de tous cotés, ce fut l'homme tout entier, et tel qu'il est partout, qu'il voulut examiner en s'examinant lui-même. Il avait voyagé et beaucoup lu; mais il fondit son érudition dans sa philosophie. Après avoir écouté les anciens et les modernes, il se demanda ce qu'il en pensait; l'entretien fut assez long, et il y avait en effet, de quoi parler long-tems. Avouons d'abord les défauts: c'est par là qu'il faut commencer avec les gens qu'on aime, afin des louer en suite plus à son aise. Sa diction est incorrecte, même pour le tems, quoiqu'il ait donné à la langue des expressions et des tournures qu'elle a gardées comme de vieilles richesses; il abuse de la liberté de converser, et perd de vue le point de la question établie; il cite de mémoire, et fait des applications fausses ou forcées de plus d'un passage; il resserre trop les bornes de nos conceptions sur plusieurs objets que, depuis lui, l'experience et la réflexion n'ont pas trouvés inaccessibles. Tels sont, je crois, les reproches qu'on peut lui faire; ils sont effacés par les éloges qu'on lui doit. Comme écrivain, il a imprimé à la langue une sorte d'énergie familière qu'elle n'avait pas avant lui, et qui ne s'est point usée, par ce qu'elle tient à celle des sentimens et des pensées, et qu'elle ne s'eloigne pas, comme dans Ronsard, du génie de notre idiôme. Comme philosophe, il a peint l'homme tel qu'il est, sans l'embellir avec complaisance, et sans le defigurer avec misanthropie. Ses écrits ont un caractère de bonne foi qui leur est particulier: ce n'est pas un livre qu'on lit, c'est une conversation qu'on écoute. Il persuade d'autant plus qu'il paraît moins enseigner. Il parle souvent de lui, mais de manière à vous occuper de vous; il n'est ni vain, ni ennuyeux, ni hypocrite, trois choses très-difficiles à éviter quand on se met soi-même en scène dans ses ecrits. Il n'est jamais sec; son ame ou son caractère est partout; et qu'elle foule d'idées sur tous les sujets! Quel trésor de bon sens! Que de confidences où son histoire est aussi celle du lecteur! Heureux qui retrouvera la sienne propre dans ce chapitre sur l'amitié, qui a immortalisé le nom de l'ami de Montaigne! Ses Essais sont le livre de tous ceux qui lisent, et même de tous ceux qui ne lisent pas.—Cours de Literature.

M. GENCE.

- - - - - L'influence de ses ecrits, de ses pensées, de son style, l'a fait juger, dans l'opinion commune la plus raisonnable, philosophe sceptique, disposé à induire, de l'observation des vicissitudes et des variations de la raison humaine chez lui même et les autres, l'incertitude de nos connaissances; homme naturellement bon et sensible, de mœurs douces et faciles; gentilhomme vain à la fois et simple, parlant de soi humblement et avec estime; citoyen honnête, modéré, attaché par raison comme par devoir à son prince et à la religion de ses peres; ennemi des nouveautés tendant a subvertir l'ordre moral et civil; écrivain eloquemment énergique, et naïf, mais offrant parfois une liberté ou une familiarité d'expression qui montre l'homme presque à nu dans le moraliste aussi bien que dans le philosophe. Mais ses apologistes ou ses critiques, suivant leur esprit et leurs opinions particulières, l'ont jugé chacun diversement, en s'attachant à quelques traits exagérés ou isolés, pour le louer ou le blâmer, au préjudice de l'exactitude ou même de la bonne foi. Dans ce siècle ou l'on se pique de philosophie, Naigeon, editeur et annotateur de Montaigne, oublie la franchise libre de l'écrivain et en fait un pur déiste, en attribuant à des considérations politiques ce que l'auteur dit ouvertement de plus favorable au Christianisme, et en lui pretant des sentimens contraires dans des passages équivoques, détournés de leur véritable sens, et séparés de ce qui les entoure. D'un autre coté, l'auteur du Christianisme de Montaigne, en reunissant les passages relatifs à la religion, ou même traduits de la Theologie de Sebonde, et en exhumant, du journal du gentilhomme-voyageur, quelques actes d'une pieté non exempte de superstition, sans considérer ses écarts, la liberté de ses propos, et les traits de vanité qui accompagnaient ces memes actes, en a fait presque un chrétien religieux et dévot. Un autre écrivain, M. Biot, ne se rappelant pas les derniers momens du bon gentilhomme qui, loin de s'isoler de ses proches, s'est entouré de ses amis voisins, lui refuse la sensibilité morale, et le reconnait toutefois capable du sentiment de l'amitié. Un autre orateur, dans Un Discours couronné par l'Institut, lui accorde, avec raison, la croyance en Dieu et à la vertu; mais on peut croire qu'il entend purement ici la vertu d'Epicure, lorsqu'il met de parler de l'acte dernier de sa vie, qui rattache en définitive cette vertu à la foi chrétienne. Dans le grand siècle, Pascal applaudit à Montaigne, soumettant la raison superbe à l'autorité de la foi; mais en reconnaissant qu'il professe la religion catholique, il l'oppose à Epictète, en fait un Epicurien dans sa conduite comme dans ses écrits, et perd trop de vue, le magistrat, le citoyen, l'homme de bien. Balzac loue Montaigne que Mallebranche blâme au contraire d'avoir peint ses mœurs domestiques. Mallebranche voit surtout dans l'écrivain la hardiesse de l'esprit et de l'imagination; et Balzac, des pensées hazardées et de faux jugements. La Bruyère leur répond à tous deux, en observant que Balzac ne pensait pas assez pour goûter un auteur qui pense beaucoup, et que Mallebranche pensait trop subtilement pour s'accommoder de pensées si naturelles. Et certes, celui que Locke et J. J. Rousseau ont mis a contribution dans ce qu'ils ont écrit de plus raisonnable, sur l'Education des Enfans, n'est pas simplement un auteur doué d'esprit et d'imagination: l'écrivain qui observe et analyse si bien en lui l'homme dont il est l'historien, ne peut être taxé de donner carrière à son imagination, parce qu'en peignant l'homme moral, il anime, crée, et figure ses expressions, comme l'a fait, le célebre peintre de portraits, La Bruyère. De même, celui, qui a si bien connu et jugé les anciens qu'il avait tant cultivés, Lucrèce et Virgile, Salluste et Tacite, Plutarque et Sénèque, Cicéron et Pline, ne sauroit être traité de mauvais juge, pour avoir mis le 5e livre de l'Enéide ou il était si difficile d'être poète, au dessus des onze autres livres, jugement partagé jusqu'a un certain point par Madame Dacier et Jacques Delille; pour avoir aussi jugé plus sévèrement qu'il ne convenait, à un censeur gentilhomme, la philosophie de Cicéron et de Pline, qu'il qualifie d'ostentatrice et de parlière; pour avoir encore, dans son jugement sur les poètes français, cru voir (avec tout son siècle) revivre en quelque sorte Lucain et sa verse poétique, dans Ronsard, avant que Malherbe eût dégasconné la langue et qu'elle eût commencé à prendre une forme regulièrement polie, quoique peut-être aux dépens de son énergie. Dans le siècle de Montaigne, enfin, De Thou, et sur tout Pasquier, ses contemporains, qui ont vécu avec lui et qui ont connu l'homme, le citoyen, le philosophe, paraissaient l'avoir mieux apprécié sous ces divers rapports, et le sentiment de contemporains honnêtes et instruits, confirmé par la posterité, doit servir à fixer l'opinion sur notre philosophe, d'après les faits que nous fournit l'écrivain. — Biographie Universelle, art. MONTAIGNE.

GEORGE, MARQUIS OF HALIFAX.

THE Essays of Michael de Montaigne are justly ranked amongst miscellaneous books: for they are on various subjects, without order and connection; and the very body of the discourses has still a greater variety. This sort of confusion does not, however, hinder people of all qualities to extol these Essays above all the books that ever they read, and they make them their chief study. They think that other miscellanies of ancient and modern books are nothing but an unnecessary heap of quotations, whereas we find in this authorities to the purpose, intermixed with the author's own thoughts; which, being bold and extraordinary, are very effectual to cure men of their weakness and vanity, and induce them to seek virtue and felicity by lawful means. But, because every body is not of this opinion, we must take notice here of what is said against, and in favour of, these Essays, to know what we should believe of them; and this is the more necessary, because one meets with frequent opportunities to talk of this author, his book being almost in the hands of all people.

The enemies of Montaigne tell us that his book is so far from inspiring his readers with the love of virtue, that, on the contrary, some of his discourses being stuffed with free and licentious words, they teach them some vices of which they were ignorant, or else are the occasion that they take a pleasure in speaking thereof, and at last induce them to fall into the same. That his discourses upon several effects of nature are rather fit to divert his thoughts from true religion, than to convince them of the truth of it, and are altogether unbecoming a Christian philosopher. That notwithstanding his propositions and assertions are for the most part weak and false, yet they are very dangerous for several persons who either want learning, or have too great a bias for libertinism. That besides an indifferent knowledge of practical morals and history, which Montaigne had acquired in reading Seneca and Plutarch, having conversed with few other books, as he owns himself, he had hardly a tincture of other sciences and arts, even not of the theory of moral philosophy. That he was as ignorant in other parts of philosophy, as physic, metaphysic, and logic; which does sufficiently appear by his wrong inferences on several things. That he understood very little what we call humanity, or belles-lettres, as one may see by his unpolite style, and the confusion of his discourses, which show him a very ill grammarian, and a bad rhetorician; and as he talks positively and boldly, as the most learned men, Scaliger was used to style him a bold Ignorant. These angry gentlemen do likewise pretend that what is most admired in Montaigne is stolen from some ancient authors, and that if those quotations and the little stories he tells us about his temper and inclinations were taken out of his book, the rest would be very little or nothing at all.

This is the substance of the most material objections made against Montaigne; not to mention here several authors, who have purposely written against his opinions, as Mr. De Sillon, in his book of the Immortality of the Soul, wherein he confutes what Montaigne has alleged to prove, that brutes are capable of thinking. Chanet, in his Treatise of the Operations of the Understanding, quotes Montaigne's Essays as a work wherein judgment had no share, because, says he, every judicious man loves order, and there is nothing but confusion in that whole book.

Having thus impartially related what is urged against Montaigne, we proceed now to mention what is said in his vindication. And we might here, in the first place, make use of the long preface Mademoiselle de Gournay has prefixed to the French folio edition of his Essays, 1652, wherein she does not only give a full answer to all the objections made, or that can be made, against Montaigne, but also talks of him as of a man whose works have revived truth in his age, and which therefore she calls the quintessence of philosophy, the hellebore of man's folly, the setter at liberty of the understanding, and the judicial throne of reason. But we do not think fit to insist upon her evidence, for, notwithstanding the solid arguments her opinion is grounded upon, she may be suspected to be blindfolded with the passionate love she had for her excellent father; and, besides, we have so many great men to produce in favour of Montaigne, that we may, without any prejudice to his cause, waive the evidence of Mademoiselle de Gournay. These will tell you that, if he has handled any matters with an uncommon freedom, this is an effect of his generous temper, which was free from any base compliance; and as to his love for virtue, and his religion, they appeal to his very book itself, whereby that truth will appear, if the passages alleged to prove the contrary are examined without partiality, and not by themselves, but according to the connection they have with what precedes or follows.

I shall add, on this point, that notwithstanding several of his discourses do contain quite different things from what is promised in the titles, as Pasquier has observed, yet it does not always happen so; and when he has done it, methinks, it is rather through affectation than inadvertency, to shew that he did not intend to make a regular work. This does likewise appear by the odd, or rather fantastical, connection of his discourses, wherein from one matter he makes long digressions upon several others. No doubt but he thought that one might take the same liberty in his meditations as is assumed in common conversations, in which, though there be but two or three interlocutors, it is observed that there is such a variety in their discourses that, if they were set down in writing, it would appear that by digressions they are run away from their first subject, and that the last part of their conversation is very little answerable to the first. This I verily believe was his true intention, that he might present the world with a free and original work; for neither Chanet nor any other of his adversaries will be able to convince the world that this proceeded from want of judgment in a man of such parts as they are obliged to own in Montaigne.

He designed, also, sometimes to conceal his design in his titles; as for instance, in his third book, when having spent almost a whole chapter against physicians, it is most likely that his intention was to conceal it by entitling the same, Of the Resemblance of Children to their Parents. For this gives him an opportunity to tell us that he was afflicted with the gravel as his father was, and to discourse of the cure of several distempers, and at the same time of the uncertainty of physic, or rather of the ignorance of physicians; whence I conclude that, in this whole chapter and several others, there is rather a refined art than ignorance. It has also been objected against him that he talks of nobody else in his writings, as if he intended to propose himself as a necessary pattern to the rest of mankind, though what he says of himself is for the most part odd and fantastical. To this I answer, that any man may be an example to others, either for doing good or eschewing evil; and that Montaigne does not pretend that what he says of himself should be taken for any other thing than what really it is, having a sufficient knowledge of all human frailties, and of his own in particular.

It is somewhat surprising that Montaigne should be blamed for quoting ancient authors, when his quotations are made à propos, that is, for confirming or illustrating what he says, seeing Plutarch, and several other excellent authors, have taken the same liberty; and if it be objected that the quotations in Plutarch are taken from Greek authors, and consequently are in the same language as his, whereas Montaigne has stuffed his French book with Greek, Latin, and Italian verses; I answer that this is trifling, for if Montaigne found nothing in his own language worthy of being cited, or else if he thought that ancient or foreign writers had better treated the matter he speaks of, pray by what law is he forbidden to make use of their authority? I own that, in some places, he has translated some passages of ancient authors into French, and has so dexterously incorporated them into his work that he has in some manner made them his own; but where is the great crime in this, especially seeing he has a world of thoughts of his own, which are more sublime and excellent than what he has alleged from others?

Balzac, in his 19th Entrétien, reflects upon his language, though at the same time he excuses it. "He lived (says he) in the reign of the family of Valois, and was a Gascon by birth, and therefore it is impossible but his language must have something of the vice common to his age and country. However, we must own that his soul was eloquent, and that he expressed his thoughts in bold masculine expressions, and that his style had some beauties above what we could have expected from his age. I'll say no more on this head; and I know that it would be a sort of a miracle that a person could politely speak French in the Barbary of Quercy and Perigord. Should a man, beset with bad examples, and deprived of good ones, have courage and strength to defend himself alone against a whole nation, against his own wife, relations, and friends, who are as many enemies to the purity of the French tongue? The court was likewise as corrupted as the country, so that it was then lawful to fail, there being then no settled rules for our language; and those faults, which are more ancient than the laws themselves, are doubtless innocent. I conclude," says he, in another place, "that I have a great veneration for him, and that in my opinion he is comparable to those ancients whom we call Maximos Ingenio, Arte rudes, &c."

What Balzac says, in relation to the court of France in the days of Montaigne, is true enough, and very much to the purpose; but observe here the vanity and malice of that hypercritic, who must reflect upon Montaigne's country; as if it were impossible that any body born in Perigord or Quercy should write French as politely as he who was born within a day's journey from Montaigne. I know Balzac has written more politely than Montaigne, and that the French tongue is much indebted to him; but he, whose excellence was chiefly in the connection of words, must not for all that pretend to set up for a judge of the thoughts of Montaigne, as he rashly ventured upon in his 18th and 19th Entrétiens.

'Tis true, Montaigne has some provincial expressions, but they are few in number; and it is to be observed that several words of his, which were at first excepted against, have been since adopted by the best writers, this being the privilege of great authors to introduce new words. The French word enjoué (merry) has not been always in use, though it is now in the mouths of all the learned and polite people, and Montaigne was the first author that I know of who made use of it; and so they are obliged to him for this word, which does not only signify a merry man, but likewise expresses the very effects of mirth in his face, and chiefly upon his cheek (joues).

Those who tell us that Scaliger was used to call him a bold Ignorant, do certainly a greater injury to Scaliger than to Montaigne; for the reputation of that great man will never so far bias mankind as to make them believe that the author of a book, wherein there is so much learning, should be an ignorant fellow. Scaliger was a better judge, and as this is not to be found in any one of his works, I think one may venture to say that this calumny was contrived by some of his envious enemies, who, having not strength enough to encounter him, made use of this artifice to run down his merit with that great name.

Monsieur de Plassac, a great admirer of Montaigne, corrected his chapter of the Vanity of Words into modern French; but, as he owns it himself, it was no more Montaigne's, whose similies and proverbial expressions have a greater strength than the nice politeness of the modern French language; and, besides, Montaigne's discourse is every where full of sentences and solid reason, which do not always admit that smooth but empty way of writing so much in vogue in France.

I do not, however, design to defend Montaigne in every thing; far from it, I blame his freedom in many places, and I cannot abide that, after having discoursed of the exemplary life of a holy man, he should immediately talk as he does of cuckoldom and privy-parts, and other things of this nature, which, though perhaps tolerable in another place, cannot be suffered in this; and I wish he had left out these things, that ladies might not be put to the blush, when his Essays are found in their libraries, and that they might improve themselves by reading this excellent book, without putting their modesty to any torment, as they must needs do when they come to these places.

As for the rest, there is hardly any human book extant so fit as this to teach men what they are, and lead them insensibly to a reasonable observation of the most secret springs of their actions; and therefore it ought to be the manuale of all gentlemen, his uncommon way of teaching winning people to the practice of virtue, as much as other books fright them away from it, by the dogmatical and imperious way which they assume.

Thus we have answered all the material objections made against Montaigne; for I think the other trifles which are objected against him do not deserve to be taken notice of, and I wonder that the author of the Search after Truth should spend his time upon them in a manner so unbecoming his character. He tells us, after Balzac and some others, that Montaigne's vanity and pride are not suitable to an author and philosopher; that it was ridiculous and useless to keep a page, having hardly six thousand livres a year, and more ridiculous still to have so often mentioned it in his writings: but I may answer that it was very common in his time for gentlemen of noble extraction to keep a page, to shew their quality, though their estate could hardly afford them to keep a footman, and that the six thousand livres a-year were then more than twenty thousand now-a-days. It was likewise very much unbecoming the gravity of our famous Searcher after Truth to rail at Montaigne because he kept a clerk, when he was counsellor in the Parliament of Bordeaux, for Montaigne having exercised that noble employment but for a short time, in his youth he had no occasion to mention it, and who shall believe that he has concealed it out of vanity, he who, in the opinion of Mallebranche himself, talks of his imperfections and vices with too great a freedom? It is likewise very ungenerous and ungentlemanlike to take notice that he did not very well succeed in his mayoralty of Bordeaux; the times he lived in were very troublesome, and supposing he committed some error, which they say without any proof, what is that to the merit of his book? Balzac introduces a gentleman speaking thus to an admirer of Montaigne: "You may praise your author, if you will, more than our Cicero, but I cannot fancy that a man who governed all the world was not, at least, equal to a person who did not know how to govern Bordeaux." This may very well pass for a jest; but is it a rational way of confuting an author, to have recourse to personal reflections, or some incidents relating to his private person or quality? This is so mean that I cannot fancy Balzac could be guilty of it, and I wholly impute it to those who have published, after his death, some loose discourses on several subjects, which they have entitled his Entrétiens.

Notwithstanding these objections, Montaigne always had, and is like to have, admirers, as long as sense and reason have any credit in the world. Justus Lipsus calls him the French Thales, and Mezeray the Christian Seneca, and the incomparable Thuanus made an eulogy of him, whose testimony is sufficient to justify the memory of our author, for nobody will believe that a man of that integrity would have been so great a friend with so vicious a man as Mallebranche has represented Montaigne.—Vindication of Montaigne's Essays. Prefixed to Cotton's translation.

XVII.

DUGALD STEWART.

At the head of the French writers who contributed in the beginning of the seventeenth century, to turn the thoughts of their countrymen to subjects connected with the Philosophy of Mind, Montaigne may, I apprehend, be justly placed. Properly speaking, he belongs to a period somewhat earlier; but his tone of thinking and of writing classes him much more naturally with his successors, than with any French author who had appeared before him.

In assigning to Montaigne so distinguished a rank in the history of modern philosophy, I need scarcely say that I leave entirely out of the account what constitutes (and justly constitutes) to the generality of readers the principal charm of his Essays, the good-nature, humanity, and unaffected sensibility, which so irresistibly attach us to his character,—lending, it must be owned, but too often a fascination to his talk, when he cannot be recommended as the safest companion. Nor do I lay much stress upon the inviting frankness and vivacity with which he unbosoms himself about all his domestic habits and concerns; and which render his book so expressive a portrait, not only of the author, but of the Gascon country gentlemen, two hundred years ago. I have in view chiefly the minuteness and good faith of his details concerning his own personal qualities, both intellectual and moral. The only study which seems ever to have engaged his attention was that of man; and for this he was singularly fitted, by a rare combination of that talent for observation which belongs to men of the world, with those habits of abstracted reflection which men of the world have commonly so little disposition to cultivate. "I study myself," says he, "more than any other subject. This is my metaphysic; this my natural philosophy." He has accordingly produced a work unique in its kind; valuable, in an eminent degree, as an authentic record of many interesting facts relative to human nature, but more valuable by far, as holding up a mirror in which every individual, if he does not see his own image, will at least occasionally perceive so many traits of resemblance to it as can scarcely fail to invite his curiosity to a more careful review of himself. In this respect, Montaigne's writings may be regarded in the light of what painters call studies; in other words, of those slight sketches which were originally designed for the improvement of the artist, but which, on that account, are the more likely to be useful in developing the germs of similar endowments in others.

Without a union of these two powers (reflection and observation), the study of man can never be successfully prosecuted. It is only by retiring within ourselves that we can obtain a key to the characters of others; and it is only by observing and comparing the characters of others that we can thoroughly understand and appreciate our own.

After all, however, it may be fairly questioned, notwithstanding the scrupulous fidelity with which Montaigne has endeavoured to delineate his own portrait, if he has been sufficiently aware of the secret folds and reduplications of the human heart. That he was by no means exempted from the common delusions of self-love and self-deceit, has been fully evinced in a very acute, though somewhat uncharitable, section of the Port Royal Logic; but this consideration, so far from diminishing the value of his Essays, is one of the most instructive lessons they afford to those who, after the example of the author, may undertake the salutary, but humiliating task, of self-examination.

As Montaigne's scientific knowledge was, according to his own account, "very vague and imperfect;" and his book-learning rather sententious and gossiping than comprehensive and systematical, it would be unreasonable to expect, in his philosophical arguments, much either of depth or solidity. The sentiments he hazards are to be regarded but as the impressions of the moment; consisting chiefly of the more obvious doubts and difficulties which, on all metaphysical and moral questions, are apt to present themselves to a speculative mind, when it first attempts to dig below the surface of common opinions. In reading Montaigne, accordingly, what chiefly strikes us is not the novelty or refinement of his ideas, but the liveliness and felicity with which we see embodied in words the previous wanderings of our own imaginations. It is probably owing to this circumstance, rather than to any direct plagiarism, that his Essays appear to contain the germs of so many of the paradoxical theories which, in later times, Helvetius and others have laboured to systematize and to support with the parade of metaphysical discussion. In the mind of Montaigne the same paradoxes may be easily traced to those deceitful appearances which, in order to stimulate our faculties to their best exertions, nature seems purposely to have thrown in our way, as stumbling-blocks in the pursuit of truth; and it is only to be regretted on such occasions, for the sake of his own happiness, that his genius and temper qualified and disposed him more to start the problem than to investigate the solution.

When Montaigne touches on religion, he is in general less pleasing than on other subjects. His constitutional temper, it is probable, pre-disposed him to scepticism; but this original bias could not fail to be strengthened by the disputes, both religious and political, which, during his life-time, convulsed Europe, and more particularly his own country. On a mind like his it may be safely presumed that the writings of the reformers, and the instructions of Buchanan, were not altogether without effect; and hence, in all probability, the perpetual struggle, which he is at no pains to conceal, between the creed of his infancy, and the lights of his mature understanding. He speaks, indeed, of "reposing tranquilly on the pillow of doubt;" but this language is neither reconcileable with the general complexion of his works, nor with the most authentic accounts we have received of his dying moments. It is a maxim of his own, that, "in forming a judgment of a man's life, particular regard should be paid to his behaviour at the end of it;" to which he pathetically adds, "that the chief study of his own life was, that his latter end might be decent, calm, and silent." The fact is (if we may credit the testimony of his biographers), that, in his declining years, he exchanged his boasted pillow of doubt for the more powerful opiates prescribed by the infallible church; and that he expired in performing what his old preceptor Buchanan would not have scrupled to describe as an act of idolatry.

The scepticism of Montaigne seems to have been of a very peculiar cast, and to have had little in common with that either of Bayle or of Hume. The great aim of the two latter writers evidently was, by exposing the uncertainty of our reasonings whenever we pass the limits of sensible objects, to inspire their readers with a complete distrust of the human faculties on all moral and metaphysical topics. Montaigne, on the other hand, never thinks of forming a sect; but, yielding passively to the current of his reflections and feelings, argues, at different times, according to the varying state of his impressions and temper, on opposite sides of the same question. On all occasions he preserves an air of the most perfect sincerity; and it was to this, I presume, much more than to the superiority of his reasoning powers, that Montesquieu alluded, when he said, "In the greater part of authors I see the writer; in Montaigne I see nothing but the thinker." The radical fault of his understanding consisted in an incapacity of forming, on disputable points, those decided and fixed opinions, which can alone impart either force or consistency to intellectual character. For remedying this weakness, the religious controversies, and the civil wars recently engendered by the Reformation, were but ill calculated. The minds of the most serious men, all over Christendom, must have been then unsettled in an extraordinary degree; and where any predisposition to scepticism existed, every external circumstance must have conspired to cherish and confirm it. Of the extent to which it was carried, about the same period, in England, some judgment may be formed from the following description of a Sceptic by a writer not many years posterior to Montaigne.*

"A sceptic in religion is one that hangs in the balance with all sorts of opinions; whereof not one but stirs him, and none sways him. A man guiltier of credulity than he is taken to be; for it is out of his belief of every thing that he believes nothing. Each religion scares him from its contrary, none persuades him to itself. He would be wholly a Christian, but that he is something of an Atheist; and wholly an Atheist, but that he is partly a Christian; and a perfect Heretic, but that there are so many to distract him. He finds reason in all opinions, truth in none; indeed, the least reason perplexes him, and the best will not satisfy him. He finds doubts and scruples better than resolves them, and is always too hard for himself." If this portrait had been presented to Montaigne I have little doubt that he would have the candour to acknowledge, that he recognised in it some of the most prominent and characteristical features of his own mind.

The most elaborate, and seemingly the most serious, of all Montaigne's Essays, is his long and somewhat tedious Apology for Raimond Sebond, contained in the twelfth chapter of his second book. This author appears, from Montaigne's account, to have been a Spaniard, who professed Physic at Toulouse, towards the end of the fourteenth century, and who published a treatise, entitled Theologia Naturalis, which was put into the hands of Montaigne's father by a friend, as a useful antidote against the innovations with which Luther was then beginning to disturb the ancient faith. That, in this particular instance, the book answered the intended purpose, may be presumed from the request of old Montaigne to his son, a few days before his death, to translate it into French from the Spanish original. His request was accordingly complied with, but the execution of this filial duty seems to have produced on Montaigne's own mind very different effects from what his father had anticipated.

The principal aim of Sebond's book, according to Montaigne, is to show that "Christians are in the wrong to make human reasoning the basis of their belief, since the object of it is only conceived by faith, and by a special inspiration of the divine grace." To this doctrine Montaigne professes to yield an implicit assent; and, under the shelter of it, contrives to give free vent to all the extravagancies of scepticism. The essential distinction between the reason of man and the instincts of the lower animals, is at great length, and with no inconsiderable ingenuity, disputed; the powers of the human understanding, in all enquiries, whether physical or moral, are held up to ridicule; an universal Pyrrhonism is recommended; and we are again and again reminded that "the senses are the beginning and the end of all our knowledge." Whoever has the patience to peruse this chapter with attention, will be surprised to find in it the rudiments of a great part of the licentious philosophy of the eighteenth century; nor can he fail to remark the address with which the author avails himself of the language afterwards adopted by Bayle, Helvetius, and Hume:—"That to be a philosophical sceptic is the first step towards becoming a sound believing Christian." * * *

Charron is well known as the confidential friend of Montaigne's latter years, and as the confidential depository of his philosophical sentiments. Endowed with talents far inferior in force and originality to those of his master, he possessed, nevertheless, a much sounder and more regulated judgment; and, as his reputation, notwithstanding the liberality of some of his peculiar tenets, was high among the most respectable and conscientious divines of his own church, it is far from improbable that Montaigne committed to him the guardianship of his posthumous fame, from motives similar to those which influenced Pope in selecting Warburton as his literary executor. The discharge of this trust, however, seems to have done less good to Montaigne than harm to Charron; for while the unlimited scepticism, and the indecent levities of the former, were viewed by the zealots of those days with a smile of tenderness and indulgence, the slighter heresies of the latter were marked with a severity the most rigorous and unrelenting, that, in points of essential importance, they deviated so very little from the standard of the Catholic faith. It is not easy to guess the motives of this inconsistency; but such we find from the fact, to have been the temper of religious bigotry, or, to speak more correctly, of political religionism, in all ages of the world.

As an example of Charron's solicitude to provide an antidote against the more pernicious errors of his friend, I shall only mention his ingenious and philosophical attempt to reconcile with the moral constitution of human nature, the apparent discordancy in the judgments of different nations concerning right and wrong. His argument on this point is in substance the very same with that so well urged by Beattie, in opposition to Locke's reasonings against the existence of innate practical principles. It is difficult to say, whether, in this instance, the coincidence between Montaigne and Locke, or that between Charron and Beattie, be the more remarkable. * * * It is probably owing to the desultory and popular style of composition common to both Montaigne and Charron, that so little attention has been paid to either by those who have treated of the History of French Philosophy. To Montaigne's merits, indeed, as a lively and amusing essayist, ample justice has been done; but his influence on the subsequent habits of thinking, among his countrymen, remains still to be illustrated. He has done more, perhaps, than any other author (I am inclined to think with the most honest intentions), to introduce into men's houses (if I may borrow an expression of Cicero) what is now called the new Philosophy,—a philosophy certainly very different from that of Socrates. In the fashionable world, he has, for more than two centuries, maintained his place as the first of moralists; a circumstance easily accounted for, when we attend to the singular combination, exhibited in his writings, of a semblance of erudition, with what Mallebranche happily calls his air du monde, and air ca alier.* As for the graver and less attractive Charron, his name would probably before now have sunk into oblivion, had it not been so closely associated, by the accidental events of his life, with the more celebrated name of Montaigne.—*Enc. HAZLITT.

THE Essayists are, if not moral philosophers, moral historians, and that's better; or if they are both, they found the one character upon the other; their premises precede their conclusions, and we put faith in their testimony, for we know that it is true.

Montaigne was the first person who led the way to this kind of writing in the moderns. His great merit was that he may be said to have been the first who had the courage to say as an author what he felt as a man; and, as courage is generally the effect of conscious strength, he was, probably, led to do so by the richness, truth, and force of his own observations on books and men. He was, in the truest sense, a man of original mind; that is, he had the power of looking at things for himself, or as they really were, instead of blindly trusting to, and fondly repeating, what others told him that they were. In taking up his pen, he did not set up for a philosopher, wit, orator, or moralist; but he became all these by merely daring to tell us whatever passed through his mind, in its naked simplicity and force, that he thought any way worth communicating. He enquires what human life is, and has been, to shew what it ought to be; and, in treating of men and manners, he spoke of them as he found them, not according to pre-conceived notions and abstract dogmas; and began by teaching us what he himself was. In criticising books he did not compare them with rules and systems, but told us what he saw to like or dislike in them. He was, in a word, the first author who was not a book-maker, and who wrote, not to make converts of others to established creeds and prejudices, but to satisfy his own mind of the truth of things. In this respect we know not which to be most charmed with, the author or the man.

There is an inexpressible frankness and sincerity, as well as power, in what he writes. There is no attempt at imposition or concealment, no juggling tricks or solemn mouthing, no laboured attempts at proving himself always in the right, and everybody else in the wrong; he says what is uppermost, lays open what floats at the top, or lies at the bottom, of his mind, and deserves Pope's character of him, where he professes to

> "—— Pour out all as plain
> As downright Shippen, or as old Montaigne."

He does not converse with us like a pedagogue with his pupil, whom he wishes to make as great a blockhead as himself, but like a philosopher and friend, who has passed through life with thought and observation, and is willing to enable others to pass through it with pleasure and profit. A writer of this stamp, I confess, appears to me as much superior to a common bookworm as a library of real books is superior to a mere book-case, painted and lettered on the outside with the names of celebrated works. As he was the first to attempt this new way of writing, so the same strong natural

"Has Mr. Stewart seized the characteristic feature which gives Montaigne a place in the history of philosophy? Not certainly his philosophical discoveries, for he has made none; nor the justness of his opinions, which may be often questioned; nor the dramatic egotism with which he paints himself, and pours forth those easy boldnesses of expression, which seem to belong to a more picturesque and nervous language than modern French. These are great, but not properly philosophical, merits. But he seems to have a distinct character as a philosopher. As Machiavel was the first who discussed grave questions in a vulgar tongue, and created a philosophy of history; so Montaigne was the first conspicuous writer who, in a modern language, philosophized on the common concerns of men, and the ordinary subjects of private reflection and conversation. The degree which Nature claims in the diversity of talent, the efficacy of education, the value of the learned languages, the usages of society, the passions that actuate private life, the singular customs of different nations, are the subjects chiefly handled in his Essays. In the period from Socrates to Plutarch, such questions had been well treated before. But Montaigne was evidently the founder of popular philosophy in modern times. The grossness of his anecdotes is, no doubt, to be mainly imputed to the coarseness which still belonged to the gentry. But it may in part also be ascribed to the infancy of the art of writing in a generally spoken language. Authors had not yet discovered that the same degree of indelicacy is shocking in our own tongue, which they had long indulged without notice in their barbarous Latin; where the words, being unusual, did not seem so gross, and where they were not understood by women, whose delicacy the grossest men desire in some measure to preserve."

impulse, which prompted the undertaking, carried him to the end of his career. The same force and honesty of mind which urged him to throw off the shackles of custom and prejudice, would enable him to complete his triumph over them. He has left little for his successors to achieve in the way of just and original speculation on human life. Nearly all the thinking of the last two centuries, of that kind which the French denominate morale observatrice, is to be found in Montaigne's Essays; there is the germ, at least, and generally much more. He sowed the seed, and cleared away the rubbish, even where others have reaped the fruit, or cultivated and decorated the soil to a greater degree of nicety and perfection. There is no one to whom the old Latin adage is more applicable than to Montaigne,—"Pereant isti qui ante nostra dixerunt." There has been no new impulse given to thought since his time. Among the specimens of criticisms on authors he has given us, are those on Virgil, Ovid, and Boccacio, in the account of books which he thinks worth reading, or which he finds he can read in his old age, and which may be reckoned among the few criticisms which are worth reading at any age.—Comic Writers.

RETROSPECTIVE REVIEW.

Of those books to which we have recourse for pleasure or recreation, we have a particular fancy for a gossipping book—a collection of choice morceaux and short dissertations, in which an author gives us the cream of a diversity of subjects, without calling upon us for any rigid attention, or nice examination of his arguments. A kind of reading which resembles the very best conversation, but which is, at the same time, more artificially dressed up, and more elegantly turned. When, for instance, we have been wading through a ponderous or tedious volume, for the purposes of analysis or for the sake of a few good extracts, we return, with a keen relish, to a literary gossip with an author of this kind, whom we can take up with the certainty of being instructed and amused—the smooth current of whose thoughts we can follow without effort or constraint, and to whose guidance we abandon ourselves with a desultory, but luxurious, indifference; and whom, when we have read so much as to our humour or idleness seemeth good, we can lay down without a sense of weariness, or a feeling of dissatisfaction. And then, if his disquisitions be short, and have no sequel or dependence upon each other, we can select from the bundle such as, in length or quality, may suit our time or fancy. Truly this may be an idle, but it is a pleasant mode of reading,—and that is sufficient to recommend it. Indeed, we do not see why it should not be carried even further than for the mere purposes of relaxation and amusement. It is, without doubt, much better to pursue an agreeable road to the temple of knowledge, than to pick out the most rugged and uninviting path. The better course, it is true, calls upon us for a greater sacrifice of ease and comfort—it requires more resolution and painstaking, and we ourselves should have no objection to it, where it is inaccessible by any other means. But to select this briery path in preference to one more easy and agreeable, voluntarily to lacerate ourselves with the thorns which stick in the way, is, we cannot help thinking, a labour of supererogation—an infliction of penance for its own sake; the effect of which can only be to discourage and disgust. And one would think there are pleasures, few enough sprinkled in this pilgrimage of threescore and ten, to induce us, not inquisitively, "to make that little less." Nor can such a mode of study be called vain and unproductive, for the richest fruit grows on the sunny aspect of the hill, where nature has been busiest in scattering her May flowers and ornaments of a gay season. The countenance of wisdom is not naturally harsh and crabbed, and repulsive; if it be wrinkled, it is not with care and ill temper, but with the lines of deep thought. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and her smile is as genial and refreshing as that of young beauty, and equally invites us to be joyous and glad. She teaches us

> "To live
> The easiest way; nor, with perplexing thoughts,
> To interrupt the sweets of life, from which
> God hath bid dwell far off all anxious cares,
> And not molest us; unless we ourselves
> Seek them with wandering thoughts and notions vain."

We feel no sympathy with those authors who would do every thing by the square and compass, who would rudely snap the springs of feeling, and torture us into wisdom and virtue. It is the author who gives utterance to the promptings of the heart, who mingles human feelings with all his knowledge, that lays fast hold of our affection, and whom, above all, we love and venerate. And such a one is the lively old Gascon, Montaigne. He is, indeed, the author for a snug fire-side and an easy armed chair, and more particularly whilst (as at this moment) the rain is pattering against the window at intervals, as the gusts of wind come and go, and, with the sea's hoarse murmuring in the distance, makes harsh music, which shows that nature is somewhat out of tune. At such a time, Montaigne's self-enjoyment becomes doubly our own. His everlasting gaiety and good humour is more grateful from the contrast. - - - - - Montaigne wrote sans peur, but not sans reproche. He is not content with a little sprinkling of "salt in the lines, to make the matter savoury"—he is fond of high seasoning. It is probable, however, that what, according to our system of manners, is highly indelicate, was read by the modest of his age, by a wife or a daughter, without disgust; some of his Essays are even addressed to ladies, it may be, of exemplary lives. And, after all, manners are but the fashions of the time, and how variable they are we need no ghost from the dead to tell us. The customs of one nation or age are considered indecorous in another. Montaigne, however, acknowledges that he babbled a little more about such matters than was strictly decorous; and he informs us that, although he was so impudent on paper, he was of an extreme modesty and shame-facedness in conversation. But his object was to describe himself—what he thought, he was not ashamed to write; and he would have considered it a weakness and unmanliness to have done otherwise. - - - -

The chief subject of Montaigne's reflections and writings is the philosophy of life. How to live well and die well with him

> "Is the prime wisdom; what is more is fume,
> Or emptiness, or fond impertinence."

To achieve this, he studied deeply and accurately; he dissected and anatomized his feelings, his fears, and his hopes, nay, the slightest motions of his soul, with the coolness and unconcern of an operating surgeon. He lets us into the innermost thoughts of his heart—he spreads out before us, as in a picture, every shade and gradation of feeling. Not a phantasma flitted across his mind that he did not put down, and, having contemplated its strangeness or absurdity, he placed it to the credit or debit side of his account. "He nothing extenuates, nor sets down aught in malice." He is the most warm and candid of friends—the most open of enemies, if, indeed, he ever admitted into his heart any feeling which amounted to personal hostility. The consequence is, that nobody can read his works without becoming his intimate and approved good friend—his most familiar acquaintance. We know almost the very minute he was born; and, if he could have so far anticipated time, he would, with equal precision, have informed us of the hour of his death. Nor do we think that any thing would have given him so much pleasure as afterwards to have been able to come back to earth again, and add another volume to his Essays, that the world might still know the state of his mind.

Montaigne has been censured for his numerous quotations from classical authors, but, we think, without sufficient reason. It is true that, were a writer to give us a whole chapter of them from his common-place-book, they would be sufficiently dull and flat, and, like dried flowers, would lose nearly all their fragrance, although they might retain, in some measure, their form and colour. But where quotations from the poets are made, as they generally are by Montaigne, for the sake of illustration, and are, at once, elegant and appropriate, they contribute both to the spirit and grace of composition. - - - -

Nothing but the Essays themselves of our old confabulator can convey an adequate idea of their unrestrained vivacity, energy, and fancy, of their boldness and attractive simplicity. He says rightly that it is the only book in the world of its kind. All the world, however, may know his book in him, and him in his book, the character of each is the same. It requires more courage to tittle-tattle of a man's foibles, vanities, and little imperfections, than to expose heinous defects or wicked inclinations; as the man, who shrinks from small inconveniences, will yet rush into "the pelting, pitiless storm," with a feeling of exultation. The former is a confession of weakness, in the latter there is an audacity and semblance of manliness. For the one he might be mocked and ridiculed; for the other he would be feared and scorned, which is the more tolerable of the two. In the latter, there is a conscious power and daring, which is some sort of compensation for the risk; for the former, he runs a chance of gaining nothing but contempt. The little vanities and oddities disclosed by Montaigne are, however, accompanied by too many amiable qualities to excite any thing of this feeling. The President Bouhier says of him: "It is true that he sometimes avows his defects; but, if we pay attention to them, we shall find they are only those which philosophers, or people of fashion, are not ashamed to assume, or imperfections which turn upon indifferent things;" and Mallebranche says nearly the same thing of him. Montaigne had a natural and invincible repugnance to falsehood; and, as he assures us that he has painted himself as he was, whole and entire, it is fair to consider that he had no great vices to confess. At the same time, there are things in his book which cannot well be justified. His singular education, and early intimacy with the writers of antiquity, tinged his mind with that bold and paradoxical spirit which is so continually displayed in his discourses. He formed a strict alliance and friendship with the ancient worthies. Rome, in the time of her free and flourishing estate (for he loved her neither in her birth nor decay), became to him a passion and a feeling! He paid more homage to the dead than the living. He entered the lists more chivalrously for the defence of Pompey, or in the cause of Brutus, than of either of the religious factions which distracted his own country. These early attachments never left him, and it was with singular satisfaction that he had the honour of Roman citizenship conferred upon him, during one of his visits to Rome. The elements were strangely compounded in him—there was an odd mixture of philosophical thought and trifling speculation—of acute reasoning and inconclusiveness—of force of mind, and erratic ungoverned fancy. He was, at the same time, idle and impatient—thoughtful and gay, and by turns reflected upon and laughed at himself and all the world. Fond of travelling, he was as difficult to be removed in the first instance, as to be stopped when once in motion. Of a frank and courteous deportment, of a hospitable disposition, and an amiable temper—a despiser of ceremony, and eminently sociable—he appears to have been, in general, as sluggish in his feelings as he was cold in the constitution of his mind; but for the memory of his father he cherished a deep and lasting veneration and regard; and for his friend La Boëtie, he felt as sacred a friendship as ever had birth in the human heart. Himself hating to be obliged to any other, or by any other, than himself; he was, nevertheless, ready enough to confer an obligation, more especially if it did not call upon him for any great care or trouble, to which he had a mortal aversion. In fact, his whole study was to be careless, easy, and contented, and he made haste to seize pleasure, lest it should take wing and fly. But he was, upon the whole, a kind-hearted and amiable man, and of a large and capacious soul, superior to most of the prejudices of his age, although he doubtless had some peculiar to himself. To him, all men were compatriots—the universal tie, superior to all national ties whatever—and the relations of friendship to those of kindred. He was nice, even to superstition, in keeping his promises. Even in actions free and indifferent, if he breathed a promise, even in whispers to himself, it assumed the shape of an obligation; but if he had once made it known to others, he considered himself positively enjoined to the performance of it. It was pleasant to him, because it was voluntary—it was of his own free will and bounty.

Of his reflections, he fancied those the best which he made on horseback; and a sprightly thought never came into his head, on such an occasion, that he did not regret there was nobody to whom he could communicate it; and yet the reins of his bridle being wrongly put on, or a strap flapping against his leg, was enough to keep him out of humour for a day together. Although of a studious turn of mind, he delighted more in contemplation than reading, to which he seldom applied himself for more than an hour together; and that, when he had nothing else to do, or it may be, for the purpose of culling the flowers with which he has garnished his disquisitions; for he tells us, over and over again, that he could retain nothing in his memory for any length of time. Indeed, the treachery of this faculty is a standing subject of complaint with him; but even from this real or imaginary defect (for, considering his extraordinary familiarity with, and the use he makes of, Roman authors, it is difficult to believe it was so imperfect as he represents it), he contrives to raise up some pleasant consolations; as when he says that, from his want of memory, he less remembers the injuries he has received; and that the places he revisits, and the books he reads over again, still smile upon him with a fresh novelty. Such is the prerogative of genius—it can extract consolation from want and privation, and decks the barren wilderness with beauty.

Human nature is a wayward and variable thing, and where a man perseveres in putting down every crude and fugitive thought that occurs to him, we must expect to find that his mind has undergone changes similar to those of his body, and that what he thinks to-day he will not think to-morrow. The opinions of a mutable nature cannot be immutable. Doubts will arise, contradictions will occur, and one opinion displace another, in its turn to be deposed. Montaigne wrote without system and without classification, rambling from one subject to another, without order or connection, like the bee which now hardly settles upon one flower, and anon takes deeper draughts of another, as its taste or humour sways it. These aberrations are rather the result of design than accident; and, it is true, give a conversational ease, a reality and grace to his Essays, which engages the interest of the reader too deeply in the feelings of the author, to allow him to think any thing but that he is the most agreeable and original writer in the world. He is now a Stoic and now an Epicurean. He is carried away with every wind that blows—"accident can play what stop it pleases" upon him. He now argues on one side of the question, and now on the other, and at last leaves it without coming to a conclusion. He is too hard for himself. "He is every thing by turns, and nothing long." His book is censured in severe terms by Malleb ranche, not for what we should conceive its most objectionable passages, but for the vanity and Pyrrhonism of the author. Like most speculative men, Montaigne was fond of raising doubts against established propositions. He hinted opinions, which have since been expanded into systems. But, if he was an enemy to superstition, his scepticism did not terminate in irreligion. The strong, as well as the weak in intellect, are subject to fluctuations of opinion, especially on matters of faith. Montaigne was open to the reception of arguments, or rather, created them on all subjects; and it is not surprising that, in the religious contests which agitated his country, he should waver in the creed of his forefathers. A man may doubt the fallibility of human establishments, without being either wicked or irreligious. The force of argument depends upon a thousand accidents—the education, the experience, the associations of thought or feeling, the timidity or the fearlessness of the individual to whom they are applied. Whatever doubts, however, Montaigne might throw out, he always professed himself to be of the Roman Catholic faith, and his resolution, that as he had lived, so he would die in it; and he did die, with a full blossoming reputation, after leading a life (with the exception of the disorder with which he was in his latter years afflicted) the most joyous, felicitous, and philosophical of the sons of men.

His talking discourses are inexpressibly taking and agreeable. With a singular power of self-investigation, and an acute observation of the actions of men, which he discriminated with "a learned spirit of human dealing," he combined great affluence of thought and excursiveness of fancy. He was, at once, bold and trifling—philosophical and inconclusive—bold in imagination and free in enquiry—of an open and prepossessing demeanour, he was amiable and eminently attractive. His style is bold, energetic, sententious, and abrupt; and, although provincial and unrefined, it is original, vivacious, simple, and debonair.—Retrospective Review, 1820.

WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THERE is a passage in the "Tempest," well known to contain several expressions identical with those of Florio in his translation of a part of one of the Essays. And it would, at all events, have been highly improbable that Shakspere should not have read them. On the whole, the celebrated soliloquy in "Hamlet" presents a more characteristic and expressive resemblance to much of Montaigne's writings than any other portion of the plays of the great dramatist which we at present remember; though it would doubtless be easy to trace many apparent transferences from the Frenchman into the Englishman's works, as both were keen and many-sided observers in the same age, and neighbouring countries. But "Hamlet" was in those days no popular type of character; nor were Montaigne's views and tone familiar to men till he had himself made them so. Now the Prince of Denmark is very nearly a Montaigne, lifted to a higher eminence, and agitated by more striking circumstances and a severer destiny, and altogether a somewhat more passionate structure of man. It is not, however, very wonderful that "Hamlet," who was but a part of Shakspere, should exhibit to us more than the whole of Montaigne, and the external facts appear to contradict any notion of a French ancestry for the Dane, as the play is said to have been produced in 1600, and the translation of the "Essays" not for three years later.

However this may be, it is interesting to find any points of analogy between a poetical creation, probably the most subtle and profound of Shakspere, and a living man actually co-existent with the poet, and who must doubtless often have been in Paris men whom Shakspere conversed with but a few days afterwards in London. They had the same busy and fervid world around them, listened to the same tales of Eastern travel and American adventure, and all the great public events and personages in the fore-ground of the picture seen by one, were respectively conspicuous in the back-ground gazed at by the other. Very ordinary men, nay, inanimate things derive an interest, from our certainty that they were contemporary with those whom the world cannot, if it would, forget. The celebrated and productive minds, whose lives flowed on through the same days of storm and sunshine, seem each to reflect a light upon the other; and the group starts forward into distinctness and vividness, while the single figure might have seemed dim, cold, and stiff, as the recumbent effigy in a twilight chapel. - - - - - - -

It is probably the great canon of all biographies, and of all writings the interest of which is mainly biographical, that those are best which present the most complete picture of the lives they relate to. To some this will seem a truism; to others, a paradox. But most persons appear to judge of the value of the picture of a human life with reference to the importance of the man in the history of the world, rather than to the fullness and accuracy of the delineation. Yet it may be well maintained that the structure and growth of a man, of any man, are in themselves so grave and fruitful a reality, that, quite independently of extraordinary endowments or exploits, a true and perfect image of his inward being would be a richer and higher creation than any portrait at all less accurate of a much more remarkable mind. The object is itself so deep and immense that in contemplating any single example of it all differences of degree are lost sight of. - - - - - - -

The truly precious and instructive specimens of human nature which the past leaves us, are the men in whom we directly, and from themselves, know both what they were, and why and how they were so. And it is very remarkable that we have not this knowledge of any worthless and despicable soul. Those who have painted themselves truly, however unconsciously, are the true and ample minds. The weak and base, who have designed to do it at all, have always betaken themselves to distortion and falsehood, as persons of misshapen forms often throw themselves into unnatural and painful attitudes, to hide, as they imagine, the blemishes of their figures. On the other hand, we are minutely and abundantly informed of the mind and character of Augustine and Luther, of Dante, of Cicero, of the holy and stainless Socrates. We know Milton as he was, and with open eyes behold him luminous in his blindness. We stand behind young Goëthe, while we listen to his poetry and truth, and seem with his universal sensibility to receive the just and sharp impression from all things and men, and with his unwearied and felicitous intelligence to shape all into new and complete pictures. And far meaner and narrower as was the man, it is in this way that we grow acquainted with Montaigne when we read his "Essays;" and find that there are few of our kinsmen or friends whom we can see into so thoroughly, or with whom, though dwelling for years under one roof, we seem to live in such intimate communion.

This is a great thing. The paring of nails, the clippings of hair, the worn-out slipper of a conqueror's foot, which has kicked thousands or millions of men before it, the glove from a hand that many lips delighted to salute, though lips and fingers have long since been food for worms—these matters have for some their value. We doubt not that the peruke of Louis XIV., or the cocked-hat of Marlborough, would fetch, in any London auction-room, a price beyond Voltaire's history of the one, or Archdeacon Coxe's life of the other. Yet these memorials can suggest, even to the creative soul of a collector of curiosities, only a faint and imperfect conception of their former owners. While, in the writings of any one who, like Montaigne, has chronicled himself, we have the very man, a living human being brought before us. We are not compelled to infer the kernel from the husk, the Hercules from—not the foot, but—the sandal; to fill up for ourselves, with substantial form, the empty vestments which adumbrate their wearer. Here the inward is that which is clearest; the flame within the coloured lamp throwing its light upon and through those outward and surrounding circumstances which alone biography and history, for the most part, present to us. Hard, indeed, is the work of a biographer, who seldom gives any distinct and tenable knowledge of the hero he describes. But he always, more or less well, and more or less unconsciously, does something towards the painting himself. His mistakes and dreams as to another, are the facts of his own mind. We see him living and moving at his easel, where he may be daubing only the cloudiest caricature of some one else. That which he ostensibly writes of, is as worthless as the latter text inscribed above the faded characters of a genuine classic. While he blabs mendacious gossip about the victim of his rhetoric, he betrays the whole secret, the imperishable reality of his own character, aims, and insight. But when he writes, as did Montaigne, of himself, the dream, the delirium, the inane folly, is hardly less valuable than the earnest confession, the simple-hearted narrative of events. He may not always write truth and wisdom about his own temper, principles, and story; but the weaknesses and delusions are also his, his own, and alike contribute to embody before our eyes the one living human being.

On this topic—namely, what a man is—more books have been written than on all other matters, probably because, as far as we know, books are written by men. It lies at the root of all history, all poetry, and all that, in the highest sense of the word, is philosophy. But, indeed, more properly speaking, it is of this matter, and this alone, that all books more or less directly treat, and about this that all thoughts are occupied. For speculations, the least apparently human, are in reality based on some portion or other of man, and on this alone: those as to reptiles, which may well concern a man, himself a worm; those as to the earth we tread on, we being ourselves but dust and clay; those as to the air and stars, for what else are we but a breath, and our lives but sparks of fire in a vault of darkness? Nor can it be said that this is a fantastic abuse of metaphor. On this subject nothing properly is metaphor; for all analogies, even the wildest combinations twisted together by the fancy, have their one root in the unity of our consciousness. And in all we seek to know, our aim is only to discover what there is in the thing corresponding to somewhat in ourselves. Thus we discern it; thus we master it; make it our own; truly know it. That in an object which answers to, or dovetails with, ourselves, is what we really mean by the object. And manifestly so; for if there be aught in it which meets and assimilates with nothing in us, of that something, that algebraic x, never to be discovered, we cannot speak, or think, or dream. Not only do we not know it, but we never can know it. In this largest, but also most true sense then, it is certain that all books relate to man, and only to man; yet some to that which is more essential and characteristic in us, some to that which is less. Of some the ground and element lies nearer to our affections, and will, and intelligence, to that which is least changeable in us, and is the frame-work and support of all the rest; others to that which we cannot but regard as more outward and superficial. Some treat of man in his inmost life, beliefs, feelings, purposes, and successes; others more of the material world, which is also, but more remotely, his—his colossal hut, and inexhaustible mine, and insatiable catacomb. In one way or other the strongest and most cutting thoughts of man—since the beginning of his current almanac and present calendar some five thousand years ago—have been exercised and expended in shaping out for himself a clearer and clearer image of himself, both as he finds himself immediately within, and as he recognizes his own obscure likeness in the canvass of nature, bordered with its frame of time and space, the carvings of which are also one endless intertexture of human resemblances. Much of the work of becoming what we may be, consists in knowing what we are; and we should go mad, and rot in preternatural idleness, if we had not the task of gradually finding ourselves expressed in the universe, and the universe impressed upon ourselves, and of more and more realizing this correspondence outwardly by action, whence arts and trades, and journeys, and ships, and harvests; and inwardly by thought and love, from which arise religions, poetry, sciences, all heroism and goodness.

Of the books that show us what we are, there have been in many ages better than the "Essays" of Montaigne; but it may be affirmed, without meaning to offend any one, that, even in our age, there are several worse. His book is not the widest nor the deepest; but it is a perfectly genuine record of a far livelier, and richer, and more honest mind than common. There are oracles of loftier and more fiery spirits, belonging less than this to our time and tendencies; and though immortal as death itself, which will outlive all but life, yet not more deserving of immortality than these doubts, fancies, endless egotisms, of a dead old Gascon gentleman.

Such he was. He acquaints us with man chiefly by exhibiting to us a man, the offspring of one age, and the native of a single spot; and we must consider what these circumstances made him, that we may the better understand what in himself he was. He belonged, in a word, to the most active portion of the human race, in the most eager and productive period that it has known, at least since it first contrived to shape itself into social existence. Printing, like the former and latter rain, was diffusing the knowledge long collected in the vague and dim clouds of the past. Columbus had burst the gates of the Atlantic, and shewn to men a new heaven and a new earth, and other forms of human nature than those of our elder regions. And while the new was pouring in, the old was rapidly crumbling down and passing away. More connection and interdependence was growing up in all the concerns of life. Individual strength and wild energy were settling down. The solid vault of dogma under which men lived was thinning off, and widening, and wavering; and while a new and bright vegetation of literature opened over the earth, the ancient snows and ice-rocks of tradition melted and burst along in foaming torrents. Together with these changes, a looser width of luxury and excitement was unfolded, and the sweeter wines of the new age were mingled with deadlier poisons. In Germany, misery and fanaticism, and heroic faith; in Italy, unbounded falsehood and creative genius; in England, lawless brutality and popular zeal; in France, all these elements were mixed together. During the first half of the sixteenth century the Reformation began and was secured; More and Cranmer were executed; Luther lived and died; Rabelais stood forth as a fervid genius in the mask of a buffoon; Raffaelle, Durer, and Michael Angelo painted themselves for ever on the most massive tablets of the mind of man; Ariosto embalmed chivalry in a gorgeous tomb; Fiesco conspired; Machiavelli theorized; Melancthon and Scaliger taught; Cortez and Pizarro passed, like its own earthquakes, through America; the feudal greatness of French nobility blazed almost its last; France, Germany, and Italy, wore each other out in idle wars. In the midst of these confusions, Calvin was condemned by Rome as a heretic, for establishing the power which enabled him to burn Servetus. Rome was sacked by an army of adventurers, and Trent filled with a council of Romish prelates. Faith, energizing in Luther, threw off its cowl, and his emperor, unable to compel him to wear it, placed it on his own head and sank into a convent. The world was learning that Homer, Socrates, and Plutarch were more than names, and growing to feel what they really meant. And while Montaigne was drinking deepest of their spirit, the Protestants of Mérindol and Cabières were massacred, and in Guyenne, at his own threshold, the peasantry were maddened into revolt by the Gabelle (1548), and were crushed again under the heaviest sorrows.

In fine, the state of society in Western Europe resembled at this time that of a party of mariners saving themselves on a raft constructed out of the wreck of their former stately but worn-out vessel. With woes, and panic cries, and bleeding hands, and fierce contentions, and the deaths of many, they constructed a frail support amid the stormy waves; but the ruin of the ship has laid open to them precious treasures and priceless instruments, long seated up and forgotten, within the hold; new necessities develop more complete inventions: the strong call of the hour awakens fresh life in many a heart, before weak and torpid; and on their creaking and wave-washed deck they sail before the wind in greater terrors, but with happier auspices, than before.

In the midst of this revolution, Montaigne, born in 1553, rose to consciousness. In the course of his life he saw the world around him all convulsed with the fiercest religious wars, the massacre of St. Bartholomew perpetrated, the Dutch republic created. He was contemporary with Cervantes and with Shakspere. Seldom has there been on earth a broader scene of apparent confusion; but, in the midst of the storm, far nobler and more various powers were at work than in the downfall of the Roman empire, or the conflicts of the middle ages. Much of household simplicity was perishing; popular fancy and feeling were losing much of their unconscious beauty; the rude and slow machinery of political society was breaking and crushing down; above all, the old unquestionable beliefs of men were inwardly decaying, and were shaken and tottering under outward attacks. The fierce horrors, base frauds, and lascivious indulgences of public life, were rather multiplied and darkened than at all suppressed; yet thought and humanity were living more strongly, and generating life; and in the confused and ferocious tumult there were some who taught, and many who received the teaching, that faith in higher than visible things had a foundation of its own in the heart of man to rest on, and need not lean for ever on the hollow and spurious support of a despotic priesthood. But this last and greatest truth was preached in the midst of passions and delusions which were closely mingled with it, as the stream turned into a stagnant pool is itself stained by that which it purifies. Thus it might perhaps have been anticipated that in the awakening knowledge of a beautiful and inexhaustible pagan literature, self-satisfying speculation and easy sympathy would find abundant pretext and encouragement to shrink from the gigantic battle of austere belief and distinct principles into a world of intelligent delight. The survey of mankind, as a mere object of curious observation, both invited and bewildered the reason; and the richest and most many-coloured spectacle of human existence which the world had ever exhibited, was heightened and contrasted by a better knowledge of a remote and wonderful past.

Montaigne was the son of a Gascon country-gentleman and soldier, rather a humorist, of whom he gives the following account:

"My house has been a long time open to men of learning, and is very well known by them; for my father, who was the master of it for fifty years and more, being warmed with that zeal with which King Francis I. had newly embraced literature, and brought it into esteem, spared no pains nor expense to get an acquaintance with men of learning, treating them, at his house, as persons sacred, who had divine wisdom by some special inspiration, collecting their sentences and sayings as so many oracles, and with the more veneration and religion, as he was the less qualified to judge of them, for he had no knowledge of letters any more than his predecessors had."

In his writings the central scene of his outward life always appears to be his château, which he delights to paint as built mostly by his father, with nothing added to it by him; as the only gentleman's house in France unfortified against either party in the civil wars; and as strong and hospitable enough to shelter his poorer neighbours against the mere marauders of the time. In a tower of this building was the study and library of Montaigne, and here he describes himself as composing the book in which the description occurs, and which is almost as certain to last as the nature of man, which it so amply and minutely presents to us.

Strange that by means of a little chemical mixture, lamp-black, and so forth, on a tissue of old rags, the thoughts of a man should thus be preserved for all men. For what can seem a less suitable vehicle for a thought—consider it—a thought!—than smoke-dirt and worn filaments of flax. These then, perhaps, are in truth not that which makes the thought last; but that which lets us see that it does last, as the wire on which the insect's diamond wing is held under the glass of a microscope. Montaigne is gone to where he will have found some at least of his doubts cleared up. But for us he has left a mantle behind him, not only inscribed, as are the magic garments of romance, with many strange characters, but shewing the familiar folds and twists of the short and stout-bodied old Gascon. In that mantle we need not wrap ourselves, but we may try to peruse and measure it. Thus it remains to us as a fact that Montaigne did what no man had done before, nor has any man so well done since—in sharp, light, and with endlessly daring strokes, painted himself, as the one great certainty in a world of doubt—himself, a living being—a person—a man, bright shining, like an enchanted head—a human image of brassy flame in Rembrandt's wizard cave of blackness.

Many have shewn us man in general, and have done this better or worse, according to their several shares of manhood. But the mischief of such delineations is, that man in general is after all a fiction, for man exists only in particular. The essential forms and germs of our whole nature are stored indeed in every individual, and as the reason gradually awakens to the music of experience, a corresponding image becomes present to it of man as a single [illegible] being. But this image is always to some ex[illegible] imperfect, and yet has a tendency to allure an[illegible]en imprison our attention within itself, and shut [illegible]ut any entrances, or, if we may use the word, ingro[illegible]ths, of further knowledge. And he before whom the image floats, cloudy and pendulous, while, still, indefinite and unsteady, it draws up, like a water-spout column, new substance of reality into its own bulk, often does better service to himself and others than he who does homage to and worships a fixed idea, however noble and capacious, admitting of no growth or maturation. By the encyclopædic and interminable, as opposed to the defining, shaping process, we may well indeed become boundless, aimless, and incoherent. And so to a certain extent was Montaigne; but also rich, various, of inexhaustible yearnings after new mental treasures of comparisons and contrasts, and ever sending out his wealth possessed on new ventures of wealth to be acquired. He sits a golden gnome in his sparry cells and galleries piled with jewels; and he is their true discoverer and guardian; and though not the creative spirit with the one efficacious image of the Aladdin's palace into which the jewels shall be built, is yet akin to him, and at heart owns him as a brother.

Great again is the power of a Dante, of a Shakspere, even of a Machiavelli, a De Thou, in shewing us some shadows and surfaces of many men, some leaves of the great tree of man's life. But after all they can give us only lines and gleams; lines as of a withered leaf wasted to a skeleton lace-leaf; gleams vague as those of forests seen through mist. To know what really is or has been, there is required an insight into the thing, such as these writers possessed, but cannot give. For it cannot be given, any more than a living eye of retina and nerve can be given to a head, in the first construction of which it has been omitted. The insight must be found or won within. Beaming, seeing from the heart, into the heart it looks. Now this it is which in Montaigne we find, and the reality and meaning of which he has exemplified better than almost any one. His book, he tells us, is one about himself, and only about himself. All else, anecdote, speculation, narrative, is there only for this purpose. We have him before us in all his relations to others, in all his occupations, all his moods, and all his outward actions.

He was unquestionably a large-minded, clear, and healthy man. For almost every kind of human existence he had sympathy and love, and understood much of its scheme and tendencies, keeping himself unshaken and distinct in the midst of it. That was a rare intelligence and kindliness of heart which in his age could make a man anticipate so much of the practical wisdom of latter times—reprobating torture, and all cruel modes of capital punishment; lamenting loudly the treatment of savage nations by Europeans; seeing through all the pretexts for courtly profusion, and condemning it, although himself a courtier and holding a place, as mere reckless cruelty to the people. He also utterly disbelieved the whole train of magical wonders, ghosts, material visions, witchcraft, and such other blundering modes of representing the supernatural by distorting and interrupting nature. This view of him, founded on the unquestionable evidence of his own writings, which on these points are most uniformly consistent, seems to fall in with all the other evidence which his whole works and life, and his own open-hearted statements, furnish of his remarkable and unvarying honesty. For he who admits falsehood into his inner chambers of the heart and among his household gods, can seldom fail to have some lurking fancy of a fundamental ground of disorder and confusion as the basis of the universe, and hence almost inevitably believes in the fashionable delusions of his day, whatever they may be. Vain dream of quacks and of their dupes, that a man by being a quack loses all belief in quackery! Knowing that his own pretences are false, he has the more credulity to spare for those of others. He who passes false coin is the more, not the less, likely to be taken-in by sham jewels offered cheap, or by any other temptation suitable to his greediness and his self-complacent cunning. All swindlers are in truth, by the nature of the case, members of a joint-stock company for mutual deception. Moreover, this thorough honesty of Montaigne is hardly separable from clear sagacity combined with genuine sympathy such as his. The mirror of the true mind faithfully represented the true realities presented to it, for it was neither muffled up by a veil of selfishness, nor cracked by passion, nor painted over with a tawdry coat of ostentatious conceits and follies. Wherever no one of these things happens, and the mind is vividly awake and active, there will be accurate and stedfast knowledge of all that lies nearest to the man, and most concerns his work on earth. And this attainment we find characteristically marked and certain in Montaigne, whose judgments on public affairs, on education, on diversities of character, and on literature, are always instructive or suggestive, however imperfect.

Doubtless no allegations of wisdom on some points can meet the charges against Montaigne, of frequent inconsistencies and of fundamental scepticism. The occasional self-contradiction in a man who writes so much from the fancy of the moment, is not wonderful. But even of this there is less than might be supposed. And, indeed, if the man or his book were a mere bundle of unconnected livelinesses and sparkles of thought, either would be nearly as worthless as the dullest heap of trivialities. A man without character, and a type of thought of his own, may appear to be many things, but in reality is little more than nothing. But a oneness with many sides to it, and capable of quick revolution and transformation, is a more vital and productive thing than the stagnant and staring singleness of aims and habits which the meanest minds can understand and measure.

Of the scepticism something more must be said. That Montaigne was a sceptic, in the sense of finding all the theories he knew of, which profess to systematize the whole of human life, scanty and frail, there can be no doubt. That he was wrong in this decision no man of strong and cultivated speculative powers will now maintain. But his error seems to be that he had no faith in the reasonableness of the attempt. The philosophy known in his time was ill calculated to convert him. That of antiquity was very imperfectly understood, and, above all, had been produced under obsolete circumstances and conditions, and could no longer answer the demands of later experience. It must also be said, that he had, in truth, never passed through any really methodical course of philosophical inquiry, nor had undergone any accurate scientific discipline. The current religious opinions, which he by no means opposed, might have seemed likely to bring him in contact with a large scheme of speculative theology, constructed chiefly by the schoolmen. But this system of doctrine, whether Romanist or Protestant, was little fitted to meet the wishes of a mind like his; for under the name and sacred attributes of revelation, it admitted a cumbrous element of what was purely arbitrary and capricious. And attempting to combine this with the facts of life and the principles of mere intelligence, it produced a discordant compound, obviously unstable and inadequate. The truth is, that any philosophical scheme of the world known to him, perhaps any conceivable one, must necessarily have seemed as idle and vain as would the tissue of cobwebs on the vaults and pillars of some noble building, if offered as a sufficient diagram and explanation of the principles of its construction.

The chief document on the subject of his philosophical opinions, or rather of his opinions about philosophy, is the celebrated "Apology for Raymond de Sebond" (Essays, ii., 12). This writer had taken the sum of the current opinions of the day, and had attempted to justify them by arguments of mere speculation from the premises of human experience. A perilous and fantastic attempt, in which it would have been well had he considered that nothing can be understood and maintained, except in reference to the causes and conditions by which it has arisen. That, therefore, as the religious creed of his day had been partly the product of a tradition grounded in foreign and ancient modes of thought and feeling, partly of the metaphysical science of intermediate times, partly of accident and caprice, it would have been a miracle far greater than any of those which he vindicated, had it been found, as he asserted, in strict correspondence with the principles of universal reason, and the demands of human nature through the whole series of ages. It would have been well had he known that the existence of an absolute and eternal element in the vague and shifting mass of the common beliefs—which is all that religion requires, all that philosophy can grant—is only to be defended by the admission, or rather the declaration, that there is also in it a vesture liable to decay, and a body doomed to death. It is also unfortunate for Raymond not to have so clearly read himself, as to see that the task he had undertaken was one giving room and occasion beyond all others for the exercise of lawless ingenuity, and the mad attempt to harness and guide assumptions and sophisms in the path of truth, which admits of no such service. The work of any man, in any age, who attempts such an enterprize, must needs resemble a mirage landscape of Egypt, interspersed among, and partly reflecting, partly obscuring, granite temples and marble gods, but itself an airy, fleeting vision. Reason may well, as in mathematical science, give, after the lapse of centuries, a final decision in favour of its own slow results; or attain, at last, an insight into the laws and being of great facts, such as the system of the stars, or the moral and physical structure of man; but that it should conclusively, and for ever, be able to ratify a huge medley of feelings, speculations, and legends, such as was called in the middle ages the orthodox faith, and render these imperative through eternity—this can be credited only by a mind weakened and heated by the lust for wonder, or lost for the time in the labyrinth of its own subtlety, or, in distrust of reason, leaning, terror-stricken, on any most hopeless substitute for it.

The argument of Montaigne, however, is, for the most part, independent of the peculiar line of reasoning adopted by De Sebond. For the main purport of his Essay is not so much to justify the topics of his author, as to maintain that, however unsatisfactory these may be, human thought, without admitting the idea of a positive and outward revelation, can form no more enduring scheme. The whole matter, indeed, is probably handled only for the purpose of accumulating objections to the theories of all the philosophical schools which Montaigne knew of. In this, though always lively and striking, he is comparatively unsuccessful,—partly from ignorance of the doctrines he refers to, which he has caught at chiefly in fragments, and by way of anecdote, but still more from the want of genuine philosophical capacity. This may, perhaps, be generalized under the larger term of reason in its highest being—of the power which beholds and converses with supersensual and universal realities. These, apprehended by the intellect, are philosophic truths, or first principles; embraced, reverenced, and obeyed by the will, are laws of duty; relied on and worshipped by the heart, are objects of religion; and embodied in beautiful symbols, are the deified forms of the imagination, and haunt and spiritualize the highest poetry. Now this manifold but one power, which is nothing less or other than the spirit or life of man in its loftiest energy, Montaigne did not in any ample degree possess. Had it existed more fully in him, though he might have rejected as insufficient all actual philosophies, yet, supposing him to have remained the same in type of character, and to have made reflection—as he did make it—his chief business, he would inevitably have believed in, and prophesied, a future and more perfect philosophy, even if he had not been able to create it.

The proof that he was not remarkably under the guidance of this daimon, or genius, may perhaps be strengthened, for those who need such evidences, by the fact that, in the midst of much light and playful writing, of many comic stories and abundant wit, he displays no trace of humour, such as glorifies the much dulness, and almost transmutes the filth, of Rabelais. It is the characteristic office of humour to exhibit earnest feelings and deep thoughts, in grotesque, often in extravagant and monstrous, forms, such as outwardly contrast the most with that of which they are the vehicle, and by the sense of this opposition heighten and sharpen the effect of that which moves and lives within. It is not in any eminent degree a French faculty; and the greatest comic writers of France since Rabelais—to wit, Molière and Voltaire, both of whom in their shrewd and cunning sarcasm Montaigne somewhat resembles—hardly exhibit a trace of it.

But with this deficiency in Montaigne, and with the fact that in him, as in all, the negative side of the mind is the weak and ungenial one, it is unfair to say that there was either an entire denial of the possibility of speculative truth for man, or indifference to those who sought it. Of all authors his favourite is Plutarch, the zealous guardian of the trophies of the men of old, and burner of incense at the tombs of heroes and of sages, in whom the conviction of the triumphant efficacy of thought had the warmth of a passion as well as the clearness of an idea. Of all men the one whom he seems most thoroughly to have revered and loved is the saint, prophet, and martyr of pagan wisdom—Socrates. It may, indeed, be doubted how much he steadily understood of the greatness of the best Athenian. But it is very remarkable that, with such entire sincerity and fervour, he selected him for his full admiration and love. For Montaigne lived in an age when pompous dogmas and empty speculations were mingled with a strong and fiery, but indistinct, element of pure religious faith; when morals were to a great extent sunk in gross indulgence, corrected by harsh and glaring dashes of monkish severity; and when many men were practically and most memorably great, with little or no comprehension of the real value and tendency of their own lives. In this glittering and smoky tumult the Gascon did not pretend to offer any remedy for the evils of the time, or to be able to harmonize the piercing tones and thunders of its discords. He lived an off-hand life, and painted it with sudden and shifting colours. Yet that a deeper sense was hidden in him of a truth and adamantine system at the base of the world's confusions, and of his own levities, seems proved, not only by the impression of his works, as a whole, but by his reverential admiration of the great master of Grecian thought. Socrates, too, lived in a time when many minds were sick, struggling, and half-delirous; when the simple dignity of earlier days was no longer possible; when men had begun to think of themselves and their own nature, and sophists were teaching the comfortable lesson that all things are mere concrete falsehood, and that to live by lies, and think for gain and glory, was the noblest work of man. In an earlier time Socrates would probably have been contented to be the Solon or the Aristides of his country—a character in which some of his noblest endowments could not have been developed, and his intuition into the deepest heart of things would have slumbered: a character also of homely, unspeculative superiority, which could not have made him what he was, the greatest Fact in an age of refinements and dialectics. But the diseases of thought could only by purer and mightier thought be cured. And it was the task of Socrates to do this, not merely for his own, but for all time; and in setting forth by word and deed the reality of truth and heroic goodness, against the mere greedy appetite for pleasure, to which the sophists made their cleverness subservient, he also exhibited the freshest, liveliest, least affected image of a reasonable, generous man, that ever brightened the pagan world. Steadfast and complete was he as this round earth; abundant and living as the summer. The perennial glow and upward strivings of innumerable hearts on to this hour—the faith in the certainty of reason, the knowledge that we do not live in a heap of disorders, but in a world of intelligence and good—these we owe in a higher degree to him than to any native of this western continent. It would be hard to estimate how much of the best wisdom, and the warmest hopes that inspire the souls of all men, are owing to the poor murdered Athenian, whose life was a long assertion of conscience against quackery, and his death its triumph over the folly of the men whom he so faithfully served and loved. The silent tear in the secret chamber—the calm resolution of meditative sympathy to go and do likewise—the purpose in other hearts to live like him for duty, and not for profit or praise—these are his right and imperishable honours. But honour be there also in his smaller measure to the slight, capricious Frenchman, who among fierce sects and the breaking forth of the great deeps of opinion and of denial, who in the midst of his own follies and inconsistencies, and with no distinct or firm view of that scheme of the supersensual, in the centre of which he fretted and indulged himself, yet had honesty and warmth of soul to see in Socrates a victorious witness for the grandeur and lastingness of truth.*

Socrates was put to death on a charge of irreligion; and many words have been expended, perhaps a few wasted, on the question, whether his French eulogist is or is not liable to the same accusation. Did Montaigne believe Christianity? A compendious question, which would be clear enough to admit of an answer, if we only knew what is meant by belief, and what by Christianity. Sad is the condition of a talker in drawing-rooms, very sad that of a writer of dissertations, who attempts to answer a question before he knows the meaning of it. Man in such a case, though the highest of earthly beings, is a sight painful to mortal eyes, and which almost draw the softest tears from behind the hardest of spectacles. In the answers that have been given to the categorical demand touching the faith of Montaigne, something of this darkness is perhaps discernible. But it may safely be affirmed, that if by unbelief be meant the opinion that Christianity is, like the art of Cagliostro, or the narrative of Psalmanazar, a pure fiction, a conscious work of some one's fancy, and that it no more concerns us than judicial astrology or the oracles of augurs, which seems to have been the pithy doctrine of Hume and Voltaire, then doubtless in this way, and to this extent, Montaigne was not an unbeliever. If, on the other hand, belief is the acknowledgment that a certain set of propositions have been committed by irresistible power to the keeping of a certain caste of men, on the acquiescence in which statements, and the submission to which men, our eternal weal or woe is made dependent—with the proviso that the doctrines themselves, and the commission of the teachers, are not to be scrutinized at all, or to be in any way connected with the results of our experience or the principles of our reason—then in this sense Montaigne believed. Nay, in the bewilderment of his misunderstanding at the immensity and seeming contradictions of the universe, perhaps he even hoped that, one day or other, the puzzle of existence would find its solution in the accompanying puzzle of revelation. But if Christianity be regarded not as an arbitrary puzzle, but as a necessary mystery, that is, a truth dark to the careless and unprepared eye, but luminous, and the light of all things, to the spirit purified by love of God, and by entire self-sacrifice; as a truth founded in the nature of man, claimed by his noblest wants, manifested by the full harmony of all his powers, and by their triumph over inward and outward disturbances and desolations completely realized in the Saviour, and attainable for all by the heartfelt recognition of it in him—this is a Christianity of which Montaigne had not only no belief, but no conception. Again, if faith be not a blind and desperate clutching to an unknown somewhat, like the drowning man's grasp at any object near him, though it be the shark's jaw or the dagger of the sword-fish; if it be anything more and better than a voluntarily relinquishing of all voluntary action, under the name of obedience; if it be the affectionate and loyal adherence of the heart to the truths of reason, which the passions and selfishness tempt us to deny; then it is a power of which Montaigne had experienced but little, and which he did not at all understand. All that we find in him of Christianity would be suitable to apes and dogs rather than to rational and moral beings.

It is, however, to be desired that he should be treated with justice—if not for his sake, yet for ours. He was not, in any high, pure sense, a religious man, but he was honest, clear-sighted, and affectionate. Nothing human was for him without a meaning and a value; and he cherished, in the midst of his vanities and inconsistencies, a cheerful conviction that goodness and wisdom do, somehow or other, preside over this black and cloudy web of things. He walked, indeed, in a circle of darkness, within which his little world of life and light burnt like a lantern. But as he moved along, the darkness kindled round him, and shewed itself to be but a dormant light. For human existence was to him itself a lucid thing, often broken, indeed, and wavering, but still bright and radiant. To him it was joy and hope to live our common life; and the healthy freshness and vigour of all his emotions and perceptions required no aid of creative imagination or brooding reflection to give them worth and beauty. For him the earth, which had swallowed so many generations, and suffered so many wounds, was green and prosperous. The sky, battered and pierced by so many mad wishes, fruitless prayers, and airy pinnacles of visions which had passed away, bent smoothly and securely over him, and smiled with crystalline azure. To be alive, and man—to see, to feel, to walk, to think, to read Plutarch, or hunt over the plains of Périgord, filled him with the buoyancy of childhood. The human faces of ruined or plague-struck peasants, of the citizens of Bordeaux, of the people of Paris, of the nobles and dames of France, stamped as all were with stories of folly and suffering, yet had also a precious import as the countenances of men, and won from him an eager sympathy. From this fellow-feeling of brotherhood the grey old earth, with the infinity of space above, and the immeasurable grave below, had for him beauty, and sweetness, and elastic gladness. And his brain, wondering and growing weary at the spectacle of history, to him a long riddle, poised itself and rested softly in the book-tower of his chateau, with the memory of La Boëtie, the presence of the wise men of old, and the anticipated kindness of his own and of all future times. Sceptic as he was, the dark and ulcered scepticism of a later age was unknown to him. The towered landscape of Greece and Rome had been disclosed anew before him and his generation. The expanse of the future was bursting open with the clash and storm-music of battles; and he knew not how much, or how little, to expect from the change, but felt that there was dew and bloom for him upon the near and friendly soil on which he set his foot.

Weak, no doubt, and dim and hazy, must the best image appear to us that we can now recover of a man who lived three hundred years ago. The past exists, indeed, imperishable, unchangeable, but it seems to flit away from us into a gulf of shadows. And we can hardly satisfy ourselves that it ever has been the throbbing, bright-eyed thing that we call Now. But that now, even while we write it, stiffens to a mummy in the memory, melts in the fancy to a spectre, and is nowhere to be seen as what it was. Thus, not only the sunny statuary of Grecian life, the clanging stride of Rome, the high-hearted ferment of pride, and gracefulness, and faith in the middle ages, are worn away to ghostly emptiness, but we, too, and our full, uneasy existence, are slipping away from ourselves into the same vague twilight. It is not only Montaigne who pines and decays into a name and an effigy; but those who read of him, and he who writes. Obscure as he hovers before us, shall we appear at a coming age; and palpable and bold as we now are, so once was he, and that departed world of thought and feeling in which he moved and enjoyed, and at last vanished into dust and dreams.

HALLAM.

The Essays of Montaigne make in several respects an epoch in literature, less on account of their real importance, or the novel truths they contain, than of their influence upon the taste and the opinions of Europe. They are the first provocatio ad populum, the first appeal from the porch and the academy to the haunts of busy and of idle men, the first book that taught the unlearned reader to observe and reflect for himself on questions of moral philosophy. In an age when every topic of this nature was treated systematically and in a didactic form, he broke out, without connection of chapters, with all the digression that levity and garrulous egotism could suggest, with a very delightful, but, at that time, most unusual, rapidity of transition from seriousness to gaiety. The school of Montaigne embraces a large proportion of French and English literature, and especially of that which has borrowed his title of Essays. No prose writer of th sixteenth century has been so generally read, nor probably, given so much delight. Whatever ma be our estimate of Montaigne as a philosopher—name which he was far from arrogating—there wil be but one opinion of the felicity and brightness of his genius.

It is a striking proof of these qualities, that we cannot help believing him to have struck out all his thoughts by a spontaneous effort of his mind, and to have fallen afterwards upon his quotations and examples by happy accident. I have little doubt but that the process was different; and that, either by dint of memory, though he absolutely disclaims the possessing a good one, or by the usual method of common-placing, he had made his reading instrumental to excite his own ingenious and fearless understanding. His extent of learning was by no means great for that age, but the whole of it was brought to bear on his object; and it is a proof of Montaigne's independence of mind that, while a vast mass of erudition was the only passport to fame, he read no authors but such as were most fitted to his own habits of thinking. Hence he displays an unity, a self-existence, which we seldom find so complete in other writers. His quotations, though they perhaps make more than one-half of his Essays, seem parts of himself, and are like limbs of his own mind, which could not be separated without laceration. But over all is spread a charm of a fascinating simplicity, and an apparent abandonment of the whole man to the easy inspiration of genius, combined with a good nature—though rather too Epicurean and destitute of moral energy—which, for that very reason, made him a favorite with men of similar dispositions, for whom courts, and camps, and country mansions, were the proper soil.

Montaigne is superior to any of the ancients in liveliness, in that careless and rapid style, where one thought springs naturally, but not consecutively, from another, by analogical rather than deductive connection; so that, while the reader seems to be following a train of arguments, he is imperceptibly hurried to a distance by some contingent association. This may be observed in half his Essays, the titles of which often give us little insight into their general scope. Thus the Apology for Raimond de Sebond is soon forgotten in the long defence of moral Pyrrhonism, which occupies the 12th chapter of the second book. He sometimes makes a show of coming back from his excursions; but he has generally exhausted himself before he does so. This is what men love to practise (not advantageously for their severer studies) in their own thoughts; they love to follow the casual associations that lead them through pleasant labyrinths—as one riding along the high road is glad to deviate a little into the woods, though it may sometim happen that he will lose his way, and find himself far remote from his inn. And such is the conversational style of lively and eloquent old men. We converse with Montaigne, or rather hear him talk; it is almost impossible to read his Essays without thinking that he speaks to us; we see his cheerful brow, his sparkling eye, his negligent, but gentlemanly demeanour; we picture him in his armchair, with his few books round the room, and Plutarch on the table.

The independence of his mind produces great part of the charm of his writing; it redeems his vanity, without which it could not have been so fully displayed, or, perhaps, so powerfully felt. In an age of literary servitude, when every province into which reflection could wander was occupied by some despot; when, to say nothing of theology, men found Aristotle, or Ulpian, or Hippocrates, at every turning to dictate their road, it was gratifying to fall in company with a simple gentleman who, with much more reading than generally belonged to his class, had the spirit to ask a reason for every rule.

Montaigne has borrowed much, besides his quotations, from the few ancient authors he loved to study. In one passage he even says that his book is wholly compiled from Plutarch and Seneca, but this is evidently intended to throw the critics off their scent. These, indeed, were his two favourite authors; and, in order to judge of the originality of Montaigne in any passage, it may often be necessary to have a considerable acquaintance with their works. He knew little Greek, but most Greek works at that time had a Latin translation; and he needed not for Plutarch to go beyond his own language. Cicero he did not much admire, except the Epistles to Atticus. He esteemed the moderns very slightly in comparison with antiquity, though praising Guicciardini and Philip de Comines. Dugald Stewart observes that Montaigne cannot be suspected of affectation, and therefore must himself have believed what he says of the badness of his memory, forgetting, as he tells us, the names of the commonest things, and even of those he constantly saw. But his vanity led him to talk perpetually of himself; and, as often happens to vain men, he would rather talk of his own failings than of any foreign subject. He could not have had a very defective memory, so far as it had been exercised, though he might fall into the common mistake of confounding his inattention to ordinary objects with weakness of the faculty.

Montaigne seldom defines or discriminates; his mind had great quickness, but little subtlety; his carelessness and impatience of labour rendered his views practically one-sided; for though he was sufficiently free from prejudice to place the objects of consideration in different lights, he wanted the power, or did not use the diligence, to make that comparative appreciation of facts which is necessary to distinguish the truth. He appears to most advantage in matters requiring good sense and calm observation, as in the education of children. The twenty-fourth and twenty-eighth chapters of the first book, which relate to this subject, are among the best in the collection. His excellent temper made him an enemy to the harshness and tyranny so frequent at that time in the management of children, as his clear understanding did to the pedantic methods of overloading and misdirecting their faculties. It required some courage to argue against the grammarians, who had almost monopolised the admiration of the world. In all the remarks of Montaigne on human character and manners, we find liveliness, simplicity, and truth. They are such as his ordinary opportunities of observation, or his reading, suggested; and though several writers have given proofs of deeper reflection, or more watchful discernment, few are so well calculated to fall in with the apprehension of the general reader.

The scepticism of Montaigne, concerning which so much has been said, is not displayed in religion, for he was a steady Catholic, though his faith seems to have been rather that of acquiescence than conviction; nor in such subtleties of metaphysical Pyrrhonism as we find in Sanhez, which had no attraction for his careless nature. But he had read much of Sextus Empiricus, and might perhaps have derived something from his favourite Plutarch. He had also been forcibly struck by the narratives of travellers, which he sometimes received with a credulity, as to evidence, not rarely combined with theoretical scepticism, and which is too much the fault of his age to bring censure on an individual. It was then assumed that all travellers were trustworthy, and still more, that none of the Greek and Roman authors have recorded falsehoods. Hence he was at a loss to discover a general rule of moral law, as an implanted instinct, a necessary deduction of common reason, in the varying usages and opinions of mankind. But his scepticism was less extravagant and unreasonable at that time than it would be now. Things then really doubtful have been proved, and positions, entrenched by authority which he dared not to scruple, have been overthrown;* truth, in retiring from her outposts, has become more unassailable in her citadel.

It may be deemed a symptom of wanting a thorough love of truth, when a man over-rates, as much as when he overlooks, the difficulties he deals with. Montaigne is perhaps not exempt from this failing. Though sincere and candid in his general temper, he is sometimes more ambitious of setting forth his own ingenuity than desirous to come to the bottom of his subject. Hence he is apt to run into the fallacy common to this class of writers, and which La Mothe le Vayer employed much more—that of confounding the variations of the customs of mankind in things morally indifferent with those which affect the principles of duty; and hence the serious writers on philosophy in the next age, Pascal, Arnauld, Malebranche, animadvert with much severity on Montaigne. They considered him, not perhaps unjustly, as an enemy to the candid and honest investigation of truth, both by his bias towards Pyrrhonism, and by the great indifference of his temperament, scarcely acknowledging so much as was due to the service he had done by chasing the servile pedantry of the schools, and preparing the way for closer reasoners than himself. But the very tone of their censures is sufficient to prove the vast influence he had exerted over the world.

Montaigne is the earliest classical writer in the French language—the first whom a gentleman is ashamed not to have read. So long as an unaffected style, and an appearance of the utmost simplicity and good nature, shall charm,—so long as the lovers of desultory and cheerful conversation shall be more numerous than those who prefer a lecture or a sermon,—so long as reading is sought by the many as an amusement in idleness, or a resource in pain—so long will Montaigne be among the most favourite authors of mankind.—Introduction to the Literature of Europe. London. 1839. DISCOURS QUI A OBTENU L'ACCESSIT AU JUGEMENT DE LA CLASSE DE LA LANGUE ET DE LA LITTÉRATURE FRANÇAISES DE L'INSTITUT, DANS SA SÉANCE DU 9 AVRIL, 1812.*

PAR M. JAY.

"Dans la plupart des auteurs je vois l'homme qui écrit; dans Montaigne, l'homme qui pense."—MONTESQUIEU.

DANS ces temps malheureux où de funestes révolutions agitent et tourmentent les peuples, on voit presque toujours sortir du sein de l'anarchie quelques uns de ces hommes grands par eux-mêmes, guides et modèles de leurs contemporains. Ainsi sous les règnes orageux des derniers Valois, d'illustres personnages déployèrent un caractère fier, de rares talens, et des vertus dignes des beaux jours de l'antiquité. Alors parut l'éloquent moraliste dont vous demandez l'éloge: alors commença cette glorieuse succession d'écrivains français qui depuis cette époque n'ont cessé d'éclairer l'Europe et d'exercer le pouvoir du génie. Grâce à leurs nobles travaux, les sciences, la morale, la langue, le goût se sont perfectionnés, au milieu de ces progrès rapides; tandisque des renommées imposantes, soutenues quelque temps par un aveugle enthousiasme tombaient l'une après l'autre et disparaissaient sans retour;† tandis que de nouvelles renommées s'élevaient sur des fondemens plus solides, la réputation de Montaigne restait inébranlable; ou plutôt elle s'étendait avec les lumières et grandissait avec l'esprit humain.

Placé dans une époque où le peuple français, instrument d'anarchie entre les mains de quelques chefs ambitieux, confondait la religion avec le fanatisme, et la liberté avec la licence, Montaigne, calme au milieu de l'agitation générale, forme avec tout son siècle un contraste frappant. Les scènes de violence, les actes de rébellion, dont il est temoin, raffermissent dans son cœur ces sentimens de justice et de loyauté, dont l'oubli funeste est la honte et le fléau des peuples. Tandis que la France, tenant d'une part à la barbarie par des habitudes séculaires, de l'autre à la civilization par des idées nouvelles, hésite entre ces deux forces opposées il devance son siècle, observe tout sans prevention, juge tout sans partialité, et doué d'une raison supérieure affranchit sa pensée de la vieille tyrannie de l'école; et de la fureur aveugle des innovations. Cependant l'intolérance des sectes, l'orgueil du faux savoir se réunissent pour protéger les anciennes erreurs; l'esprit humain se consume en efforts stériles; plus on s'écarte du vrai, plus on croit avancer vers la vérité. Montaigne seul se sépare de la foule, et pénètre dans les routes abandonnées de la sagesse; il y pénètre à l'aide du doute, non de ce pyrrhonisme insensé qui se detruit lui-même en voulant tout détruire, mais du doute de la raison qui naît de la lumière, et la produit à son tour. Montaigne consulte les livres; il y trouve quelques verités mortes ensevelies sous un amas d'erreurs; il interroge ses contemporains; la voix du préjugé lui repond: alors se repliant sur lui-même, il observe la marche des passions, en étudie les mouvemens dans son propre cœur, cherche à demêler en lui, et autour de lui, ce qui est l'ouvrage de l'art, et ce qui appartient à la nature. Il soumet tout à l'examen, les temps, les hommes, et les choses. Enfin, éclairé par l'experience et la méditation, désabusé des chimères qui nous font oublier la vie, il commence avec lui-même cét entretien sublime où le génie est simple et sans art comme la vérité; ou le cœur de l'homme est mis pour la première fois à découvert; ou se trouvent les germes des grandes conceptions dont le dévelopement doit honorer plusieurs siècles.

Voilà comment était formé ce génie sage et hardi, qui, dans un siècle esclave de l'erreur, pensa d'après lui-même, et le premier nous apprit à penser. Voilà d'où lui venait cette force de raison qui va droit à la vérité, l'environne de lumière et la rend visible à tous les yeux. A ces traits seuls vous reconnaissez cette philosophie mâle et utile qui s'applique à tous les détails de la vie, et n'éclaire les hommes que pour les rendre meilleurs. Aussi lorsque, cherchant a considerer Montaigne sous divers aspects, je veux séparer l'écrivain du moraliste, et le moraliste de l'homme, j'aperçois un trait dominant qui les reunit; partout l'esprit philosophique anime son langage, fortifie son talent, et règle ses mœurs comme ses opinions. Toutefois, sans me soumettre rigoreusement à la methode des divisions, j'essaierai de le caractériser sous ces différens rapports. Pour apprécier le merite de Montaigne comme écrivain, il faut d'abord jeter un coup d'œil sur l'état de la langue et de la littérature françaises à l'époque où il parut. L'imprimerie destinée à changer le sort du monde, élevait par degrés un tribunal suprême en faveur de l'humanité, et faisait cesser l'action dévorante du temps et de la barbarie sur les nobles monumens du génie antique. L'Italie, au milieu des discordes civiles, avait recueilli cette grande succession, et reconquis la gloire des arts. Attirés par l'amour des conquêtes sur cette terre deux fois classique, les Français y reçurent des idées nouvelles; et, après un demi-siècle d'efforts glorieux, ils ne recueillirent d'autre fruit de leurs victoires que le goût des lettres et le besoin naissant des lumières. François 1er., eprouvé par la fortune et sensible à la vrai gloire, se déclara le protecteur des sciences et des arts. La toile fut animée par la génie de la peinture, et le marble respira sous le ciseau créateur; mais les progrès de l'esprit humain furent d'abord peu sensibles. Cependant Rabelais, qui connaissait son siècle, introduisit la raison dans le monde sous les enseignes de la folie. La langue acquit dans les vers de Marot de la finesse et de la grâce: c'était beaucoup sans doute; mais que de soins, que de travaux étaient encore nécessaires pour la rendre digne de servir d'instrument à l'eloquence et d'interprète à la philosophie! Elle n'avait pas même la vigueur sauvage d'une langue naissante; et sa vieille enfance offrait tous les signes de la faiblesse et de la corruption. Les érudits de cette époque, adorateurs intolerans de l'antiquité, dédaignaient l'idiome vulgaire. Plus occupés de disputer sur les mots que d'approfondir les choses, ils ressemblaient pour la plupart à ces terres arides qui reçoivent toutes sortes de semences sans jamais rien produire. Lorsqu'au milieu de ce peuple stérile et contentieux, Montaigne voulut faire entendre des vérités utiles, il sentit que la langue impuissante fléchissait sous le poids de sa pensée. Il avait besoin d'un langage ferme, il osa le créer. Il s'empare de cette langue inanimée, l'enflamme, et lui donne la vie. Il lui imprime un caractère antique de hardiesse et d'indépendance; lui apprend des mouvemens inaccoutumés; découvre de nouveaux rapports d'expressions à mesure qu'il aperçoit de nouveaux rapports d'idées; et trouve dans la nature entière les images sensibles et les couleurs de ses pensées. Alors toutes les difficultés s'évanouissent. Il s'est fait une langue, courageuse comme son génie, brilliante comme son imagination. Il exerce sur ce nouvel idiome une autorité absolue, en varie les formes à son gré, change de ton avec une souplesse admirable, et prend naturellement celui qui convient le mieux au sujet qu'il traite. Tour à tour enjoué, véhément, ingénieux, sublime, il ouvra à la raison toutes les issues de l'esprit humain. Souvent au milieu de ses réflexions il jette une pensée feconde et s'en éloigne, laissant à d'autres le soin de l'examiner et de découvrir tout ce qu'elle renferme. Jamais il ne tourne auteur de son sujet, il aime mieux l'abandonner; mais, lorsque vous croyez qu'il l'a perdu de vue, il y revient inopinément, l'embrasse de nouveau, le creuse, le pénètre et en fait jaillir de grandes pensées et d'importantes vérités. A quelque hauteur qu'il s'élève, il voit encore au-delà. Il a toujours, pour me servir de ses propres termes, "une idée dans l'âme qui lui présenté une meilleure forme que celle qu'il a mise en besoigne; mais il ne peut ni la saisir, ni l'exploicter." Ainsi tandis que le vulgaire des écrivains trouve partout des limites et les prend pour celles du génie, celui-ci soutenu par la méditation s'elance, franchit toutes les bornes communes; et lorsqu'enfin il est forcé de s'arrêter, il s'indigne, s'accuse de faiblesse, et conçoit encore confusément une plus haute idée de perfection.

Le style et les pensées de Montaigne prouvent "qu'il avait son esprit moulé au patron d'autres siècles que ceux-ci;" et l'analyse de sa phrase rapelle plus souvent l'energique fierté des langues anciennes que l'élégance et la clarté qui caractérisent aujourd'hui le français. Indépendant des régles et même de l'usage, Montaigne exprima "tout ce qu'il veut comme il veut." Il n'a pas fixé la langue; mais en travaillant sur elle, en la forçant d'obéir à son génie, en lui enlevant une partie de sa roideur primitive, il a rendu plus facile la tâche de ceux qui l'ont perfectionnée. Ils ont puisé dans ses écrits une foule d'expressions vives et pittoresque, et même quelques tournures hardies qui rompent heureusement l'uniformité de la construction directe, et s'appliquent aux mouvemens de la haute éloquence. Ils lisaient Montaigne comme ils étudiaient, les chef-d'œuvres de l'antiquité, et ils retiraient le même fruit; car ce n'est pas seulement par la franchise du langage que Montaigne est comparable aux anciens; ce qui le rapproche le plus de ces grands maîtres, ce qui lui donne une physionomie imposante parmi les modernes, c'est que son livre, comme il nous l'apprend lui-même, "est un livre de bonne foi." Je m'arrête sur cette idée, qui demande quelques développemens. Vous le savez: tout est vrai, tout est naturel dans les productions des écrivains illustres de l'antiquité; leur âme n'était envelloppée d'aucun voile, et cette noble franchise est la source principale des beautés immortelles qui brillent dans leur chef-d'œuvres, et qui surpassent autant les combinaisons de l'art, que les grands effets de la nature surpassent les tableaux produits par le pinceau le plus habile, et la poésie la plus élevée. De là cette vigueur de conception, cette touche brûlante, cette vérité de coloris qui rend, pour ainsi dire, la pensée palpable, et dans l'écrivain vous montre l'homme tout entier. Leur pensée marche librement, se développe avec aisance, et communique à la parole son énergie et sa majesté; cette bonne foi dominante, cette élevation d'un esprit indépendant, les à placés à une telle hauteur, que c'est déjà pour nous un grand mérite de les bien connaître et de savoir les admirer. Depuis le seizième siècle, des génies éminens ont illustré l'Europe, et dans les arts d'imagination, ils ont même, en certains genres, surpassé les modèles qu'ils imitaient; mais, soumis plus ou moins au joug de l'opinion, ils ont perdu cette empreinte originale qui donne un caractère individuel aux écrivains de Rome et d'Athènes. L'esprit d'imitation, devenu général à la renaissance des lettres, jetait une couleur monotone sur les travaux littéraires; tandis que l'intolérance religieuse rendait la pensée timide, et affaiblissait l'essor du talent. Comme philosophes, quelques modernes ont mérité une grand estime; encore, dans leurs plus beaux ouvrages, est-il aisé de reconnaître l'influence des sectes, aussi funeste aux littératures qu'aux religions. Faut-il donc être surpris, si cette force virile, cet accent de l'âme, ce pouvoir suprême de la raison, qui distinguent les anciens, ne se retrouvent pleinement que dans les pages de Montaigne élève et non imitateur de l'antiquité? Il y a toujours dans le cœur de l'homme une partie secrète, des sentimens cachés qui ne se produisent jamais au dehors. Montaigne ne connaît point cette réserve; il ose dire tout ce qu'il ose penser. Un tel caractère nous est devenu tellement étranger, que nous avons même quelque peine à le reconnaître, et nous en affaiblissons l'idée en nommant naïveté cette courageuse franchise de pensée et d'expression. Elle règne partout dans les écrits de Montaigne. Dès son début vous en êtes frappé. C'est moins un livre qui s'offre à vos regards que l'âme même de l'écrivain devenue en quelque sorte transparente. Au milieu des discussions les plus familières et des sallies les plus piquantes, vous le verrez se passionner pour l'heroïsme et pour la vertu. Jamais il n'affecte le ton grave et solennel de l'orateur; mais il se livre quelquefois aux mouvemens d'une éloquence vive et toujours naturelle. L'indignation que le spectacle de l'injustice et du crime excite dans son âme est souvent exprimée par une froide ironie supérieure à tout l'artifice des développemens oratoires. Veut-il faire sentir l'influence déplorable que les discordes civiles exercent sur la morale des peuples; il dédaigne ce faste d'enumérations qu'un rhéteur eût été si heureux d'employer; mais il s'écrie: "Il fait bon naître en un siècle fort dépravé; car, par comparaison d'autrui vous êtes estimé vertueux à bon marché; qui n'est que parricide en nos jours et sacrilége, il est homme de bien et d'honneur!" Heureux celui qui ne serait point frappé de l'energie et de la profondeur de ces pensées? on pourrait supposer qu'il n'a jamais entendu la voix du crime, et la logique des factions. Si Montaigne indigné de la barbarie de son siècle, retrouve quelques fois la mordante hyperbole de Juvénal, il revient bientôt a cette enjouement philosophique dont la muse d'Horace nous a laissé les plus parfaites modèles. Cette souplesse de style, cette variété de tons répand sur la lecture des Essais un charme toujours nouveau. Tantôt Montaigne serre sa pensée, comme Sénèque, pour lui donner plus de force; tantôt il l'etend, la développe comme Plutarque, et l'environne de preuves qui commandent la conviction. Chez lui, l'alliance d'une imagination poétique avec une raison ferme et sévère donne de la grâce aux plus simples détails, et produit souvent de grandes images, des mouvemens dramatiques et des tableaux pleins de vie et d'intérêt. Malgré la rapidité de ses conceptions, il sait ménager des contrastes, et rapprocher heureusement les objets afin de les éclairer les un par les autres. Il aimait à considérer la nature humaine sous un point de vue général, et dans ses principes les plus essentiels. S'il s'occupe des individus, deux ou trois coups de pinceau lui suffisent pour détacher une figure de la foule, et la placer sous vos yeux. Ainsi lorsqu'il veut prouver que dans le monde, "la gravité, la robe et les richesses donnent souvent crédit à des propos vains et ineptes," il met en scène un personnage considérable par son rang et par ses emplois; d'une grande fortune, et d'un mérite très-mince. "Il n'est pas à présumer, dit-il, qu'un Monsieur si suivi, si redouté, n'aie au dedans qu' une suffisance autre que populaire, et qu'un homme à qui on donne tant de commissions et de charges, si dédaigneux et si morgant, ne soit plus habile que cet autre qui le salue di si loin, et que personne n'emploie." Voilà si je ne me trompe, le genre de la Bruyère. N'y reconnaissez-vous pas le talent de voiler le trait satirique d'une apparence de naïveté pour la rendre plus vif et plus piquant? ce ne sont point des travers passagers que Montaigne livre au ridicule; ils tiennent à l'essence même des sociétés, et méritent par là le regarde du moraliste. Il s'est écoulé plus de deux siècles depuis l'apparition des Essais; et cependant qui de nous dans le cours de sa vie n'a pas rencontré ce Monsieur dédaigneux, morguant et inepte?

Peu d'écrivains ont manié l'arme du ridicule avec plus de succès que Montaigne. "En général, ce ne sont pas nos folies qui le font rire, ce sont nos sapiences." Cependent il honorait le vrai savoir comme une des plus nobles conquêtes de l'esprit humain; mais il aurait voulu qu'il servit à rendre les hommes "non plus doctes, mais plus habiles;" il ne s'enquérait pas qui était le plus savant mais le mieux savant; et pensait même; "que toute science est dommageable à celui qui n'a la science de bonté." Ses réflexions sur ce point se trouvent concentrées dans une maxime remarquable par sa justesse et sa précision. "En certaines mains la Science est un sceptre, en d'autres une marotte." Ces vérités générales qui forment le code de la sagesse ne peuvent être saisies que par l'esprit philosophique; mais il faut que l'imagination les anime et les mette à la portée de tous les hommes. Ces deux qualités se réunissent dans Montaigne; et l'exercice de son jugement ne ralentit jamais l'essor de son imagination. Qu'on ne croie pas cependant que le talent de peindre la pensée, et de revêtir la vérité des formes de l'eloquence, soit seulement le fruit d'un heureux instinct; il suppose un discernement exquis, un goût sûr, dont le germe, présent de la nature, ne peut être développé que par l'etude et la méditation, Montaigne avait formé son goût sur celui des anciens. Les philosophes, les orateurs, les historiens, les poëtes, passaient tour à tour sous ses yeux: nul trait frappant, nulle vérité ne lui échappait; mais il le confiait à son jugement plutôt qu'à sa mémoire; elles recevaient les couleurs de son imagination, et s'assimilaient à ses propres pensées. Ses citations mêmes, seul tribut qu'il ait payé aux habitudes scolastiques de son siècle, se combinent avec ses idées, et en font naître de nouvelles. Lorsqu'il juge les anciens, non d'après l'idolâtrie des commentateurs, mais d'après le sentiment éclairé des beautés et des défauts qui constitue le goût; lorsqu'il reproche aux poëtes dramatiques de son temps de manquer à la première des regles, à l'unité d'intérêt; et qu'il les renvoi a l'école de bon Térence, "les grâces et la mignardise du langage latin;" je ne doute plus qu'il n'eût médité sur les principes des arts d'imagination, et j'admire à la fois dans son livre les vues du philosophe et la sagacité du littérateur. Sans doute Montaigne se trompe quelquefois; mais il ne cherche jamais à tromper ses lecteurs. Nul sophisme, nulle subtilité réfléchie ne déguise ses vrais sentimens. Son livre n'est que la narration fidèle des impressions que la scène nobile du monde et l'étude du cœur humain font tour à tour sur son esprit. Il raconte ses pensées comme l'historien impartial expose une série de faits. Il se laisse aller aux sentimens qu'il éprouve, aux idées qui le frappent, et s'abandonne sans réserve à l'affection du moment. Cette disposition habituelle de l'écrivain vous révèle le secret des beautés originales que nous admirons dans ses écrits, et des imperfections qu'on peut y découvrir. De là vient non-seulement cette gâité franche et communicative, cette heureuse soudaineté de pensée et d'expression, cette verve étonnante qui toujours s'epanche sans jamais s'epuiser; mais aussi ces écarts fréquens et inattendus, ces modifications de la même idée qui ne se présente pas toujours à son esprit sous le même aspect. A mesure qu'il avançait vers le terme de la vie, sa morale devenait moins sévère; les faiblesses de l'humanité lui inspiraient plus d'indulgence; et ses principes, toujours essentiellement les mêmes, subissaient quelque changement dans la forme et dans l'application. S'il n'a point d'opinion arrêtée sur certains métaphysiques dont l'utilité est douteuse, et qui lui paraissaient placés hors du domaine de la raison; on reconnaîtra du moins qu'il ne s'est jamais écarté des veritès, eternelles de la morale, et que sa philosophie renferme tout ce qui peut assurer le repas des hommes et contribuer à leur bonheur. Quelques sages de la Grèce, considérant l'homme d'une manière absolue, lui proposaient pour modèle un être également abstrait, dans lequel ils se plaisaient à réunir toutes les vertus au plus haut degré. Cette grande idée a produit, sur quelques individus, des effets qui tiennent du prodige; mais les prodiges ne peuvent être offerts comme modèles. La morale stoïcienne se trouvait hors de la portée du commun des hommes, et ses admirateurs mêmes n'osaient espérer d'y atteindre.

On confondait avec elle cette autre morale populaire, qui établit entre les hommes des rapports intimes, co-ordonne leur affections avec leurs devoirs, et embrasse tout le détail des mœurs. Telle était le morale que les disciples de Socrate recueillaient dans ses entretiens sublimes, et qu'enseignait cette autre philosophe trop long-temps méconnu, qui ne sépara jamais la volupté de la tempérance, et la bonheur de la sagesse. Montaigne adopta les principes de ces deux sages, parce qu'il les trouva fondés sur la nature. Le but de sa morale est de régler les passions et non de les anéantir; il veut que l'homme soit essentiellement homme; et sans s'égarer dans de vains abstractions, il attache le bonheur à l'exercice modéré de nos facultés naturelles, au témoignage d'une conscience pure, et à la pratique des vertus publiques et privées. Comme Socrate, il élève sa pensée vers la divinité, source inépuisable de vie, éternel type de perfection. Frappé d'un sentiment religieux, à l'aspect de cet ordre et de ces lois immuables qui régissent les mondes semés dans l'espace, il s'addresse aux hommes, et leur dit: "La divinité est connue par ses ouvrages visibles; Dieu a laissé en ces hauts ouvrages le caractère de sa toute-puissance. Ce monde est un temple très saint, où vous êtes introduits pour contempler des statues, non ouvrées de mortelle main, mais celles que la divine pensée a fait sensibles, le soleil, les étoiles, les eaux et la terre, qui nous répresentent les intelligibles. Cette volonté unique et suprême est le principe de toutes choses; c'est elle qui, mettant les passions dans votre cœur, vous a donné la raison pour contrepoids et pour régulateur. Que faut-il pour être heureux? se rapprocher de la nature, vivre en paix avec soi-même et avec les autres. Sachez de plus, que la vraie vertu est la mère nourrice des plaisirs humains; en les rendant justes, elles les rend sûrs et purs: elle aime la vie, elle aime la beauté, la gloire, la santé; mais son office propre et particulier, c'est de savoir user de ces bien-là modérément, et de les savoir perdre avec constance. Elle n'est pas, comme dit l'école, plantée à la tête d'un mont coupé, raboteux, inaccessible; ceux qui l'ont approchée savent, au contraire, qu'elle est logée dans une belle plaine fertile et fleurissante, d'où elle voit bien sous soi toutes choses; mais celui qui en sait l'addresse y peut arriver par des routes ombrageuses, gazonnées, semées de fleurs, et d'une pente facile et polie comme celle des roûtes célestes."

C'est à ces premiers principes de toute bonne morale que Montaigne s'efforce de rappeler les hommes. Les diverses conditions de la vie humaine se présentent successivement à son esprit; et partout il voit avec douleur que l'homme "se fuit et s'évite sans cesse. Nous ne sommes jamais chez-nous, nous sommes toujours au de là. Le glorieux chef-d'œuvre de l'homme, c'est vivre pour lui et à propos. Avez-vous su composer vos mœurs, vous avez plus fait que celui qui a composé des livres; avez-vous su prendre du répos, vous êtes plus sage que l'ambitieux accablé d'honneurs et d'ennui." Ces pensées conduisent Montaigne à une autre vérité dans laquelle il trouve la règle de nos actions et la source de nos devoirs. Il pense qu'il suffit au sage "de retirer au dedans son âme de la presse;" et qu'au dehors il est tenu de respecter les coutumes généralement adoptées, et d'obéir aux lois protectrices des sociétés. Témoin des calamités inséparables de l'anarchie, il cherche ainsi les moyens de prévenir ces crises politiques dont l'influence terrible s'étend quelquefois sur plusieurs générations; et ne s'affaiblit, comme le mouvement d'une mer irritée qu'après une longue et sourde agitation qui rappelle encore l'image des tempêtes et la souvenir des naufrages.

Montaigne ne confondait point les abus dont l'existence améne par degrés les secousses funestes aux états, avec leurs lois fondamentales auxquelles il est difficile de toucher impunément. Il savait que la réforme des abus est souvent l'unique moyen de prévenir le choc des intérêts, et soulèvement des factions. C'est un homme supérieur qui traite de toutes les matières relatives à l'ordre social. Il a combattu le premier une foule de préjugés nuisibles, de coutumes barbares dont nous sommes heureusement delivrés. Il s'élève contre l'imperfection des lois criminelles de son temps; condamne la torture; demande raison aux magistrats de cette épreuve de patience plutôt que de vérité; reproche à ses contemporains de verser le sang des hommes avec trop d'indifférence; et prépare ainsi la voie aux éloquentes réclamations des Montesquieu et des Boccaria. S'il considère les calamités produites par les disputes de mots, il prononce "que la plupart de nos troubles sont grammariens." S'il jette un regard sur l'organisation des sociétés modernes, il s'étonne "qu'il y ait doubles lois; celles de l'honneur, et celles de l'équité; que certains hommes aient la parole, d'autres l'action; les uns la raison, les autres la force; ceux-là le savoir, ceux-ci la vertu." Combien des contradictions si bizarres devaient affliger le philosophe admirateur de ces temps héroïques, où les citoyens institués pour la patrie passaient de la tribune au champ de Mars, et du Prétoire volaient aux combats; où les vertus et les talens siégeaient réunis sur le char de triomphe qui, dans le même homme, offrait à la vénération publique l'interprète de la justice, l'appui de l'innocence, le ministre de la religion, et le héros vainqueur des rois.

Si Montaigne revient souvent sur ces hautes considérations politiques trop négligées par les moralistes de profession, c'est qu'il se place par la pensée au centre même de l'ordre social, et aperçoit les rapports qu'ont entre elles les diverses parties qui viennent s'y réunir. Il a voulu non-seulement connaître l'homme de la nature, mais encore l'homme envisagé comme membre d'une grande famille, agissant sur ses semblables par ses opinions et ses mœurs, et recevant à son tour l'action de tout ce qui l'environne. Il sonde toutes les plaies de l'humanité. C'est dans l'orgueil insensé des hommes, c'est dans les prestiges de leur imagination qu'il découvre les sources principales de leurs misères. Lisez ce qu'il a écrit sur la vanité, "de cette fragile et calamiteuse créature qui ne sait rien que pleurer, sans apprentissage." Méditez surtout ses pensées sur la mort! Il emploie toutes les ressources de la parole, toute l'autorité du génie pour affranchir nôtre imagination des terreurs qui l'assiégent "dans ce jour solennel, juge des autres jours." Il accuse nôtre faiblesse, il accuse nos institutions qui entourent la mort d'un appareil plus lugubre que la mort même. Tantôt il parle au nom de la raison, tantôt il fait parler la nature; il veut même que la mort puisse être voluptueuse, et croit que Socrate et Caton, sur le point de quitter la vie, ont dû rendre grâces aux dieux d'avoir mis leur vertu à une si belle epreuve. Ailleurs, il nous invite à détourner nos regards de ces personnages "dont les âmes sont eslancées hors de nostre sphère," pour les fixer sur l'homme rustique soutenu par le seul instinct de la nature, recevant la mort comme une condition de l'existence, sans frayeur et sans murmure, "avec plus de philosophie et de meilleure grâce qu'Aristote." C'est ainsi que Montaigne appelle les faits à l'appui de ses opinions, et qu'il nous conduit à la sagesse par les routes de l'expérience et de la vérité. Ce qui m'étonne surtout en lui, c'est cette hauteur de vue qui plane sur toutes les erreurs et les folies des hommes; c'est cette vertueuse audace d'un génie libre et sage, qui, dans un siècle agité par l'intolérance et le fanatisme, ne s'écarte jamais des vrais principes de la morale et des lois sacrées de l'humanité.

Il respire partout dans son livre, ce noble sentiment d'humanité, premier bienfait de la philosophie; mais il ne se montre nulle part plus énergique et plus éloquent que lorsque Montaigne, dans sa revue générale des hommes et des choses, porte ses regards sur le nouveau monde, et n'aperçoit de tous côtés que des bourreaux et des victimes. A l'aspect des scènes de rapine et de violence qui désolaient ces malheureuses contrées, il frémit, il s'indigne, il condamne cet esprit insatiable de cupidité qui déshonore le commerce et l'a rendu trop souvent le fléau de l'humanité. Il gémit sur le sort de ces peuples inexpérimentés dont l'avare et cruel Espagnol devorait le sang et les trésors. Il aurait voulu qu'une si importante conquête fût tombée "en des mains qui eussent doucement poli ce qu'on pouvait y trouver de sauvage, et développé les bonnes semences que la nature y avait produites." Vœux impuissans! la hache européenne n'a cessé de poursuivre l'homme des forêts; et bientôt il ne restera de ces nations proscrites que les souvenirs conservés par leurs oppresseurs.

L'humanité, la modération, la justice, voilà donc le fondement sur lequel repose toute le philosophie de Montaigne; "philosophie pratique et non ostentatrice et parlière;" car il ne veut point qu'on fasse une science de la morale, un art de la sagesse; et qu'il soit nécessaire d'apprendre en forme de syllogisme ce qui tient à l'essence même de la nature humaine. Il désire que la sagesse règne dans les mœurs; qu'elle se change en habitude, et soit plutôt en sentimens ou même en sensations qu'en paroles. Il conseille d'enseigner la sagesse aux enfans comme on leur enseigne à se servir de leurs facultés physiques; d'en teindre leur âme et non de l'en arroser; de leur apprendre à être plutôt qu'à paraître. Tout ce que la raison perfectionée peut conseiller de plus utile pour former des hommes et des citoyens; tout ce que l'expérience nous a révélé sur ce sujet important, vous le trouvez dans Montaigne. Il ne fut point écouté de ses contemporains; il les avait devancés de trop loin pour qu'ils pussent l'entendre; mais il parlait pour tous les âges; le jour devait arriver où il serait compris, et quelques unes des productions philosophiques les plus estimées du dernier siècle ne sont que le commentaire de ses pensées. C'est en effet dans ce siècle, époque de goût et de justice littéraire, que le mérite de Montaigne a été généralement reconnu. Les vérités qu'il avait deposées dans son livre furent recueillies par des écrivains du premier ordre, et reparurent avec de nouveaux développemens et une force nouvelle. Tous les genres de littérature s'enrichirent de ce précieux héritage, et, jusques dans la poësie, vous retrouvez l'influence de ce génie vigoreux et indépendant. Toutefois, j'ose le dire avec assurance, c'est à nous qu'il appartient d'apprécier Montaigne et de le mettre à son rang; une terrible expérience nous a donné des lumières qui manquaient à nos devanciers; nous avons vu l'homme aux prises avec toutes les passions; nous avons vu cet être léger, ondoyant et divers bâtir aussi bien sur le vuide que sur le plein, et de l'inanité que de matière, et nous pouvons assurer que nul ne l'a mieux connu et ne l'a peint avec des couleurs plus vraies que le philosophe du seizième siècle; nous avons vu comme lui qu'il ne se peut imaginer un pire état de choses qu'où la méchanceté vient à être légitime et prendre avec le congé du magistrat le manteau de la vertu. Voilà de ces traits dont jusqu'à nous on n'a presenti toute la vérité. Plus on fera de progrès dans la science de l'homme, plus les philosophes seront étonnes de la supériorité de Montaigne; et l'on sera forcé d'avouer que ses Essais sont le livre des sages et de ceux qui veulent le devenir.

Est-ce là, dira-t-on, ce penseur téméraire que tant de voix ont accusé de pyrrhonisme? quel fut donc le scepticisme de Montaigne? Faut-il vous la dire! Il pensait que l'autorité de la coutume n'est pas toujours celle de la raison; "et que les choses inconnues sont le vrai champ de l'imposture;" il attaquait le dieu même de la science scolastique, "cet Aristote dont la doctrine servait alors de loi magistrale, quoiqu'à l'aventure elle fût aussi fausse qu'une autre." Doué d'une imagination sage et vigoureuse, il dévoilait les erreurs de cette autre imagination qui trouble le repos des hommes, et remplit le monde de crédulités et de vaines terreurs; enfin il donnait à la morale l'autorité de la raison, à une époque où la raison était muette et la morale sans pouvoir. C'est ainsi que Montaigne était sceptique. Il employait le doute comme le seul instrument dont le philosophe pût se servir pour séparer la vérité du mensonge. Il porta dans les sciences morales le même esprit que Bacon, le plus illustre de ses contemporains, introduisit dans les sciences physiques. En soumettant les anciennes erreurs à l'examen de la raison, ils ont contribué l'un et l'autre à répandre en Europe cet amour du vrai, ce besoin de connaissances positives qui dirigent vers un but noble et utile les forces réunies de l'esprit humain. L'union de la philosophie avec les sciences et la morale, fut l'ouvrage de ces deux hommes qui, négligés de leurs contemporains, n'ont été jugés avec équité que plus d'un siècle après leur mort; et, par une étonnante conformité dans leur destinée, la gloire de Montaigne a trouvé ses premiers défenseurs dans la patrie de Bacon, et la renommée de celuici n'est arrivée à toute sa hauteur qu'après été appuyée du suffrage des philosophes français.

rite ont écrit sur la morale avec force et avec génie. Pascal, écrivain sublime, ne s'arrête qu'en tremblant dans les régions supérieures de la pensée. Il refuse même le secours de la raison, semblable à un voyageur qui, se trouvant suspendu sur le bord d'une abîme, ferme les yeux devant les profondeurs dont la vue trouble ses sens et enchaîne son courage. Pascal n'échappe au désespoir qu'en se réfugiant dans le sein de la religion qui ne fit jamais une plus illustre conquête. Là même, il ne peut de rassurer qu'en s'attachant aux doctrines ascétiques dans leur plus rigoreuse abstraction; et revient ainsi par une route détournée à la brillante chimère du stoïcisme.* Philosophe au milieu des cours, observateur au sein des plaisirs, la Rochefoucault a voulu rapporter toutes les actions humaines à un seul principe, sans s'apercevoir ou sans avouer que ce principe toujours le même en apparence se modifie au fond par les passions mêmes qu'il met en mouvement, et devient noble ou vil suivant les effets qu'il produit. La Bruyère traduisit Théophraste; mais ce fut de Montaigne qu'il emprunta l'idée piquante de mettre en action les ridicules et les folies humaines. Il n'envisagea dans la morale que son influence sur la vie extérieure des hommes; mais il traita cette partie en maître; et il serait peut-être hors de tout parallèle s'il eût été aussi profond dans les vues générales qu'habile à manier sa langue, et supérieur dans les détails. Rousseau est celui de nos écrivains qui pour le fond des choses se rapproche le plus de Montaigne; et cependant quelle différence de l'un à l'autre! Il est vrai que leur morale est fondée sur la même base; sur la nature de l'homme, et sur les rapports qui l'unissent à ses semblables. Il est encore vrai qu'ils ont exercé tous les deux une grande autorité sur les esprits; mais l'effet dans Rousseau tient plus au sentiment, et dans Montaigne à la pensée; aussi l'un a-t-il excité plus d'enthousiasme et l'autre plus d'estime. Montaigne remonte aux principes avec plus de sagacité; l'autre excelle dans l'art de développer ces mêmes principes, et d'en faire sortir toutes les vérités qu'ils renferment. La philosophie du premier est plus ferme, plus inaccessible aux préjugés; celle du second plus séduisante, lors même qu'elle penche vers l'erreur. Leur imagination fut également forte et brillante; mais cette faculté domine dans Rousseau, tandis que dans Montaigne elle est toujours docile et soumise à la raison. Ce dernier laisse des traces lumineuses sur tous les sentiers qu'il parcourt; comme les anciens, il porte en lui même cette lumière philosophique qui se réfléchit si vivement dans ses écrits. Rousseau semble produire la lumière qu'il emprunte; cependant elle l'abandonne quelquefois; alors il s'égare et se perd dans l'exagération. On admirera toujours dans ses ouvrages la perfection du style, le talent de fortifier la raison par l'éloquence; on y cherchera ces traits passionnés, ce langage du cœur où tous ses mystères sont révélés. Mais on lira Montaigne pour s'instruire; pour exercer sa pensée au travail de la méditation; pour apprendre à supporter avec courage les revers de la fortune et les accidens de la vie. Considérés comme peintures du cœur humain, Rousseau a représenté la passion de l'amour avec une force et une chaleur inconnues aux anciens; Montaigne a peint l'amitié avec les traits simples touchant et sublimes de l'éloquence antique. La manière dont ils ont parlé d'eux-mêmes explique la différence de leur caractère et de leurs vues. En lisant les aveux de l'un, vous êtes toujours occupé de l'auteur; l'autre en se dévoilant à vos yeux vous ramène toujours a vous même. Vous écoutez Rousseau avec l'intérêt qu'inspirent le malheur et le génie; mais vous êtes le confident intime et l'ami de Montaigne. Ces deux grands moralistes ont acquis des droits incontestables à la reconnaissance des hommes; toutefois puisque l'un n'a pas été, comme l'autre, privé de modèles dans sa langue, et supérieur a son siècle, je pencherais à croire que si le premier est plus parfait comme écrivain, le second est plus estimable comme philosophe; et je concevrais plus aisément Montaigne à la place de Rousseau, que celui-ci à la place de Montaigne.†

Plus heureux que Rousseau, parce qu'il dépendait moins de l'opinion des autres, et qu'il conserva toujours plus d'empire sur lui-même, Montaigne ne fut exposé ni aux attaques de la haine ouvertement declarée, ni à ces délations ténébreuses, arme éternelle de la bassesse et de l'hypocrisie. Mais après sa mort il a eu la gloire, comme tant d'autres philosophes, d'avoir pour ennemis tous les hommes attachés à l'erreur par ignorance, par intérêt, ou par orgueil. Si dans sa retraite, lorsqu'il cherchait à éclairer son siècle, la calomnie eût élevé sa voix contre lui; sans doute il aurait répondu comme Socrate, son maître et son modèle: "qu'on examine ma vie entière, voilà mon apologie." C'est aussi la seule reponse que nous ferons à ses ennemis. Voyons donc si la conduite de l'homme à démenti les principes du moraliste. Tout ce qui peut servir à la faire connaître, se trouve renfermé dans le seul livre qui, suivant ses propres expressions, "soit consubstantiel à son auteur." S'il est difficile de la peindre, il est aisé de le montrer.

Les premiers mouvemens du cœur, les premiers essais de l'intelligence laissent dans l'âme une impression ineffaçable; et le seul moyen de former des hommes vertueux serait peut-être de ne leur préparer dès l'enfance que des souvenirs purs, en ne leur offrant que des exemples de vertu. L'éducation de Montaigne confirme cette idée. La raison naissante fut soustraite à l'influence des préjugés qui régnaient autour de lui. Son père le sépara, pour ainsi dire, de sa nation et de son siècle, et le rendit contemporain des héros et des sages de l'antiquité. Rome libre et vertueuse devint sa patrie; la langue de Virgile et de Cicéron lui fournit les signes de ses premières idées; et ce fut ainsi qu'il contracta l'habitude de penser avec justesse, de s'exprimer avec énergie, et d'agir avec rectitude. On était peut-être loin de prévoir tous les effets qu'un tel plan d'éducation devait produire. Montaigne entra dans le monde comme dans un pays étranger dont il fut obligé d'étudier la langue, les habitudes, et les mœurs. On essaya de l'y fixer; mais il reconnut bientôt que nulle place ne convenait à son caractère formé pour l'independance.

* Lisez les Pensées de Pascal, chap. I., contre l'indifférence des Athées. Lisez aussi sa vie, par Madame Périer. En voyant les efforts incroyables que fit Pascal pour arriver à cet état d'impassibilité qu'il regardait comme un état de perfection, on ne peut s'empêcher de plaindre son erreur, et de gémir sur la faiblesse humaine et sur le sort d'un si beau genie.

il ne se jeta point dans la solitude; mais il se fit une retraite intérieure où il pouvait en quelque sorte retirer son âme au milieu des plaisirs du monde, et même de l'agitation des cours. Des passions vives troublèrent son repos; l'amour, "ce mal qui peut-être est un * bien," lui fit souffrir, dit-il, "toutes les rages que les poëtes disent advenir à ceux qui s'y laissent aller sans ordre et sans mesure." Mais il avait une âme trop forte pour céder lâchement à la tyrannie des passions. Il ne chercha point, il est vrai, à étouffer cette flamme céleste qui donne tant d'empire à la beauté, et tant de charme aux heures les plus douces de la vie: elle échauffa son cœur sans éblouir sa raison. Ce fut toujours pour lui un commerce plein d'attraits que celui des belles et honnêtes femmes; mais il savait que c'est un commerce "où il faut se tenir un peu sur ses gardes." Au demeurant, il faisait grand compte de l'esprit, "pourvu que le corps n'en fût pas à dire; car, à répondre en conscience, si l'une ou l'autre des deux beautés devait nécessairement y faillir, il eût choisi de quitter plutôt la spirituelle." Ces pensées plus vraies que sentimentales offenseront peut-être la délicatesse de notre siècle; mais, dans la vie comme dans les écrits de Montaigne, on trouve l'histoire et non le roman du cœur humain. Si les discours familiers de Socrate nous étaient parvenus tels que ses disciples ont dû les entendre, lorsqu'il fécondait par la puissance de sa raison les germes intellectuels qui restent inactifs au fond des âmes; nous y trouverions sans doute une analogie frappante avec les Essais, qui sont aussi des conversations d'un ordre supérieur.

C'est d'après cet ouvrage qu'on peut juger quel charme et quel intérêt devait offrir le commerce intime de ce vrai philosophe, lorsque "se mettant au dehors et en évidence," il se livrait tout entier à l'amitié. L'orgueil, qui tend à isoler les hommes, et cette espèce de réserve dédaigneuse qui sert trop souvent de voile à la médiocrité, n'étaient point à son usage. Mais dans les conférences même les plus sérieuses qu'il nommait "l'exercice des âmes," il désirait que le plaisir se joignit à l'instruction. Son esprit vif, éclairé, "prime-sautier," se tournait sans effort vers la vérité, comme certaines plantes se tournent vers le soleil. Il n'oubliait jamais la dignité qui convient a l'homme que ses lumières et ses talens séparent du vulgaire; et il trouvait "que de servir de spectacle aux grands, et faire à l'envi parade de son esprit et de son caquet, c'est un métier très-messéant à un homme d'honneur." Le vrai moyen de connaître son caractère est d'examiner la conduite qu'il a tenue dans les circonstances difficiles où il fut placé. On le verra toujours sensible, élevé, généreux. Il avait jugé la gloire; et s'il l'a desiré, c'est pour associer à son immortalité le meilleur des pères et le plus vertueux des amis. Si, contre son inclination particulière, il obéit à la coutume, et qu'on lui choisisse une femme, il regarde l'accomplissement des devoirs domestiques comme le but principal de la vie. S'il est employé comme médiateur entre les chefs des partis contraires, il ne connaît d'autre politique que la bonne foi. "Il marche partout la tête haute, le visage et le cœur ouvert." Tandis que le crime triomphe, et que les lois se taisent, il ne cherche d'autre garantie pour sa sûreté personnelle que sa confiance même et le noble abandon de la vertu. Appelé deux fois, par les suffrages libres de ses concitoyens, à la première magistrature d'une ville illustrée, depuis long-temps, par des hommes de mérite dans tous les genres, il remplit avec courage et avec honneur des fonctions que les circonstances rendaient si pénibles. Il calma l'agitation des esprits, sut maintenir la tranquillité publique, et rentra dans la vie privée avec des souvenirs exempts de remords. Ses plus ardens ennemis n'ont osé démentir le témoignage qu'il s'est rendu à lui-même après une épreuve aussi décisive. "C'est pas un léger plaisir," s'écrie-t-il, "de se sentir préservé de la contagion d'un siècle gâté, et dire en soi: qui me verrait jusques dans l'âme, encore ne me trouverait-il coupable ni de l'affliction et ruine de personne, ni de vengeance ou d'envie, ni d'offense publique des lois, ni de faute à ma parole. Ces témoignages de la conscience plaisent, et nous est grand bénéfice que cette esjouissance naturelle, seul paiement qui jamais ne nous manque."

Je le demande avec confiance; n'est ce pas là l'effusion d'une âme pure; n'y reconnaissez-vous pas l'accent modeste de la vérité? Cette franchise n'est plus dans nos mœurs. On parle rarement de son propre mérite, et plus rarement encore du mérite des autres, à moins d'un intérêt bien positif; mais cette réserve, qui maintient la paix entre toutes les prétensions, n'est peut-être qu'un refinement de l'amour-propre, et que le voile transparent de l'orgueil. Ce ne fut donc qu'après avoir payé sa dette de citoyen que Montaigne chercha la solitude et le repos. Dans sa retraite ouverte à tous les partis, et comme il s'exprime lui-même, "vierge de sang," il s'offre à mon imagination, tel qu'on homme placé sur un tour élevée, qui contemple l'océan battu de la tempête, presente des feux salutaires aux navigateurs errans dans les ténèbres, et plaint le sort des malheureux qu'il ne peut secourir, et que les vagues soulevées brisent sur les écueils. On ne saurait trop admirer cette philanthropie naturelle qui me paraît le trait le plus frappant de son caractère et de ses écrits. Ah! sans doute, cette pieuse humanité a son origine dans le cœur; mais elle s'accroit et devient plus active par la culture des lettres et de la philosophie. Oui, l'étude bien dirigée adoucit les mœurs, modère les passions, et nous familiarise avec tous les sentimens vertueux. C'est à l'étude que Montaigne avait recours pour charmer sa solitude et consoler sa viellesse. "Ses Livres étaient la meilleure munition qu'il eut trouvée en cet humain voyage."

C'est dans ce commerce intime avec les grands hommes de l'antiquité qu'il reposait son âme, fatiguée du spectacle des malheurs publics, apprenait à soutenir le poids de la mauvaise fortune; et se donnait à lui-même "rendezvous à sa derniere heure, pour juger ses opinions et sa vie entière."

J'aime à me le représenter tel qu'il se peint lui-même "feuilletant à cette heure un livre, à cette heure un autre; sans ordre et sans dessein, à pièces décousues; tantôt revant, tantôt enrégistrant ses songes."

Je cite ses propres paroles; elles rappellent à l'esprit ces songes que les anciens respectaient comme les révélations d'une intelligence supérieure. On reproche à Montaigne de revenir trop souvent sur lui-même; et l'on oublie "qu'il s'était fait la matière de son livre." Pour moi, je voudrais qu'il eût écrit l'histoire de sa vie comme celle de ses pensées. Avec quel intérêt ne le suivrions nous pas dans une cour élégante et corrom-pue, dévote et licencieuse, où régnait cette Médicis qui confondit l'intrigue avec la politique, et la cruauté avec la force. Que ne puis-je retrouver les détails de ses entrevues avec ce duc de Guise, personnage d'une stature héroïque, à qui peut-être il n'a manqué qu'une volonté plus ferme pour fonder une dynastie royale; avec cet immortel Henri, auquel rien ne manqua pour faire le bonheur de son peuple! J'aimerais à savoir en quelles circonstances les vapeurs de l'ambition ont pu fermenter dans une tête aussi forte que celle de Montaigne; en quelle occasion il fut décoré de l'ordre du Prince, à une époque où il était encore honorable de le recevoir. Combien je me plairais à le suivre lorsque, sorti pur du séjour de la corruption, il parcourt différentes contrées, ôtant partout le masque des hommes et des choses. Ses voyages, qu'une ardente curiosité a tirés de l'oubli, ne sont qu'un simple itinéraire. Toutefois, je retrouve Montaigne lorsqu' arrivé dans l'ancienne patrie des maîtres du monde, il reçoit le titre de citoyen romain qui n'avait plus rien d'illustre, mais qu'il préférait à tous les autres: tant le nom seul de Rome charmait son imagination remplie des grands souvenirs de l'antiquité! A peine a-t-il touché cette terre des héros, que son génie s'enflamme et que son cœur s'émeut. On le prendrait pour un voyageur long-temps éloigné de sa patrie, qui ne retrouverait à son retour, ni les amis qu'il y avait laissés, ni les chef-d'œuvres des arts qui la décoraient; il erre parmi ces débris comme l'ombre de quelque vieux Romain, cherchant de tous côtés, et ce sénat arbitre des rois, où les talens firent une si longue alliance avec la vertu; et ce forum où la parole exerçait une autorité sans limites; et ce Capitole dominateur où tous les Dieux de l'univers étaient convoqués par le génie de Rome. Tout avait disparu, jusqu'aux ruines de ces augustes monumens. Montaigne doute s'il voit le tombeau de l'antique souveraine des nations, et craint que sa sépulture même ne soit ensevelie. Il en contemple les moindres vestiges avec un enthousiasme mêlé de régrets. Ce fut avec peine qu'il abandonna cet ancien théâtre de l'héroïsme et de la gloire; et il s'arracha de Rome comme on s'exile de sa patrie. Quelque temps après son retour en France, le fanatisme religieux, se ranimant avec une nouvelle fureur, ébranla l'état jusques dans ses fondemens. Deux cultes rivaux, aveugles dans leurs haines, cruels dans leurs vengeances, se disputaient les lambeaux ensanglantés de la monarchie; et les torches de la révolte allumées à Rome et à Madrid répandaient au loin l'incendie et la mort. Un autre fléau se joignit à celui des guerres civiles. La peste ravagea ce que le glaive avait épargné. Les champs incultes se dépeuplerent, et la famine vint mettre le comble aux malheurs publics.* Ce fut alors que la retraite du sage fut violé pour le première fois. Atteint d'une infirmité douloureuse, Montaigne erra quelque temps avec sa famille, n'ayant d'autre appui que la philosophie qui ne l'abandonna jamais, et ne sachant où trouver un asile contre tant de calamités réunies. Enfin la France respira de nouveau sous l'administration paternelle du meilleur des rois. Montaigne revit ses foyers, et ne songea plus qu'à jouir du repos; et de cette paix de l'âme, douce récompense de la vertu. Tout se réparait autour de lui; mais il avait fait une de ces pertes qui ne peuvent se réparer, et dont le souvenir, adouci par le temps, est encore un des charmes de l'existence. Il avait survécu à son ami; mais si la Boëtie ne vivait plus pour lui, il vivait pour la Boëtie; et le soin de sauver de l'oubli la memoire d'un ami si vivement regretté, était la plus douce occupation de ses loisirs. C'est à ce soin religieux que nous devons le beau chapitre de l'amitié où Montaigne s'élève au-dessus de toute comparison. Aussi méthodique que l'orateur romain, Montaigne l'emporte sur lui par la chaleur et la verité des sentimens. Ses pensées, ses paroles même, ont quelque chose de sacré. Ces mouvemens passionés; ces retours fréquens sur lui-même et sur son ami; cet abandon d'une âme fortement émue; tout s'imprime dans le cœur, tout saisit l'imagination. Jamais l'eloquence du sentiment n'a produit tant d'effet; jamais le langage de l'amitié ne fut plus sublime. Heureux qui peut le comprendre, plus heureux qui peut l'inspirer! L'amitié, telle que Montaigne et la Boëtie l'ont éprouvée, cette union intime de deux esprits éclairés, de deux âmes vertueuses étonne aujourd'hui notre faiblesse et notre stérile égoisme. Ce fut au fond de leur cœur qu'ils retrouvèrent cette passion héroïque que nous avons perdue, et dont l'antiquité nous a transmis quelques touchans souvenirs. Montaigne était digne de renouveler cette noble alliance du génie et de la vertu. Nul n'a rendu des services plus éminens à la raison humaine: envisagé comme moraliste, il a fondé la vraie philosophie en France; consideré comme écrivain, il a contribué aux progrés de la langue; ami de l'ordre et des lois, il fut sage sans affecter la sagesse, et passe au travers d'une génération barbare et fanatique, sans participer à ses excès et à sa corruption. Enfin, après avoir élevé un monument utile aux hommes et glorieux pour sa mémoire, il vit arriver la mort avec la tranquillite d'un philosophe qui, pendant toute sa vie, avait appris à mourir. Fidèle à ses principes, il finit comme Socrate, "en se conformant aux façons et formes reçues autour de lui," et sa dernière pensée fut un dernier hommage à la religion de ses pères.

Après avoir ressemblé les traits principaux qui m'ont paru caractériser Montaigne, j'oserai dire comme lui: "C'est ici un ouvrage de bonne foi." Tel il s'est montré à mes regards; tel je l'ai representé aux vôtres sans chercher à exagérer, par le faste des paroles, le merite d'un homme ennemi de toute espèce d'exagération. Comment aurais-je pu outrager, par la flatterie, les mânes de ce philosophe qui, dans son livre, a condamné d'avance les flatteurs par ces expressions remarquables: "Je reviendrais volontiers de l'autre monde pour démentir celui qui me présenterait sous une autre forme que la mienne, fût-ce pour m'honorer." Pourquoi ce vœu d'une âme élevée ne peut-il s'accomplir? Que n'est-il en mon pouvoir de ranimer sa cendre? Vous le verriez paraître rayonnant de gloire au milieu de vous; et, s'il m'était permis de lui addresser quelques mots, je lui dirais au nom de tous les amis de la verité: "Jouis de la reconnoissance des hommes de bien. Entends la voix des siècles qui te place au premier rang des écrivains philosophes! Comme ces anciens génies dont tu fus l'admirateur et le rival, tu as survécu à ta langue, et tes pensées sont venues la propriété commune des nations. La lumière que tu répandais autour de toi est arrivée jusqu'à nous; elle a éclairé plusieurs générations, et brille encore d'un nouvel éclat. Sans doute, le faible hommage que nous te rendons aujourd'hui ne peut rien ajouter à ta renommée; mais nous l'avons appris par ton exemple: il est toujours utile de rappeler la memoire des hommes illustres parl eurs talens et lèurs vertus. L'art de la parole s'épure et s'ennoblit en célébrant les bien-faiteurs de l'humanité, et l'éloge d'un sage est un triomphe pour la raison."

DANS tous les siècles ou l'esprit humain se perfectionne par la culture des arts, on voit nâitre des hommes supérieurs, qui reçoivent la lumiére et la répandent, et vont plus loin que leurs contemporains, en suivant les mêmes traces. Quelque chose de plus rare, c'est un génie qui ne doive rien à son siècle, ou plutôt qui, malgré son siècle, par la seule force de sa pensée, se place, de lui-meme, à côté des écrivains les plus parfaits, nés dans les temps les plus polis: tel est Montaigne. Penseur profond, sous le règne du pédantisme, auteur brillant et ingénieux dans une langue informe et grossière, il écrit avec le secours de sa raison et des anciens: son ouvrage reste, et fait seul toute la gloire littéraire d'une nation; et lorsque, aprés de longues années, sous les auspices de quelques génies sublimes, qui s'élancent à la fois, arrive enfin l'âge du bon goût et du talent, cet ouvrage, long temps unique, demeure toujours original; et la France, enrichie tout à coup de tant de brillantes merveilles, ne sait refroidir son admiration pour ces antiques et naïves beautés. Un siècle nouveau succéde, aussi fameux que le précédent, plus éclairé peut-être, plus exercé à juger, plus difficile à satisfaire, parce qu'il peut comparer davantage: cette second épreuve n'est pas moins favorable à la gloire de Montaigne. On l'entend mieux, on l'imite plus hardiment; il sert à rajeunir la littérature, qui commençait a s'épuiser; il inspire nos plus illustres écrivains; et ce philosophe du siècle de Charles IX. semble fait pour instruire le dix-huitieme siècle. Quel est ce prodigieux mérite qui survit aux variations du langage, aux changemens des Mœurs. C'est le naturel et la vérité; voilà le charme qui ne peut vieillir. La grandeur des idées, l'artifice du style ne suffisent pas pour qu'un écrivain plaise toujours: et ce n'est pas seulement de siècle en siècle, et à de longs intervalles, que le goût change, et que les ouvrages éprouvent des fortunes diverses: dans la vie même de l'homme, il est un période où, détrompés de le monde idéal que les passions fourmaient autour de nous, ne sachant plus excuser des illusions qui ne se retrouvent plus dans nos cœurs, perdant l'enthousiasme avec la jeunesse, et réduits à ne plus aimer que la raison, nous devenons moins sensibles aux plus éclantes beautés de l'eloquence et de la poésie. Mais qui pourrait se lasser d'un livre de bonne foy † écrit par un homme de génie? Ces épanchemens familiers de l'auteur, ces révélations inattendues sur de grands objets et sur des bagatelles, en donnant à ses écrits la formé d'une longue confidence, font disparaître la peine l'égère que l'on éprouve à lire un ouvrage de moral. On croit converser; et comme la conversation est piquante et variée, que souvent nous y venons à notre tour, que celui qui nous instruit a soin de nous répéter, Ce n'est pas icy ma doctrine, c'est mon étude, nous avoue ses faiblesses, pour nous convaincre des nôtres, et nous corrige sans nous humilier, jamais on ne se laisse de l'entrétien.

† Expression de Montaigne.

PREMIERE PARTIE.

L'HOMME, dès qu'il sut réfléchir, s'étonna de lui-même, et sentit le besoin de se connâitre. Les premiers sages furent ceux qui s'occuperent de cette importante étude. Ils voulurent d'abord pénétrer trop avant; de-là tous les rêves de l'antiquité, quand elle espéra lever le voile mysterieux qui cache l'origine et les destinés de l'homme. Les efforts furent plus heureux dans des recherches moins ambiteuses. Socrate, dit-on, ramena le premier la philosophie sur la terre. Il en fit une science usuelle qui s'appliquait à nos besoins et à nos faiblesses; science d'observation et de raisonnement qui nous prenait tels que nous sommes, pour nous rendre tels que nous devons être, et nous étudiait pour nous corriger. Considerée sous ce point de vue, la morale ne peut se trouver que chez les peuples civilisées; elle suppose des esprits développés par l'exercise de la reflexion, et des caracteres mis en jeu par les rapports de la vie sociale. Aussi la voyons-nous passer de la Grèce dans Rome, lorsque Rome victorieuse fut devenue savante et polie. Mais, depuis la chûte de l'empire Romain, cette science, il faut l'avouer, resta longtemps ignorée des peuples de l'Europe. Le pédantisme et la superstition ne sont guères favorables à l'étude réfléchie que l'esprit humain fait sur lui-même; et la scholastique est bien loin de la morale.

En Italie même, où la génie des arts fut si précoce, la saine raison tarda long-temps à paraître; et pour la trouver en France, il faudrait aller jusqu'aux belles années de Louis-le-Grand, si Montaigne n'avait paru dès la seizième siècle.

Né d'un père qui chérissait la science, sans la juger ni la connaître, et voulait donner à son fils un bien dont il était privé lui-même, il eut, dès le berceau, un précepteur à côté de sa nourrice et apprit, pour ainsi dire, à bégayer dans la langue latine. Cette première facilité determina son gôut pour la lecture, et le jeta naturellement dans l'étude de l'antiquité, qui presentait à son esprit, avide de connaître, des plaisirs toujours nouveaux, sans le fatiguer par les efforts qu' exige l'intelligence d'un idiôme etranger.

Poètes, orateurs, historiens, philosophes, il dévore tout avec un égale ardeur. Il va de Rome dans la Grèce, qu'il ne connut jamais aussi bien, parce qu'il ne la connut pas dès l'enfance ; mais il trouve dans Amyot un interprète agréable, un guide auquel il aime à se confier. Bientot il sent que pour connaître les hommes, il ne suffit pas de l'étudier dans l'historie : il voyage ; et, quoique les peuples modernes fussent encore bien peu avancés, il ne les compare point, sans utilité ni sans intérêt, avec ces Grecs et ces Romains qui leur étaient si supérieurs, et qui lui étaient si familiers. Une imagination vive et curieuse lui fait parcourir mille objets ; une disposition particulière de son esprit lui fait observer tout ce qui se rapporte à l'homme, ses lois, ses mœurs, ses coutumes, et l'intéresse non seulement à l'histoire générale, mais, pour ainsi dire, aux anecdotes de l'espèce humaine. Enfin parvenu à l'âge mur, il s'amuse à se rappeler tout ce qu'il a vu, senti, pensé, decouvert, en soi-même ou dans les autres. Il jette ses idèes dans l'ordre, ou plutôt dans le désordre où elles se présentent, tantôt s'élevant aux plus sublimes spéculations de l'ancienne philosophie, tantôt descendant aux plus simples détails de la vie commune, parlant de tout, se mêlant toujours lui-même à ses discours, et faisant de cette espèce d'egoïsme, si insupportable dans les livres ordinaires, le plus grand charme du sien.

L'ouvrage de Montaigne est un vast répertoire de souvenirs, et de réflexions nées de ces souvenirs. Son inépuisable mémoire met à sa disposition tout ce que les hommes ont pensé. Son jugement, son gôut, son instinct, son caprice même, lui fournissent aisément des pensées nouvelles. Sur chaque sujet, il commence par dire tout ce qu'il sait, et, ce qui vaut mieux, il finit par dire ce qu'il croit. Cet homme, qui, dans la discussion, cite toutes les autorités, écoute tous les partis, accueille toutes les opinions, lorsqu' enfin il vient à décider, ne consulte plus que lui seul, et donne son avis, non comme bon, mais comme sien. Une telle marche est longue, mais elle est agréable, elle est instructive, elle apprend à douter ; et ce commencement de la sagesse en est quelquefois le dernier terme. Peutêtre aussi, cette manière de composer convenait mieux au caractére de Montaigne, ennemi d'un long travail et d'une application soutenue. Il parle beaucoup de morale, de politique, de littérature ; il agite, à la fois, mille questions ; mais il ne propose jamais un système. La réserve tient à sa paresse autant qu'à son jugement. Il lui en couterait de poser des principes, de tirer des conséquences, et d établir, à force de raisonnemens, la vérité, ou ce l'on prend pour elle. Cette enterprise lui paraitrait trop laborieuse, et la justesse de son esprit l'avertit que souvent elle ne serait pas moins inutile que téméraire. Il aime mieux se borner à ce qu'il voit au moment où il parle, et semble vouloir n'affirmer qu'une chose à la fois. Ce n'est pas le moyen de faire secte ; aussi, jamais philosophe n'en fut plus éloigné que Montaigne. Il dit trop naïvement et le pour et le contre. Au moment où vous croyez tenir sa pensée, vous êtes deconcerté par un changement soudain, qu'au reste il ne prevoyait pas lui-même plus que vous. Une pareille incertitude, qui prouve plus de franchise que de faiblesse, n'aurait pas dû, ce semble, exciter la sévère indignation de Pascal. Cet inexorable moraliste, si grand par son génie encore audessus de ses ouvrages, ne craint pas d'affirmer que Montaigne met toutes choses dans un doute si universel et si général, que l'homme, doutant même s'il doute, son incertitude roule sur elle-même dans un cercle perpétuel et sans repos.

Pascal n'abuse-t-il pas ici de la puissance de son imagination, pour imposer à notre faiblesse par l' energie de la parôle? Quel est ce fantôme d'incredulité qu'il prend plaisir à elever lui-même, pour l'écraser aisément sous le poids de son invincible eloquence ? où peut-il donc trouver dans les aveux d'un philosophe si ingénieux et si modeste, cet incorrigible pyrrhonien, poursuivi par le doute jusque dans son doute même, et changeant de folie, sans pouvoir en guérir ? Montaigne n'a jamais douté ni de Dieu, ni de la vértu. L'apologie de Raymond de Sébond renferme l'eloquente profession de foi sur l'existence de la divinité ; et les orateurs sacrés n'ont jamais peint avec plus de force les tourments du vice, et la joie de la bonne conscience.

Du reste, Montaigne trouve dans la nature de l'homme de terribles difficultés, et d'inconcevables mystères ; il regarde en pitié les erreurs de notre raison, la faiblesse et l'incertitude de notre entendement, il affecte un moment de nous ravaler jusqu'aux bêtes ; et Pascal l'approuve alors.

Ce sublime contempteur des misères de l'homme, triomphe de voir * la superbe raison froissée par ses propres armes. Il aimerait, dit-il, de tout son cœur le ministre d'une si grande vengeance. Pourquoi donc, O Pascal, défendiez-vous tout-a-l'heure à un sage de se défier de cette raison que vous-même reconnaissez si faible et si trompeuse ? Voulez-vous maintenant le conduire par l'impuissance de penser à la nécessité de croire, et vous semble-t-il qu'il soit besoin de lui arracher le flambeau de la raison pour le précipiter dans la foi ? La Métaphysique de Montaigne se réduit donc à un petit nombre de vérités essentielles, qui demandent peu d'efforts pour êtres saisies. Sur tout le reste il est dans l'ignorance et il ne s'en facha pas. Peut-être seulement a-t-il le tort de rapporter avec trop de complaisance les opinions de ceux qui n'ont pas craint d'expliquer tant de choses qu'ils n'entendaient pas mieux que lui. Mais son incertitude, son † incuriosité se fait-elle sentir dans les principes de sa morale ? a-t-il les mêmes doutés lorsqu'il s'agit de nos devoirs ? Comme il siérait mal d'employer l'art des rhéteurs avec un écrivain qui s'en est tant moqué, nous avouerons que si l'on peut disculper sa philosophie d'un pyrrhonisme absolu, sa morale tient beaucoup de l'école d'épicure. Sans doute il voulait qu'elle fut d'usage. Cette philosophie sublime, qui veut changer l'homme au lieu de le régler, en lui présentant pour modéle la perfection désesperante d'une vertu idéale, le dispense trop souvent de la réaliser : la leçon ne paraît pas faite pour nous ; l'exemple est pris dans une autre nature ; on peut d'admirer, mais chacun trouve en soi le droit de ne pas l'imiter. Si vous voulez qu'on tâche d'atteindre au but, ne le mettez pas hors de la portée commune. Le sage, pour faire monter la foule jusqu'à lui, doit se pen-cher vers elle. C'est le mouvement naturel de Montaigne. Il vient à nous le premier, en nous montrant les imperfections de son esprit, ses erreurs, ses torts, ses petitesses ; mais jamais il n'a rien de bas ni de criminel à nous révéler ; et ce bonheur, ou cette discrétion, me paraît plus utile pour le lecteur, que la franchise trop peu mesurée de Rousseau. J'apprends dans les aveux du premier quelles peuvent être les fautes d'un honnête homme ; et si j'apprends à les excuser, en revanche, je m'habitue à ne pas en concevoir d'autres : mais je craindrais, en lisant Rousseau, d'arrêter trop long-temps mes regards sur de coupables faiblesses qu'il faut toujours tenir loin de soi, et dont la peinture trop fidèle est plus dangereuse pour le cœur, qu'elle n'est instructive pour la raison.

Montaigne, je l'avoue, ne connaît pas l'art d'anéantir les passions : il reclamerait volontiers, avec La Fontaine, contre cette philosophie rigide qui fait cesser de vivre avant que l'on soit mort. Il aime à vivre, c'est-à-dire, à goûter les plaisirs que permet la nature bien ordonnée. Pour moi, dit-il, j'aime la vie et la cultive, telle qu'il a plu à Dieu nous l'octroyer. Il croit que c'est le parti de la sagesse et qu'on serait coupable autant que malheureux de se refuser l'usage des biens que nous avons reçus en partage. On fait tort à ce grand et tout-puissant donneur de refuser son don, l'annuller et disfigurer. Tout bon, il a fait tout bon. Ces maximes peuvent être rejetées par quelques esprits austères, qui ne conçoivent pas de vertu sans combat, et jugent du mérite par l'effort. Elles pourraient être dangereuses pour quelques âmes ardentes et passionnées, que leurs desirs emporteraient trop loin, et qui doivent être retenues parce qu'elles ne savent pas s'arrêter. Mais Montaigne s'addresse à ceux qui, comme lui, éprouverent plutôt les faiblesses que les fureurs des passions ; et c'est le grand nombre. Il est le conseiller qui leur convient. Il ne les effraie pas sur leurs fautes qui lui paraissent une conséquence de leur nature. Il ne s'indigne pas de cette alternative de bien et de mal, qu'il regarde comme une faiblesse dont il trouve l'explication en lui-même. Il ne désespere personne, il est mécontent ni de lui, ni des autres. Ses principes ne sont jamais sévères : s'ils pouvaient l'être, ses exemples seraient là pour nous défendre et nous rassurer. Il ne cherche donc pas à nous faire peur de vice ; peut-être ne croit-il pas en avoir le droit ; mais il s'efforce de nous séduire à la vertu, qu'il appelle qualité plaisante et gaye. Pour dernier terme, il nous propose le plaisir, et c'est au bien qu'il nous conduit.

La Morale de Montaigne n'est pas sans doute assez parfaite pour des chrétiens ; il serait à souhaiter qu'elle servît de guide à tous ceux qui n'ont pas le bonheur de l'être. Elle formera toujours un bon citoyen et un honnête homme. Elle n'est pas fondée sur l'abnégation de soi-même, mais elle a pour premier principe la bienveillance envers les autres, sans distinction de pays, de mœurs, de croyance religieuse. Elle nous instruit à chérir le gouvernement sous lequel nous vivons à respecter les lois aux quelles nous sommes soumis, sans mépriser le gouvernment et les lois des autres nations, nous avertissent de ne pas croire que nous ayons seuls le dépôt de la justice et de la vérité. Elle n'est pas heroïque, mais elle n'a rien de faible : souvent même elle agrandit, elle transporte notre âme par la peinture des fortes vertus de l'antiquité, par le mépris des choses mortelles, et l'enthousiasme des grandes vérités. Mais bientôt elle nous ramène à la simplicité de la vie commune, nous y fixe par un nouvel attrait, et semble ne nous avoir élevés si haut dans ses théories sublimes, qui pour nous réduire avec plus d'avantage à la facile pratique des devoirs habituels et des vertus ordinaires.

Ces divers principes de conduite ne sont jamais, chez Montaigne, énoncés en leçons : il a trop de haine pour le ton doctoral ; mais c'est le résumé des confidences qu'il laisse échapper en mille endroits. Il nous dit ce qu'il fait, ce qu'il voudrait faire. Il nous peint ce qu'il appelle sa vertu, confessant que c'est bien peu de chose, et que tout l'honneur en appartient à la nature plutôt qu'à lui. On a trouvé de l'orgueil dans cette méthode d'un homme qui rappelle tout à soi, et se fait centre de tout : elle n'est que raisonnable, et porte sur une vérité : tous les hommes se ressemblent au fond. Malgré les différences que met entre eux l'inégalité des talens, des caractères et des conditions, il est, si je puis parler ainsi, un air de famille commun à tous. A mesure qu'on a plus d'esprit, on trouve, dit Pascal, qu'il y a plus d'hommes originaux. N'est il pas également vrai de dire qu'avec plus d'esprit encore, on découvrirait l'homme original, dont tous les hommes ne sont que des nuances et des variétés, qui le reproduisent avec diverses alterations, mais ne le dénaturent jamais ? Voilà ce que Montaigne a voulu trouver, et ce qu'il ne pouvait chercher qu'en lui même. C'est ainsi qu'il nous jugeait en s'appréciant, et qu'il faisant notre histoire, en nous racontant la sienne. Mais en même temps qu'il étudie dans lui même le caractère de l'homme, il étudie dans tous les hommes les modifications sans nombre dont ce caractère est susceptible. De là tant de recits sur tous le peuples du monde, sur leurs religions, leurs lois, leurs usages, leur préjugés ; de là cette immense collection d'anecdotes antiques et modernes sur tous sujets et en tous genres ; enterprises hardies, sages conseils, exemples de vices ou de vertus, fautes, erreurs, faiblesses, pensées ou paroles remarquables. De là cette foule nombre de figures différentes, qui passent tour à tour devant nos yeux, depuis les philosophes d'Athènes jusqu'aux sauvages du Canada. Placé au milieu de ce tableau mouvant, Montaigne voit et entend tous les personnages, les confrontant avec lui même, et se persuadant de plus en plus que la coutume décide presque de tout : qu'il n'y a du reste qu'un petit nombre de choses assurées qu'il faut croire, quelques choses probables qu'il faut discuter, beaucoup de choses convenues qu'il faut respecter pour le bien général. Mais si le scepticisme de Montaigne, plus modéré que celui de tant d'autres philosophes, ne touche jamais aux principes conservateurs de l'ordre social, sa raison en a d'autant plus de force pour attaquer les préjugés ridicules ou funestes, dont ses contemporains étaient infatués ; et d'abord n'oublions pas que le siècle de Montaigne était encore le temps de l'astrologie, des sorciers, des faux miracles, et de ces guerres de religion, les plus cruelles de toutes ; n'oublions pas que les hommes les plus respectables partageaient les erreurs et la crédulité du vulgaire ; et qu'enfin, écrivant plusieurs années après l'auteur des Essais, le judicieux de Thou rapportait, et croyait peut être, toutes les absurdités merveilleuses qui font rire de pitié dans un siècle éclairé. Combien aimerons-nous alors que Montaigne sache trouver la cause de tant d'erreurs dans notre curiosité et dans notre vanité ! S'agit-il d'un fait incroyable ? Nous disons : * Comment est ce que cela fait? et nous découvrons une raison; mais se fait-il? eût été mieux dit. Une fois persuadés, nous croyons que * C'est ouvrage de charité de persuader les autres, et pour ce faire, chacun ne craint pas d'ajouter de son invention autant qu'il en voit être nécessaire à son conte, pour suppléer à la résistance et au défaut qu'il pense être en la conception d'autruy. Et c'est ainsi que les sottises s'accreditent et se perpétuent. Il est des sottises qui ne sont que ridicules, il en est d'affreuses. Montaigne se moque des unes, et combat les autres avec les armes de la raison et de l'humanité. Il plaint ces malheureuses victimes de la superstition de leurs juges et de la leur, qui s'attribuaient un pouvoir sacrilége sur toute la nature, et ne pouvaient échapper aux flammes du bûcher.

On a beaucoup parlé des paradoxes de Montaigne. Quelques uns surtout ont reçu de la plume d'un écrivain éloquent une célébrité nouvelle, qui nous oblige d'en rendre à leur veritable auteur ou la gloire ou le blâme. Personne n'ignore que, dans le fameuse question proposée par l'Académie de Dijon, le philosophe Genevois, en se déclarant avec une sorte d'animosité le détracteur des Sciences et des Arts, en affectant de les accuser en son nom, ne fait cependant que répéter les reproches que l'auteur des Essais avait alléguées deux siècles avant lui. J'ajouterai qu'en les répétant, il les exagère, et, que voulant faire un système de ce qui n'est chez son modele qu'une opinion légèrement hasardée, comme tant d'autres, il s'éloigne beaucoup plus de la vérité, et tombe dans une plus choquante erreur. Il est permis d'être sévère avec Rousseau, la plus rigoureuse censure n'atteindra jamais jusqu'à sa gloire; ses admirateurs même peuvent lui reprocher en général d'outrer les idées qu'il emprunte. Si Montaigne nous dit avec autant de verité que de bonhommie :—Nous avons abandonné nature, et lui voulons apprendre sa leçon, elle qui nous menait si heureusement et si sûrement. Rousseau ne craint pas de nous redire:—Tout est bien sortant des mains de l'auteur des choses, tout dégénère entre les mains de l'homme. C'est ainsi que l'Emile peut souvent paraître une exagération des idées de Montaigne, sur l'education de l'enfance, et l'art de former les hommes.

Ce n'est pas que, sur plusieurs points de cet intéressant sujet, Rousseau ne mérite notre reconnaissance, pour avoir renouvellé, avec toutes les séductions de son talent, des vérités utiles et trop négligées. La nécessité de diriger avec soin les premières années de l'enfance, de prendre ses inclinations des le berceau, et de les conduire, ou plutôt de les laisser aller au bien, sans gêne et sans effort, la grande importance de l'éducation physique, les exercises du corps tournant au profit de l'ame, l'art de former la raison, en l'accoutumant à si faire des idées plutôt que d'en recevoir, l'inutilité des études qui n'occupent que la memoire, le secret de faire trouver les choses au lieu de les montrer: tant d'autres idées qui n'en sont pas moins vraies pour être peu suivies, ont heureusement passé des écrits de Montaigne dans l'ouvrage de Rousseau. Montaigne haïssait le pédantisme, mais il aimait la science. Quoiqu'il en ait médit quelque fois, il convient que c'est un grand ornament et un outil de merveilleux service. Cependant ce qu'il exige avant tout dans un gouverneur, c'est le jugement. Je veux, dit-il, qu'il ait plutôt la tête bien faite que bien plein. Quand le gouverneur aura formé le jugement de son élève, il peut lui permettre l'étude de toutes les sciences. Notre âme s'élargit, d'autant plus qu'elle se remplit. Ce langage n'est pas celui d'un ennemi des lettres. Et comment Montaigne aurait-il pu se défendre de les aimer! Elles firent l'occupation et la charme de sa vie; elles élevèrent sa raison au-dessus de celle de ses contemporains, qui les etudiaient aussi, mais qui ne savaient pas s'en servir. Elles firent de lui un sage, et, ce qu'il estimait peut-être bien plus, un homme heureux. Telle est idée que je me forme de Montaigne, considéré comme philosophe et comme moraliste; jamais d'exagération, jamais de système orgueilleusement chimérique, quelquefois des idées incertaines, parce qu'il y a beaucoup d'incertitude dans l'esprit humain; toujours une candeur et une bonne foi qui feraient pardonner l'erreur même. Quand je me représente ces divers caractères, trop faiblement crayonés dans un éloge imparfait, et que j'essaie d'embrasser d'une seule vue un talent si varié, et de faire sentir par un dernier trait un merite si difficile à définir, je suis frappé de plusieurs resemblances sensibles que j'aperçois entre Montaigne et l'un de nos plus célèbres écrivains, le seul que l'on ne puisse comparer à personne. Je ne sais si je m'abuse: je crains qu'un parallele ne semble toujours un lieu commun, et qu'un rapprochement de Voltaire et de Montaigne ne soit au moins un paradoxe. Mais en écartant les plus brillantes productions de Voltaire, en me bornant à une seule partie de sa gloire, ses mèlanges de metaphysique et de morale, ne puis-je en effet établir plusieurs rapports remarquables entre deux hommes si différents? Des deux côtés, je vois un vaste lecture, une immense variété de souvenirs, et cette même mobilité d'imagination qui passe rapidement sur chaque objet, dans l'impatience de les parcourir tous à-la-fois. Des deux côtés, je suis étonné de tout le chemin que je fais en quelques instans, et du grand nombre d'idées que je trouve en quelques pages. Tous deux se montrent doués d'une raison supérieure. Montaigne, aussi vif, et cependant plus verbeux, plus diffus; c'est le tort de son siècle. Voltaire, quelquesfois moins profond, a toujours plus de justesse et de netteté; c'est le mérite du sien. Tous deux ont connu les faiblesses et les inconsequences du cœur humain; tous deux en rient. Le rire de Voltaire est amer, et ses railleries plus cruelles. Tous deux respirent l'amour de l'humanité. Celui de Voltaire est plus ardent, plus courageux, plus infatigable. On connaît assez la haine d'un et de l'autre pour le charlatanisme et l'hypocrisie. Montaigne a mieux su s'arrêter. Voltaire paraît quelquefois confondre les objets les plus saints de la vénération publique, avec de vaines superstitions, que l'on doit détruire par la ridicule. Tous deux ont pensé hardiment, et ont exprimé franchement leurs pensées. La franchise de Voltaire est plus maligne; et celle de Montaigné plus naïve, mais tous deux ont oublié trop souvent la décence dans les idées et même dans l'expression; et nous devenons leur en faire un reproche; car le plus grand tort du genie, c'est de faire rougir la pudeur, et d'offenser la vertu.

* Montaigne.

SECONDE PARTIE.

Si Montaigne n'avait que le mérite assez rare de dire souvent la vérité, il aurait, on peut le croire, comme Charron son imitateur, obtenu plus d'estime que de succès, et plus d'éloges que de lecteurs. Ceux mêmes qui préfèrent la raison à tout veulent encore qu'elle soit assez ornée pour être agréable; et l'on ne cherche pas l'instruction dans un livre où l'on craint de trouver l'ennui. Montaigne plaît, amuse, intéresse par la naïveté, l'énergie, la richesse de son style et les vives images dont il colore sa pensée. Ce charme se fait sentir aux hommes qui n'ont jamais réfléchi sur les secrets de l'art d'écrire; mais il mérite d'être particulièment analysé par tous ceux qui font leur étude de cet art si difficile, même pour le génie.

Je sais que l'on pourrait attribuer une partie du plaisir que donne le style de Montaigne à l'ancienneté de son langage. L'élégant Fénélon lui-même regrettait quelquefois l'idiôme de nos pères. Il y trouvait je ne sais quoi de court, de naïf, de hardi, de vif, et de passionné. On doit avouer en effet que les privilèges, ou plutôt les licences du vieux français, le retranchement des articles, l'usage des inversions, la hardiesse habituelle des tours, le grand nombre d'expressions proverbiales que les livres empruntaient à la conversation, l'abondance des termes et la facilité de les employer tous sans blesser la bienséance, tant d'autres libertés que nous avons remplacées par des entraves, favorisaient l'écrivain, et donnaient au style un air d'aisance et d'enjouement qui charme dans les sujets badins, et pourrait offrir un piquant contraste dans les sujets sérieux. Cependant la langue française n'avait encore réussi que dans les joyeusetés folâtres. Ronsard égarait son talent par une imitation mal-adroite des langues anciennes, et Amyot n'avait pu rendre que par une heureuse naïveté la précision énergique et l'élégance audacieuse de Plutarque. Il nous est donc permis de dire avec Voltaire, ce n'est pas le langage de Montaigne, c'est son imagination qu'il faut regretter. Je ne dissimulerai pas cependant que ces expressions d'une autre siècle, ces formes antiques et pour ainsi dire, ce premier débroullement d'une langue, aujourd'hui perfectionnée peut-être jusqu'au point d'être affaiblie, présentent un intérêt de curiosité qui peut inviter à la lecture. Mais l'emploi si naturel, les alliances si hardies, les effets si pittoresques de ces termes surannés; ces coupes savantes, ces mots pleins d'idées, ces phrases où, par la force du sens, l'auteur a trouvé l'expression qui ne peut vieillir, et diviné la langue de nos jours, voilà ce que l'on admire dans Montaigne, voilà ce qu'il n'a pas reçu de son idiôme encore rude et grossier, mais ce qu'il lui a donné par sa génie.

L'imagination est la qualité dominante du style de Montaigne. Cet homme n'a point de supérieur dans l'art de peindre par la parole. Ce qu'il pense, il la voit; et par la véracité de ses expressions, il le fait briller à tous les yeux. Telle était la prompte sensibilité de ses organes et l'activité de son âme. Il rendait les impressions aussi fortement qu'il les recevait.

Le philosophe Mallebranche, tout ennemi qu'il était de l'imagination, admire celle de Montaigne, et l'admire trop peut-être; il veut qu'elle fasse seule le mérite des Essais, et qu'elle y domine au préjudice de la raison. Nous n'accepterons pas un pareil éloge. Montaigne se sert de l'imagination pour produire au-dehors ses sentimens tels qu'ils sont empreints dans son âme. Sa chaleur vient de sa conviction; et ses paroles animées sont nécessaiérs pour toute sa pensée, et pour exprimer tous les mouvemens de son esprit. Quand je vois *ces braves formes de s'expliquer si vives et si profondes, je ne dis pas que c'est bien dire, je dis que c'est bien penser.

Il est vrai que lorsqu'il s'agit simplement de décrire et de montrer les objets, l'imagination n'a pas besoin du raisonnement; mais elle est toujours dans sa dépendance du gôut qui lui défend d'outrer la nature, et souvent ne lui permet pas de la peindre tout entière. Dirons-nous que, dans cette partie de l'art d'ecrire, l'auteur des Essais soit toujours irréprochable? non, sans doute; et l'on peut, dans quelques traits échappés à son pinceau trop libre et trop hardi, découvrir quelquesfois la marque d'un siècle grossier, dont la barbarie perce jusque dans la sagesse du grand homme qui devait le réformer. Mais que de beautés inimitables courvent et font disparaître ce petit nombre de fautes! Qu'elle abondance d'images, quelle vivacité de couleurs, quel cachet d'originalité! Combien l'expression est toujours à lui, lors même qu'il emprunte l'idée! Les abeilles pillotent de çà et de là les fleurs, mais elles en font après le miel qui est tout leur, ce n'est plus thym ni marjolaine. Voila tout Montaigne. C'est ainsi que les pensées et les images des auteurs anciens, fondues sans cesse dans ses écrits, sans perdre rien de leur force et de leur élévation, y prennent un caractère qui n'appartient qu'à sa plume.

Montaigne, si je puis m'exprimer ainsi, décrit la pensée comme il décrit les objets, par des détails, animés, qui la rendent sensible aux yeux. Son style est une allégerie toujours vrai, où toutes les abstractions de l'esprit revêtent une forme matérielle, prennent un corps, une visage, et se laissent, en quelque sorte, toucher et manier. S'il veut nous donner une idée de la vertu, il la placera dans une plaine fertile et fleurissante, où, qui en sait l'addresse, peut arriver par des routes gazonnées, ombrageuses et doux fleurantes. Il prolongera cette peinture avec la plus étonnante facilité d'expression, et quand il l'aura terminée pour en augmenter l'effet par le contraste, il nous montrera dans le lointain la chimérique vertu des philosophes sur un rocher à l'écart, parmi des ronces, fantosme à effrayer les gens. Je céderais au plaisir facile de citer beaucoup un écrivain qu'on aimera toujours mieux entendre que son panégyriste; mais à quels traits dois-je m'arrêter de preference, dans un ouvrage où tous les chapitres présentent des beautés diversement originales? C'est la manière de Montaigne qu'il faudrait citer. Je choisis une phrase énergique, ou spirituelle, ou gracieuse; le lis encore, et le recontre bientôt une nouvelle surprise non moins piquante que la première. Rien n'est semblable, et l'impression est la même. En effet, l'auteur des Essais, dans un travail libre et sans suite, n'écrivant que lorsqu'il se sent animé par sa pensée, son expression ne peut jamais faiblir; et des qu'il conçoit une idée, son style se prête à toutes les metamorphoses, pour la rendre plus heureusement. Ainsi, toujours renvoyé d'une page à l'autre, incertain où de fixer mon admiration, chaque fois que j'ouvre le livre je découvre quelque chose de plus dans l'auteur, et je désespère de pouvoir jamais saisir ni peindre un écrivain qui, non moins varié que fecond, se rénouvelle même en se répétant, et ne peut ajouter un trait à ses écrits, sans ajouter une nuance à son talent. Cependant ces différences sans nombre peuvent être ramenées à un principe, l'imitation des grands écrivains de l'ancienne Rome, et je ne crains pas d'assurer que l'on retrouverait dans le génie commun de leur langue, et dans l'usage divers qu'ils en ont fait, tous les secrets de l'idiome de Montaigne. On sait avec quelle constance il avait étudié ces grands génies, combien il avait vécu dans leur commerce et dans leur intimité. Doit-on s'étonner que son ouvrage porte, pour ainsi dire, leur marque, et paraisse, du moins pour le style, écrit sous leur dictée? Souvent il change, modifie, corrige leurs idées. Son esprit, impatient du joug, avait besoin de penser par lui-même; mais il conserve les richesses de leur langage et les formes de leur diction. L'heureux instinct qui le guidait lui faisait sentir que pour donner à ses écrits le caractère de durée qui manquait à sa langue, trop imparfaite pour être déjà fixée, il fallait y transporter, y naturaliser en quelque sorte les beautés d'une autre langue, qui par sa perfection, fût assurée d'être immortelle; ou plutôt l'habitude d'étudier les chefs-d'œuvres de la langue latine le conduisait à les imiter. Il en prenait à son insu toutes les formes, et se faisait Romain sans le vouloir. Quelquefois, réglant sa marche irrégulière, il semble imiter Cicéron même. Sa phrase se développe lentement, et se remplit de mots choisis qui se fortifient et se soutiennent l'un l'autre dans un enchaînement harmonieux. Plus souvent, comme Tacite, il *enfonce profondément la signification des mots, met une idée neuve sous un terme familier, et dans une diction fortement travaillée, laisse quelque chose d'inculte et de sauvage; il a le trait énergique, les sons heurtés, les tournures vives et hazardées de Salluste, l'expression rapide et profonde, la force et l'éclat de Pline l'ancien. Souvent aussi, donnant à sa prose toutes les richesses de la poésie, il s'épanche, il s'abandonne avec l'inépuisable facilité d'Ovide, ou respire la verve et l'âpreté de Lucrece. Voilà les diverses couleurs qu'il emprunte de toutes parts, pour tracer des tableaux qui ne sont qu'à lui. Souvent on se forme une idée générale sur la manière d'un écrivain, d'après une qualité particulière que se fait remarquer dans son style. On cite toujours le naturel et la bonhommie de Montaigne; et, sans doute, l'auteur des Essais se montrait bonhommie lorsqu'il parlait de lui, et qu'il nous disait quel vin il aimait le mieux. Il se servait d'un parler simple et naïf, tel sur le papier qu'a la bouche;† mais il ne se servait pas moins naturellement du langage le plus fort, le plus précis, et quelquefois même le plus magnifique, lorsqu'il était emporté par le souvenir d'un grand sentiment, d'une action noble et généreuse. N'est-ce pas dans Montaigne que je trouve la peinture de l'homme de cœur qui tombe obstiné en son courage; qui, pour quelque danger de la mort voisine, ne relasche aucun point de son asseurance; qui regarde encore, en rendant l'ame, son ennemi d'une vue ferme et dédaigneuse; est battu, non pas de nous, mais, de la fortune, est tué sans être vaincu. Et cette phrase, aurait-elle paru faible à Démosthènes? Il y a des pertes triomphantes a l'envi des victoires, et ces quatre victoires sœurs, de Salamine, de Platée, de Mycale, de Sicile, n'osèrent opposer toute leur gloire ensemble à la gloire de la déconfiture du roi Leonidas et des siens au pas des Thermopyles.*

Quelquefois, chez Montaigne, cette grandeur est portée trop loin, et se rapproche un peu de la grandeur souvent outrée de Sénèque et de Lucain. Il aimait ces deux auteurs. Il ne laissait pas les images hardies jusqu'à l'exagération, les expressions éblouissantes, les coups de pinceau plus énergiques que réguliers. On doit le pardonner à l'extrême vivacité de son imagination. Malgré ce penchant naturel dans ses jugemens littéraires, il donne toujours la préférence aux auteurs de l'antiquité qui ont réuni la pureté du goût à l'éclat du talent; Virgile est pour lui le premier des poètes; et si la philosophie de Cicéron lui paraît trop chargée de longueries d'apprêts, il trouve son éloquence incomparable. Quand il emprunte quelque idée brillante à Lucain ou à Sénèque, jamais il ne l'affaiblit, mais il sait presque toujours la rendre plus naturelle. Le bon sens tempérait en lui l'imagination, et retenait sa pensée dans de justes bornes, lors même que ses paroles trop vives et trop impétueuses s'élançaient avec une sorte d'irrégularité.

Ce bon sens qui dirige tous ses raisonnemens, qui se fait remarquer au milieu de ses saillies, et ne l'abandonne pas même dans ses caprices et dans ses écarts, devait lui présenter en foule ces pensées heureuses et précises, que l'on aime à retenir parce qu'ils trouvent sans cesse leur application, et que l'on peut appeler les proverbes des sages. Dans ce genre, j'oserai dire qu'il a donné les plus heureux modèles d'un style dont La Rochefoucault passe ordinairement pour le premier inventeur. Nulle part vous ne trouverez un plus grand nombre de sentences d'une brièveté énergique, où les mots suffisent à peine à l'idée qui se montre d'elle-même. Je n'essayerai pas de multiplier les citations. On y verrait avec étonnement cette diction si riche en termes pittoresques, si chargée de circonlocutions ingénieuses, d'expressions redoublées, d'épithètes accumulées, si féconde en développemens oratoires et poétiques, se resserrer tout-à-coup dans les bornes du plus rigoureux laconisme, et ne plus employer les paroles que pour le besoin de l'intelligence.

Cet art d'être court, sans ôter rien à la justesse et à la clarté, semble une des perfections du langage humain: c'est au moins un des avantages que les langues obtiennent avec le plus de peine et le plus tard, après avoir été long-temps travaillées en tous sens par d'habiles écrivains. Il est encore un autre mérite qui semblerait, au premier coup-d'œil, tenir à l'écrivain beaucoup plus qu'à l'idiôme, et cependant ne se montre guères que dans les langues épurées et polies, dont il devient en quelque sorte le dernier raffinement; c'est l'esprit. Quels sens faut-il attacher à ce mot, ou plutôt en combien de sens divers est-il permis de l'entendre? Qu'est-ce que l'esprit? Voltaire lui-même, après en avoir prodigué les exemples, désespère de le définir et d'en indiquer toutes les sources. Toutefois, il est permis d'avancer que l'esprit, quelqu'il soit, se réduisant presque toujours à une manière de parler délicate, fine, détournée, se produit avec plus d'avantage à mesure que les ressources d'une langue sont plus variées et mieux connues. Au commencement du siècle de Louis XIV., quelques hommes écrivaient avec génie; le reste ne couvrait le manque de génie par aucun agrément; et la sentence de Boileau se trouvait de la plus rigoureuse exactitude:—

"Il n'est pas de degré du médiocre au pire."

Dans le siècle suivant, la littérature se rendit plus accessible : il fut permis d'être médiocre sans être méprisable, et la faiblesse ornée avec art peut mériter quelque estime. Ceux qui ne pouvaient atteindre aux grandes beautés, composèrent ingénieusement de petites choses. Ceux qui ne trouvaient point de pensées neuves, cherchèrent des expressions heureuses. Au défaut de vastes conceptions, il fallait soigner de jolis détails. On mit de l'esprit dans le style : les écrivains du second ordre en firent leur principal ornement, et les grands écrivains n'en dédaignèrent pas l'usage. Champfort ne brille que par l'esprit qu'il montre dans son style ; Montesquieu en laisse beaucoup apercevoir dans le sien.

Mais ce merite qui, bien éloigné d'être le premier de tous, exige du moins beaucoup d'art et d'etude ; il est assez extraordinaire de le trouver au plus haut degré dans Montaigne, placé à une époque presque barbare, et maniant une langue depourvue de grace et de souplesse.

Comment cet écrivain si naturel et si négligé connait il déja tout le jeu des paroles, ces nuances fines et subtiles, ces raprochemens délicats, ces oppositions piquantes, ces artifices de l'art d'écrire et, pour ainsi dire, ces ruses de style, auxquelles on a recours lorsque le siècle de l'invention est passé ? en les employant sans cesse avec la délicatesse de Fontenelle, ou la malice de Duclos, il ne perd jamais la naïveté qui forme le trait le plus marqué de son caractère et de son talent, et par un mélange difficile à concevoir, mais très-réel, on trouve souvent en lui la simplicité de l'antique bonne-foi et la finesse de l'esprit moderne. Pour expliquer ce problème d'un auteur qui réunit dans sa manière d'écrire celle de plusieurs siècles, il suffit de se souvenir qu'il avait devant les yeux les divers âges de la littérature Latine, et les étudiait indifféremment : il a dû nous devenir plus d'une fois, en imitant Pline le jeune. Des phrases vives et coupées, des bons-mots, des traits, des épigrammes, convenaient d'ailleurs très-bien dans un style décousu, qui, comme le dit l'auteur lui-même, ne va que par sauts et par gambades. Le désordre est souvent pénible, il faut du moins qu'il ait quelque chose d'amusant.

Montaigne abuse beaucoup de son lecteur. Ces chapitres qui parlent de toute, excepté de ce que promettait le titre, ces digressions qui s'embarrassent l'une dans l'autre, ces longues parenthèses qui donnent le temps d'oublier l'idée principale, ces exemples qui viennent à la suite des raisonnemens, et ne s'y rapportent pas, ces idées qui n'ont d'autre liaison que le voisinage des mots, enfin cette manie continuelle de dérouter l'attention du lecteur, pourrait fatiguer ; et l'on serait quelquefois tenté de ne plus suivre un écrivain qui ne veut jamais avoir de marche assurée : un trait inattendu nous ramène, un mot plaisant nous pique, nous réveille. Le sujet nous a souvent échappé ; mais nous retrouvons toujours l'auteur, et c'est lui que nous aimons. Je n'ignore pas que c'est un grand ridicule de vouloir attribuer tous les genres de mérite à l'homme dont on fait l'éloge ; et je ne m'arrêterais pas sur l'éloquence de Montaigne dont la réputation peut se passer d'un nouveau titre, si j'avais été moins frappé de quelques morceaux des Essais, où ce grand talent de l'eloquence semble se trahir, à l'insu de l'auteur, par l'audace et la vivacité des mouvemens.

Et pourquoi en effet la discussion d'une vérité morale, intéressante pour l'humanité, le besoin de combattre une erreur honteuse, un préjugé funeste, ne pourrait échauffer l'ame de l'ecrivain, l'agrandir, lui communiquer cette force persuasive qui commande aux esprits, et du philosophe éclairé faire un orateur éloquent ? Le règle de la vertu ne serait-il pas aussi puissant que les passions ? C'est ainsi que Montaigne me parait s'élever au-dessus de lui-même, lorsqu'il nous exhorte á fortifier notre âme contre la crainte de la mort. Son style devient noble, grave, austère ; à l'imitation de Lucrèce, il fait paraître la nature addressant la parole à l'homme ; mais le langage qu'il met dans la bouche n'appartient qu'à lui. Sortez, dit-elle, de ce monde, comme vous y êtes entré ; le même passage que vous avait fait de la mort à la vie, sans passion et sans frayeur, refaites-le de la vie à la mort. Votre mort est une des pièces de l'ordre de l'univers, une pièce de la vie du monde. Cette élévation se soutient dans tous les discours de la nature. Il s'y mêle quelques unes de ces pensées profondes qui forcent l'ame à se replier sur elle-même. Si vous n'aviez la mort, vous me maudiriez sans cesse de vous en avoir privé.

Une pareille éloquence semble appartenir à cette philosophie austère qui ne ménage point l'homme, et le poursuit sans cesse avec l'image de la dure vérité. Ce ton ne peutêtre habituel chez Montaigne, il devait porter son caractère dans ses écrits, et ce caractère qu'il a pris tant de plaisir à nous dépeindre, se compose de faiblesse pour lui-même et d'indulgence pour les autres. Il nous excuse trop aisément pour nous reprocher avec amertume nos fautes et nos erreurs ; et il s'aime trop lui-même ! je n'ai pas craint de faire cet aveu : on ne peut en abuser. L'ami de la Boëtie ne sera jamais exposé à l'accusation d'egoïsme. Non ; l'egoïsme, ce sentiment stérile, cette passion avilissante, n'a jamais trouvé place là où regnait la pure amitié. Il n'est pas épuisé par l'habitude de s'aimer seul, ce cœur qui conserve une si grande force d'aimer, et s'epanche avec une intarissible abondance sur l'ami qu'il s'est choisi. O la Boëtie ! que votre nom toujours répété serve la gloire de votre ami ; que toujours on pense avec délices à cette union de deux ames vertueuses qui, s'étant une fois rencontrées, se mêlent, se confondent pour toujours ! Mais la mort vient briser des liens si forts et si doux : le plus à plaindre des deux, celui qui survit, demeure frappé d'une incurable blessure ; il ne fait plus que traîner languissant, il n'a plus de goût aux plaisirs. Ils me redoublent ; dit-il, le regret de sa perte. Nous étions à moitié de tout, il me semble que je lui dérobe sa part. Deuil sacré de l'amitié, sainte et inviolable fidelité, qui n'a plus pour objet qu'un souvenir ! Quelle est l'ame détachée d'elle-même qui se plaît à prolonger son affliction pour honorer la mémoire de l'ami qu'elle a perdu ? C'est celle de Montaigne ; C'est Montaigne qui si fait une religion de sa douleur, et craint d'être troublé dans ses regrèts, par un bonheur, où son ami ne peut plus être. On aimé à renconter dans l'éloge d'un homme supérieur ces marques d'un caractére sensible et tendre. Elle nous donnent le droit de chérir celui que nous admirons ; mais que dis-je ? Ces deux sentimens, l'admiration et l'amour, se confondent tellement au nom de Montaigne, que l'un disparait presque dans l'autre Son idée ne réveille pas en nos ames ce respect mêlé d'enthusiasme que nous inspirent les génies illustres qui ont fait la gloire des lettres. La distance nous paraît moins grande entre nous et lui. Nous sentons qu'il y a dans ses principes, dans sa conduite, quelque chose qui le rapproche de nous. Nous l'aimons comme un ami plein de candeur et de simplicité que nous serions tentés de croire notre égal, si la supériorité de sa raison et la vivacité de son esprit ne se d'éclatant à chaque instant par des traits ingénieux et soudains, que toute sa bonhommie nepeut cacher à nos yeux. Sa vie nous offre peu d'événemens; elle ne fut point agitée: c'est le développement paisible d'un caractère aussi noble que droit. Sa jeunesse tout entière est consacrée au sentiment le plus respectable, la tendresse pour son père. Malgré son éloignement pour les honneurs et les emplois, élu par le suffrage volontaire de ses concitoyens, il remplit deux fois les fonctions de premier magistrat dans la ville de Bordeaux. Il croit que son administration n'était pas assez sevére: je le crois aussi. Sans doute il était plus fait pour étudier les hommes que pour les gouverner. C'était l'objet où se portait naturellement son esprit. Il s'en occupa toujours dans le calme de la solitude et dans le loisirs de la vie privèe. Les fureurs de la guerre civile troublérent quelquefois son repos; et sa modération, comme il arrive toujours, ne put lui server de sauve-garde. Cependant ces orages même ne détruisirent pas son bonheur.

C'est ainsi qu'il coula ses jours dans le sein des occupations qu'il aimait, libre et tranquille, élevé par sa raison au-dessus de tous les chagrins qui ne venaient point du cœur, attendant la mort sans la craindre, et voulant qu'elle le trouvât occupé à bêcher son jardin, et nonchalant d'elle. Les Essais, ce monument impérissable de la plus saine raison et du plus heureux génie, ne furent pour Montaigne qu'un amusement facile, un jeu de son esprit et de sa plume. Heureux l'écrivain qui, rassemblant ses idées comme au hazard, et s'entretenant avec lui-même sans songer à la posterité, se fait cependant s'écouter d'elle! on lira toujours avec plaisir ce qu'il a porduit sans effort. Toutes les inspirations de sa pensée, fixées à jamais par le style, passeront aux siècles à venir. Quel fut son secret? Il s'est mis tout entier dans ses ouvrages. Il jouira donc mieux que personne de cette immortalité que donnent les lettres, puis qu'en lui seul l'homme ne sera jamais séparé de l'écrivain, et que son caractère ne sera pas moins immortel que son talent.

Montaigne, te croyais-tu destiné à tant de gloire; et n'en serais-tu pas étonné? Tu ne parlais que de toi, tu ne voulais peindre que toi; cependant tu fus notre historien. Tu retraças, non les formes incertaines et passagères de la société, mais l'homme tel qu'il est toujours et par tout. Tes peintures ne sont pas vielles après trois siècles; et ces copies, si fidèles et si vives, toujours en présence de l'original qui n'a pas changé, conservent toute leur vérité, n'ont rien perdu de leur éclat, et paraissent même embellies par l'épreuve du temps. Ta naïve indulgence, ta franchise et ta bonhommie ont cessé depuis long-temps d'être en usage: elles ne cesseront jamais de plaire, et tout le raffinement d'un siècle civilisé ne servira qu'à les rendre plus curieuse et plus piquantes. Tes remarques sur le cœur humain pénétrent trop avant pour devenir jamais inutiles. Malgré tant de nouvelles recherches et de nouveaux écrits, elles seront toujours aussi neuves que profondes. Pardonne-moi d'avoir essayé l'analyse de ton genie, sans autre titre que d'aimer tes ouvrages. Ah! la jeunesse n'est pas faite pour apprécier dignement les leçons de l'expérience, et n'a pas le droit de parler du cœur humain qu'elle ne connaît pas. J'ai senti cet obstacle: plus d'une fois j'ai voulu briser ma plume, me défiant de mes idées, et craignant de ne pas assez entendre les choses que je pretendais louer. La supériorité de ta raison m'effrayait, ô Montaigne! Je désesperais de pouvoir atteindre si haut. Ta simplicité, ton aimable naturel, m'ont rendu la confiance et le courage: j'ai pensé que toi même, si tu pouvais supporter un panégyrique, tu ne te plaindrais pas d'y trouver plus de bonne foi que d'éloquence, plus de candeur que de talent.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTICE

EDITIONS OF MONTAIGNE

COMPILED FROM DOCTOR PAYEN, AND OTHER AUTHORITIES.

1. Les Essais de messire Michel, seigneur de Montaigne, chevalier de l'ordre du roy, et gentilhomme ordinaire de sa chambre. Livre premier et second. A Bourdeaus, par S.-Millanges, imprimeur ordinaire du roy. M. D. LXXX. 2 vol. 8vo.

This edition contains only the two first books, each of which occupies a volume, and has a separate title-page and table of contents. The first volume, which is printed in a larger type than the other, has 496 pages; the pagination of the second volume is exceedingly defective; the last page is numbered 650. At the commencement of the Essays is a preface, opening thus: C'est ici un livre de bonne foi, lecteur; and bearing date 1st of March, 1580.

This edition has no epigraph.

The first book contains fifty-seven chapters, and the second thirty-seven, being so far conformable to all the subsequent editions. In the 29th chapter of the First Book are twenty-nine sonnets by Etienne de la Boëtie.

In comparing this and the two next editions with those published after the death of the author, it is observable that they contain very few quotations, and that the chapters are much shorter. Father Niceron remarks of the four first editions: "Le texte est plus suivi que dans toutes les editions posterieures, parceque ce texte qui ne contenoit d'abord que des raisonnemens clairs et precis, a été coupé et interrompu par les differentes additions que l'auteur y a faites par-ci par-la en differens tems, et qui y ont jetté du desordre et de la confusion, sans qu'il se soit mis en peine d' y remedier."

Mons. J. B. Bastide, who paid much attention to the subject of Montaigne (see under 1822), and who proposed to publish an edition of the Essays, upon which, according to M. Beuchot, he had been engaged forty years, announced in 1807, in the Revue Philosophique (deuxieme trimestre), upon the authority of M. de Cayla, that there was another edition of the Essays published at Paris this same year (1580), in folio, chez Michel Blageart, differing from the one which this bookseller published in 1640; and Mons. Leclerq names this supposed edition, without entering into any discussion on the subject. M. Payen, however, writes: "I never believed in the existence of this edition: the most conclusive reason that induced me to reject it was derived from the name of the alleged printer; for it is clear, from the catalogue of Lottin,* that there existed no printer of the name of Blageart at Paris in 1580, and that Michel did not commence business until 1631. It occurred to me that this was an incomplete or altered copy of the edition of 1640, which, by some mistake, had been assigned to the earlier date; but, having received an extract from the Catalogue of the Library of Bordeaux, in which was mentioned a copy of the Essays 'à Paris, 1580,' I communicated my doubts on the subject to M. Jouannet, the librarian of that establishment, and this learned gentleman at once recognized the accuracy of my supposition, and informed me that the copy in his library is, in point of fact, a copy of the edition of 1640; and that the mistake, which is of old date, arose from the real date having got torn from the title-page, the compiler of the catalogue inserted that which appeared on the preface. I have entered into these details," adds M. Payen, "because it has been placed on record that such an edition exists; and because several literary men, who have a good deal occupied themselves upon the subject of Montaigne and his works, wishing to make up four editions previous to that of 1588, and relying upon the authority of M. de Cayla, M. de Bastide, and the Catalogue of the Library of Bordeaux, have shared in this error, which has now had general credit for nearly thirty years."

1582.

2. The same.—Par messire Michel, seigneur de Montaigne, chevalier de l'ordre du roy et gentilhomme de sa chambre, mayre et gouverneur de Bourdeaus.—Edition seconde, revene et augmentée. A Bourdeaus, par S. Millanges, imprimeur ordinaire du roy, M. D. LXXXII. 8o.

This edition, a much handsomer one than the first, is in one volume. It contains only the two first books, and has no epigraph. The pagination continues from the one book on to the other, and there is no title-page for Book II. There are 396 pages in the volume. La Boëtie's sonnets are inserted, as in the first edition.

This edition, it is seen, is announced as revue et augmentée; and, in fact, each of the editions which immediately followed the first, presents corrections and augmentations; and it is particularly observable in the edition of Bordeaux, 1588, that Montaigne, notwithstanding his statement, "I add, but never correct," did correct very often, even as to light turns of expression.

3. The same. Par MESSIRE MICHEL, SEIGNEUR DE MONTAIGNE, chevalier de l'ordre du roi et gentilhomme ordinaire de sa chambre, mayre et gouverneur de Bourdeaus, reveues et augmentées. A Paris, chez Jean Richer, rue St.-Jean-de-Latran, a l'arbre verdoyant, M. D. LXXXVII. 12mo.

The date of the preface is the same as in the preceding editions; and the Sonnets of Boëtie are inserted as before. Coste, and the edition of 1725, are therefore altogether mistaken in stating, after Niceron, that Boëtie's Sonnets were not printed with the Essays till the edition of 1588.

4. The same. Essais de MICHEL, SEIGNEUR DE MONTAIGNE. Cinquiesme edition, augmentée d'un troisiesme livre, et de six cens additions aux deux premiers. A Paris, chez Abel L'Angelier, au premier pilier de la grand salle du Palais. Avec privilege du roy. 1580. 4to. 1 volume.

An engraved title-page. The date is not on the title-page, but it is in the license to print, which bears date 4th June, 1588, and is signed Duduit.

The name of Montaigne, it is seen, is not followed here by the array of his titles; and it is a curious coincidence, that among the numerous additions made to this edition is the passage (Book i. chap. 39), expressing his objection to the superscribing his letters with a long ribblerow of qualities and titles: and the other passage which deprecates the "loading the fronts and title-pages of the books we commit to the press with such a clutter of titles."

This edition is only paged on the recto, the last page being numbered 396. The preface is dated 12th June, 1588, but it is in other respects the same as in the preceding editions. The Sonnets of Boëtie are also inserted as before. The third book, which now appeared for the first time, consists of thirteen chapters.

This edition, the last published during Montaigne's life, is of very inferior execution. The title-page announces it as the fifth edition, and as it came out under the superintendence of Montaigne himself, who was then in Paris, it would seem that four editions had, in point of fact, preceded it, yet we have no knowledge of any other editions, up to this time, than those just mentioned. When the supposed edition in folio, "Paris, 1580," was admitted, the number was complete, but it has been shown that no such edition exists. Niceron says that the first edition was followed by three others previous to that of 1588, but he does not give us the dates, and, indeed, would seem merely to make the statement upon the authority of the title-page of the present edition. If this be, indeed, the fifth edition, it is quite clear that one of the preceding editions has altogether escaped the research of bibliographers.

It was from a copy of this edition, corrected and augmented by Montaigne himself, that Naigeon published the edition of 1802. M. Bernadau, advocate at Bordeaux, and author of the Antiquités Bordelaises, made known this copy to the public in a letter addressed to the Journal General de France (Nov. 1789). This copy remained some time in the family of Montaigne, and then, according to M. Bernadau, "was given to the Feuillans of Bordeaux by Madame de Montaigne, by order of her husband, who was greatly attached to that society, and had selected their church as his place of sepulture. The author of the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique is therefore wrong, when he says there is to be seen, in the library of that convent, a manuscript supplement to the Essays. This precious relic, at the time of the Revolution, was transferred to the public Library of Bordeaux, where it still remains.

This copy is covered with corrections and additions, marginal and interlineary, in the hand-writing of Montaigne. On the engraved title-page, he has written sixieme edition, in reference to the one he then contemplated, and this, indeed, puts it beyond a doubt that the edition now under notice is the fifth, and that we have altogether lost sight of one of the preceding impressions. Among other manuscript additions which Montaigne made to the copy in question, there is one, the particulars of which may perhaps be as fitly introduced here as elsewhere. It is a page of directions to the printer,* occupying the back of the title-page, and which the reader will take an interest in examining. It is as follows:

"Montre montrer remontrer, etc. escrives les sans [s] à la differance de monstre monstrueus.

"Cet home cette fame escrives le sans [s] à la differance de c'est c'estoit.

"Ainsi mettes le sans [n] quand une uoyelle (†) suit et aueq [n] si c'est une consonante ainsi marcha ainsin alla.

* M. Naigeon argues, from this circumstance, that Montaigne certainly intended to print his next edition from this copy, but whatever he may have intended at the time of making these corrections, it is tolerably manifest that the preference was afterwards given to the other copy, which he also largely corrected and enlarged, and whence the edition of 1595 was printed, under the care of Mademoiselle de Gournay. It seems most probable that Montaigne's widow would know which of the corrected editions her husband intended to print from, and would act upon his intentions in this particular, when she handed the volume over to Mademoiselle de Gournay.

† Montaigne here carelessly writes precisely the contrary of that which he wished to say, and what he acted upon, as is shown in the instance he proceeds to give.

He also added, on the title-page, this epigraph, which has since become that of his book: Viresque acquirit eundo. At the top of the title-page is an escutcheon, in which he has written his name.

5. Livre des Essais de Michel, seigneur de Montaigne, divisé en deux parties. — Derniere edition, augmentée de deux tables tres amples des choses plus memorables conteneues en icelle: à Lyon, pour Gabriel Lagrange, libraire d'Avignon. M. D. XCIII. 8vo.

Conformably to the title, this edition is divided into two parts. The first comprises the two first books, in 830 pages, and is preceded by the above title; the second, which contains the third book, is preceded by a separate title: Livre des Essais de Michel, Seigneur de Montaigne, deuxieme partie, à Lyon, &c. Each part has a table of chapters, and an analytical table of contents. The running title is " Essais de Monta." (sic.) This edition, which is a very fair one, is printed from that of 1588. M. Payen says he has seen two copies of it; one in the public library of Chaumont en Bassigny, the other in that of M. Lamennais; in the first, which no doubt had belonged to some convent, the whole chapter " On some Verses of Virgil" is taken out, a mutilation which is found in a great many copies of these old editions.

6. The same. Edition nouvelle, trouvée apres le décès de l'autheur; reveue et augmentée par lui d'un tiers plus qu'aux precedentes impressions. Paris, Abel l'Angelier, 1595. Folio. Some copies have: " Paris, Michel Sonnius, Rue St. Jacques, a l'Ecu de Baste." The licence, at the back of the title-page, is dated 15th October, 1594.

There is no epigraph, and the preface, by Montaigne, is omitted. The chapter, " That the Relish of Good and Evil," &c., which hitherto had formed the fourteenth of the First Book, is here, as in all the subsequent editions, except the following, the fortieth of the same book.

This edition was printed, under the care of Mademoiselle de Gournay,† from a copy, revised by Montaigne, and given to Mademoiselle de Gournay by his widow. This was probably a copy of the edition of 1588, corrected and augmented in the same way with the copy already described; for Mademoiselle de Gournay says, on this subject: " Madame de Montaigne sent them to me to have published, enriched with his latest improvements." Another copy remained in the house of Montaigne, as Mademoiselle de Gournay informs us, and this was the copy afterwards given to the Feuillans of Bordeaux. Mons. de Bernadan, therefore, in the letter above quoted, is mistaken in describing the copy in the library at Bordeaux as that from which Mademoiselle de Gournay printed her edition. It is not known what became of this latter copy, which differed materially from that used by M. Naigeon; it is probable that, after the work had gone through the press, the copy was not preserved.

This, and the impression of Anvers (no date), are the only editions which do not contain Montaigne's preface; in the edition next mentioned, indeed, Mademoiselle de Gournay says, that the preface was mislaid when they were printing the edition now under notice. The Editor has preceded the Essays with a long and able apologetic preface, reprinted in the present edition. Mademoiselle de Gournay herself revised all the proofs of this edition, which is executed with such correctness, that she is well entitled to call it, as she did in the edition of 1635, le vieil et bon exemplaire. It remains to this day the principal edition, as regards authenticity of text, and one of the handsomest in a typographical point of view.

The twenty sonnets of La Boëtie are omitted in this edition, and replaced by a note, which has been reprinted verbatim by all those editors who have not inserted the sonnets; but they have omitted to put a question, which yet appears a very natural one: the note says: " These twenty-nine sonnets of Et. de la Boëtie, which used to be in this place, have since been printed with his works." But have these sonnets really been printed? If so, where are they? Montaigne, in the Bordeaux copy, has erased the verses, and merely stated: " These verses may be seen elsewhere," which may refer to the anterior editions; for Montaigne could not have printed these sonnets with the works of La Boëtie, which he had published nine years before, since he was not then acquainted with them; having only just then received them when he placed them in the first edition of the Essays, in 1580. He there says, on this subject, to Madame de Grammont: " These are twenty-nine sonnets that the Sieur Poyferre, a man of business and understanding,

* This document shows how greatly the orthography of Montaigne differs from that at present in use. It may here be remarked that he writes the words, " a cette heure," asteure, precisely as it is now pronounced in ordinary conversation, by one of those contractions which custom authorizes, and which the rapidity peculiar to the spoken French language, and which, indeed, forms one of its distinctive characters, in some degree necessitates. He often unites, also, asture, dolur, valur, &c., an orthography conformable to the manner in which these words, and all others with a similar termination, were, and are, pronounced in his part of the country.

who knew him long before me, found casually at his house, among some other papers, and has just sent them to me." There is no other way of explaining the note of Mademoiselle de Gournay, than by admitting that, in the interval between 1588 and 1595, some work of La Boëtie's was printed, in which these twenty-nine sonnets were inserted. In fact, Father Le Long, and after him Messrs. Weiss and Beuchot, attribute to this author a work entitled: Historique Description du solitaire et sauvage pays de Medoc (dans le Bourdelois), par feu M. de la Boëtie, Conseiller, &c. Bordeaux, Millanges, 1593, 12mo. Le Long, indeed, adds: "They have appended to this description some verses of the same author, which are not to be found in the edition which Michel de Montaigne published of his works." The work, however, if ever printed at all, which is very doubtful indeed, is so scarce that none of the commentators upon Montaigne have met with it, so that it has not been possible to ascertain whether these verses are the sonnets in question.

7. Les Essais de Michel, seigneur de Montagne, (sic.) divisez en trois livres contenants un riche et rare thrésor de plusieurs beaux et notables discours, couchez en un stile le plus pur et orné qu'il se trouve en nostre siècle, avec deux tables, l'un des chapitres, l'autre des choses plus mémorables conteneues en iceux. CIↃ. IↃ. XCV. Pour François Le Febure de Lyon. 12mo.

The preface of Montaigne is here addressed au lecteur benevole! and is dated the 18th March, 1590. The analytical table is in tolerable detail, and at the end of the preliminary matter, they have inserted a Sonnet upon the Essays of the Sieur de Montaigne, by Claude Expilly, President of the Parliament of Grenoble.* This edition, a very incorrect and badly-executed one, contains the three books of the Essays, but not the additions made to the folio edition of the same year, just noticed. Its text is taken from that of 1588; but it is far less complete. Whole chapters are omitted, and those which are retained are disfigured throughout with horrible mutilations. The quotations are altered, of which one instance may suffice: for the "nec cythará carentem" which concludes the verses of Horace at the end of the work, the editor has substituted: "nec studiis carentem." The chapter "that the relish of good and evil," &c., is made the 14th of the first book, as in the editions preceding that of Mademoiselle de Gournay. Chapters 29, 35, 41, 42, 54, of Book I., are entirely omitted. Chapter 13 of the Second Book, which Montaigne heads "de juger de la mort d'autrui," is entitled, in the table of chapters: "de juger de la mort, advis;" and in the body of the work: "divers avis sur le point de la mort." Chapters 15, 19, 28, 30, 33, 35, of book ii., are omitted, as are chapters 4 and 5 of book iii. Chapter 11, which in consequence of these omissions here becomes chapter 9, is headed "Of Opinions," instead of "Of Cripples."

This edition is unquestionably the worst ever published.

8. The same. Edition nouvelle, prise sur l'exemplaire trouvé apres le décèds de l'autheur, reveue et augmentée d'un tiers plus qu'aux precedentes impressions; Paris, Abel L'Angelier, au premier pilier de la Grande Salle du Palais. M. D. XCVIII. large octâvo. An engraved title-page, bearing on it for the first time the viresque acquirit eundo. 1164 pages. The same privilege as to the edition of 1595. A very fine edition.

The preface of Montaigne is again introduced here; it is dated 1st March, 1580, and is followed by a note, stating that this preface, corrected by the last hand of the author, having been mislaid at the time of the first impression after the author's death, had since been found and inserted; and, in point of fact, it does somewhat differ from the preface to the preceding editions.

The preface by Mademoiselle de Gournay, which was printed in the edition last noticed, is here omitted, and replaced by the following: "Lecteur, si je ne suis assez forte pour escrire sur les Essais, au moins suis je bien assez genereuse pour advouer ma faiblesse, et confesse que je me retracte de cette preface que l'aveuglement de mon age, et d'une violente fievre d'ame, me laissa naguere eschapper des mains, lorsque, apres le décèds de l'autheur, Madame de Montaigne sa femme me les fait apporter, pour estre mis au jour, enrichis des traits de sa derniere main. Si je me renforce a l'advenir, je t'en drois, sinon ce qu'il faudroit, au moins ce que je pense, et ce que je scay; ou si je ne scay rien, encore prendray je la plume pour te prier de m'apprendre ce que tu scauras. Pour cette heure dis-je ne te donneray rien que mes oreilles, afin d'ouyr quel sera ton advis sur ce livre. Que t'en semble donc, lecteur?"

This edition is the first in which we find the viresque acquirit eundo, already spoken of, which it was obviously the intention of the author should in future serve as the epigraph to his work; and we accordingly find it printed in all the subsequent editions, with two or three exceptions, up to those of 1659 exclusive.

It is not till the edition of 1635 that we find the motto which Montaigne had adopted, the Que sais-je,† with the emblem of the scales; and in this edition we have both the epigraph and the motto, as is the case in several of the subsequent editions.

9. The same. Edition nouvelle, prise sur l'exemplaire trouvé apres le décèds de l'autheur, reveue et augmentée d'un tiers outre les precedentes impressions; Paris, Abel L'Angelier, M.D.C. Large 8vo.

* This sonnet is inserted elsewhere in the present edition.

† This Que sais-je, which Pascal has so severely analyzed in his Pensées, is quoted in Book ii., chap. 12; and perfectly characterizes the philosophy of Montaigne; it is the result of that maxim which he had inscribed in Greek on the rafters of his library: "There is no reasoning to which you may not oppose a contrary reasoning." The motto of Charron, "Je ne sais," expresses the same idea; not less aptly, from the very circumstance that it is in an affirmative form. That of Lamothe le Vayer, "de las cosas mas seguras, la mas segura es dudar:" "the surest of all sure things is to doubt;" which presents a striking analogy with the preceding, is very little more than a translation of the bold saying of Pliny, quoted by Montaigne in his Essays, Book ii. chap. 14, "Solum certum nihil esse certi." Varro was more orthodox in his mode of expression, though in effect the idea was the same, when he wrote: "Hominis est hæc opinari, Dei scire; and Fontenelle, when he said:—Je suis effrayé de la certitude que je vois maintenant partout, was not more certain than Montaigne; but he was more reserved in the expression of his doubt Preface, notes, privilege, epigraph, engraved title-page, all the same as in the edition of 1598. 1156 pages.

Not so fine an edition as the preceding, but still a very good and handsome one.

Chapter 21, of book ii., is entitled, in the Table of Contents, "Contre la fainéantise," as in the preceding editions; in the body of the work it is misprinted "Contre la fantasie."

10. Coste, in his preface to the edition of 1739, mentions an edition at Paris, of this date, different from the one next noticed, and which he describes as a fine one. Brunet, Fournier, Cailleau, also mention this edition; and I have seen it named in the catalogue of the first sale of M. Dinocourt d'Hangard (drawn up by Née de la Rochelle, 1789), No. 332. I have not seen this edition myself, but, after the authority I have given, there can be no doubt that such an edition exists, and the following would appear to be its description:—

The same. Title as before. Paris, Abel L'Angelier, 1602. A fine edition, conformable to the two preceding, containing in addition, at the end, the Sonnet of Expilly, from the 12mo. edition of 1595. This last feature, indeed, proves the existence of this edition, as differing from those of 1598 and 1600, neither of which contains the sonnet.

11. The same. Title-page as in the edition of 1598. Leyde, Jean Doreau, 1602, 8vo. (a smaller 8vo. than the three preceding editions). Printed title-page. Epigraph. 1132 pages. Ornamented initial letters to each chapter. Both prefaces, and the short note to that of Montaigne, as in the preceding editions; also an analytical table, the first since that of 1595, in-12, and which is entitled: "Les pages du sieur de Montaigne, ou sont conteneues les plus rares remarques de son livre, à savoir les exemples des vertues et des vices, les plus graves sentences, similitudes et comparaisons, avec un recueil des lois anciennes des peuples et nations; plus la vie de l'autheur par remarques principales et precieuses sur son propre livre, le tout en forme de lieux communs."

Chapter 21, book ii., is here also headed "Contre la fantasie."

12. There is a counterfeit of this edition, purporting to be by the same bookseller, of the same town, and the same date. On comparing the pagination, the initial letters, and the typographical errors, it becomes matter of certainty that the present is a different edition from the preceding. The two editions, indeed, may at once be distinguished by the title-pages; for in the preceding impression, the E in the exemplar word is a capital, whereas in the present edition it is italic. The edition now under notice, which in no respect equals the preceding, has no analytical table.

13. The same. Édition nouvelle, prise sur l'exemplaire trouvé apres le décès de l'autheur, reveue et augmentée d'un tiers, outre les précédentes impressions, enrichie de deux tables curieusement exactes et élaborées. virosque acquirit eundo. à Paris, chez Abel L'Angelier, au premier pilier de la Grande Salle du Palais. M.D.C.IV.

Engraved title-page. The epigraph. Note of Madlle. de Gournay to the Preface by Montaigne. Ornamented initial letters to each chapter. 1032 pages. The analytical table, and at the end an additional table of the illustrations of the Life of Montaigne, as given by himself in the Essays. Here also, chap. 21, book ii., is entitled "Contre la Faineantise."

A good edition, though not so large or handsome as the preceding, published in 8vo. by the same bookseller. There are no marginal lemmas. In the British Museum there is a handsome edition in 4to., dated 1608, the title-page of which exactly corresponds, in all other respects, with that now given under the year 1604.

14. Coste mentions an edition of this date, and describes it as a good one. I have not met with it, says M. Payen, but I believe it exists, for the edition of 1611 contains an extract of the license granted, 23rd March 1608, to Charles Sevestre and Jean Petitpas, which confirms Coste's statement. The edition would appear to be in 8vo., and from the details of the licence was described as "enrichie et augmentée, outre les précédentes impressions, de petits sommaires en la marge, des choses plus remarquables, avec une table très ample, et la vie de l'autheur."—This is the first time we meet with two of the additional features which are found in the subsequent editions.

15. The same.—Nouvelle edition, &c. (as in the preceding). Leyde, Jean Doreau. 8vo. 1609.

Printed title-page. The epigraph. Preface of Montaigne, with Mad. de Gournay's note. The preface of the latter. Ornamented initial letters to each chapter. Analytical tables entitled "Les pages du Sieur de Montaigne," &c. as in 1602. Chapter 21 of book ii. is here headed, "Contre la faineantise." 1132 pages. The Index has no pagination.

16. The same. Edition nouvelle, enrichie d'annotations en marge, corrigée et augmentée d'un tiers outre les précédentes impressions, avec une table très ample des noms et matières remarquables et signalées, plus la vie de l'autheur, extraite de ses propres écrits. Paris, avec privilége du roy (1608). Chez François Gueffier, rue Saint-Jean-de-Latran, devant le collége de Cambray. 1611. 8vo.

Engraved title-page. The epigraph. The two prefaces. Mad. de Gournay's note is omitted. A summary notice of the Life of Montaigne. Marginal lemmas. References to the authors quoted. Extract from the royal license (see 1608). Ornamented initial letters to each chapter. 1130 pages. No pagination of the table of contents. This edition contains, for the first time, a portrait of Montaigne, engraved by Thomas de Leu, under which is the following quatrain:—

> Voici du grand Montaigne une entière figure;
> Le peintre a peint le corps, et lui son bel esprit;
> Le premier par son art égale la nature,
> Mais l'autre la surpasse en tout ce qu'il écrit.

Some copies of this edition bear the name of Charles Sevestre, Rue St. Jacques, devant les Mathurins. In these the date of the edition occupies the place in which, in Gueffier's copies, is the date of the licence.

17. Though I have met with no edition of 1614, I am persuaded that there is one in existence of that date, and I found this opinion upon these circumstances:—1. In the edition of 1617 the publisher's preface says: "Reader, we present thee the Essays, once more furnished with translations of the Latin;" it is therefore clear that there exists an edition anterior to 1617, in which the quotations are translated, and we find no such translations in any other edition preceding that of 1617. 2. The licence of the latter edition is dated 1614, and it is very improbable that the publishers would have waited three years before they made use of it.

This licence, which is also inserted in the edition of 1617, is granted to Mademoiselle de Gournay, and she afterwards transferred it to François Gueffier, Jean Petitpas, Charles Sevestre, Michel Nivelle, and Claude Rigaud. It was, then, by these booksellers that this edition must have been published, and the form was probably 8vo, since the editions sent forth by the same publishers, in 1617 and 1625, are in this size. This edition would contain marginal lemmas, or summaries, references to authors quoted, the life of Montaigne, and, for the first time, translations of the Latin passages.

18. The same. Edition nouvelle, &c. (as in the edition of 1600). A Cologne, par Philippe Albert, 1616, in 8vo.

The short preface by Mademoiselle de Gournay. Her note to Montaigne's preface. Analytical index, headed the same as that of 1602. Printed title-page, bearing the fleurs-de-lys. Ornamented initial letters. 1132 pages. The index not paged. Chapter 21, book ii. is headed, "Contre la Faineantise." There is a separate analytical index to the Life of Montaigne. This edition has neither the epigraph Vires, nor any marginal lemmas or references to authors.

In some copies of this edition the word Cologne is erased, and over it is printed the word Geneva.

19. The same.—Edition nouvelle, enrichie d'annotations en marge, du nom des auteurs cités et de la version du latin d'iceux, corrigée et augmentée, &c. Paris, Charles Sevestre, en l'isle du Palais, aux Trois Perruques, devant le Cheval de Bronze. 1617. 4to.

The title-page printed in red and black. The epigraph. The portrait as in the edition of 1611. Notice by the printers. Life of Montaigne. The long preface by Mad. de Gournay. Summaries and references to the authors, in the margin. Extract from the licence dated 28th November, 1614. Four indicia:—1. Index of chapters; 2. Analytical table, headed the same as that of the edition of Leyden of 1602; 3. Index to the proper names of men, nations, animals, towns, &c.; 4. Index to the various passages in the work which refer to the Life of Montaigne. Notice to the reader, by Mademoiselle de Gournay, relating to the translation of nearly all the Greek and Latin quotations, which are collected together at the end of the volume, in the order in which they occur in the body of the work. Lastly, a literal copy of the Latin epitaph engraved upon the tomb which had been dedicated to Montaigne in the Church of the Feuillans at Bordeaux. Coste, therefore, is wrong in stating, as he does, in his edition of 1739, that this epitaph first appeared in the edition of Paris, of 1725, in 4to.

Mademoiselle de Gournay's long preface of 1595, as it appears in the present edition, is considerably modified and corrected. The notice which this lady has prefixed to the translations here, informs us that she was assisted in this labour by Messieurs Bergeron, Martiniere, and Bignon; she assigns as a reason for the translations, which were in her own opinion superfluous, the request of the publisher, and she adds: "Je ne presente pas d'excuse d'avoir laissé dormir les passages libertins sous le voile de leur langue etrangère, ni d'avoir tors le nez à quelque mot joyeux de l'un d'entre eux."

All the editions anterior to this, except that in 12mo., of 1595, invariably have the name Montaigne; in the present edition it is alternately Montaigne and Montaigne.

I have met with copies of this edition, with the name: Paris, Michel Nivelle, Rue St. Jacques, aux Signes; and others: Paris, pour Claude Rigaud, libraire, demeurant a Lyon. Other copies have the names of the booksellers, Gueffier and Petitpas. See further, as to this edition, that of 1625.

20. The same. (Title as in that of 1611.) Rouen, Manassez de Preaulx, devant le portail des libraires. 1617. 8vo.

Portrait and frontispiece as in the edition of 1611. The epigraph vires, &c. The short preface of Mademoiselle de Gournay.—Summaries and references to authors in the margin.—Ornamented initial letters.—1130 pages.

Some copies have the address: Rouen, chez Jean Osmon, dans la Cour du Palais.

21. The same. Rouen, chez la Veuve de Thomas Daré, devant l'Esperance, 8vo.—Engraved title-page.—Portrait.—1130 pages.—Summaries, &c. in the margin.—Edition similar to those of 1602,—8,—11,—16,—17.

22. The same. 1619, in 8vo.—Edition differing from the preceding.—Analytical Table.—1130 pages.—Life of Montaigne.—Summaries, &c. in the margin. The copy which I possess, and which is the only one I have met with, has not the title-page, so I do not know where the book was printed or who was the publisher. At the end, however, it is stated that the printing of the work was completed "ce dernier jour d'Aout 1619, a l'imprimerie de Jean Durand;" and as the chronological list of booksellers and printers of Paris only mentions one Durand, whose Christian name was Peter, it is probable that the present edition was not published in Paris.

The printed catalogue of the Royal Library mentions, under this date, an edition of the Essays chez J. Doreau à Leyde, but the description corresponds with an edition brought out by Doreau, not in 1619, but in 1609; and the extreme probability, therefore, is that the catalogue is here in error. It is certain that the Royal Library now possesses no copy of the present date.

[1624.—M. Vernier mentions an edition of 1624, at London, in which, he says, many new pieces are collected. The same author also mentions editions of Paris, 1625, and La Haye, 1627. These editions do not exist, and M. Vernier has confounded them with those of 1724, 1725, and 1727. I have corrected this mistake, because this author has inserted the latter editions in their proper place, which at once brings them into double play, and tends to give persons, not acquainted with the details, a belief in the existence of the supposed editions of 1624, 25, and 27.)

23. The same. Paris, Robert Bertauld, 1625. 4to.

Some copies have the name: Veuve Remy Dallin, au mont et image Saint-Hilaire; others, Charles Hulpeau, demeurant au bout du Pont St. Michel, a l'image Saint Jean; others: Gilles et Robinot.

This edition commences with the same publisher's advertisement as in that of 1617, with which it corresponds in a very great degree, though there are differences in several features: 1. The long preface of Mademoiselle de Gournay has been here subjected to still further modifications, retrenchments, and additions; 2. The references to authors, and the summaries in the margin, do not commence till page 96; 3. The present edition contains no indexes, or portrait, nor the epitaph, which are all to be found in the edition of 1617. The translations are here, as in the latter edition, collected in the order in which the passages translated occur in the Essays.

Both these editions are very incorrect, and the publishers did quite right to terminate their notice to the reader in these words: "Excuse pour ce coup les fautes d'impression, la guerre ecartant et troublant les meilleurs ouvriers, apporte toujours quelque desordre aux arts, notamment à ceux des Muses." The edition of 1625, however, is still more incorrect even than that of 1617; and neither of them has any interest attachable to it, except from the circumstance of the re-appearance of Mademoiselle de Gournay's preface, different in each of these editions, and different from what it was in 1595, and from what it was to be in 1635.

24. The same. Rouen, Robert Valentin, dans la Cour du Palais, 1627, 8vo. Some copies are printed: "Chez Jacques Cotioué, dans la Cour du Palais;" others: "Chez Guillaume de la Haye, dans L'Estre Notre Dame."

Engraved title-page.—The epigraph vires, &c.—The short preface of Mademoiselle de Gournay.—The portrait of 1611.

Summaries and references to authors in the margins.—Analytical index.—1130 pages.

Edition conformable with those of 1602,-9,-11,-16,-17,-19,-36,-49.

I have seen several copies of this edition, in which the 2 in the date has been turned into a 9; and some of these are so skilfully managed that it was very difficult to recognize the 1627 in the forged 1697.

25. The same.—Édition nouvelle, exactement corrigée selon le vray exemplaire; enrichie à la marge des noms des autheurs cités et de la version de leurs passages, mise à la fin de chaque chapitre, avec la vie de l'autheur; plus deux tables, l'une des chapitres et l'autre des principales matières. Paris, Jean Camusat, Rue St. Jacques, à la Toison d'Or; M.D.CXXXV. Folio.

Some copies have the name "Toussaint du Bray, Rue St. Jacques, aux Espics Meurs, et Pierre Rocolet, Imprimeur Ordinaire du Roi, au Palais, en la Galerie des Prisonniers, aux armes de la Ville."

Other copies merely have on the title-page "Paris, M.D.CXXXV. Avec privilege du Roy."

The first title is printed in red and black letters; after this comes an engraved title-page, in the centre of which is a portrait of Montaigne; at the top you read: "Les Essais de Michel, Seigneur de Montaigne, and right and left, on two floating streamers, on one side: Vires acquirit eundo, and on the other: Unum pro cunctis; beneath the portrait are the scales, and the Que scais je? which appear here for the first time. At the bottom is the name—"Paris, Camusat, 1635," in the copies published by this bookseller; and in those sent forth by others, there is simply, Paris, Rue St. Jacques et au Palais. The copies by Camusat, also have, on the right and left, armorial bearings, apparently purporting to be those of Montaigne, but they are incorrect; and at the back of the last page there is the King's license, printed in a complete form, while the copies bearing the names of the other booksellers only give an extract from this license, and have not got the arms. After the license comes the transfer which Mademoiselle de Gournay made of it to Jean Camusat. This edition was superintended by Mademoiselle de Gournay herself, who dedicates it to the Cardinal de Richelieu, in the following preface:—

"A Monseigneur l'eminentissime Cardinal Duc de Richelieu."

Monseigneur,

Ne vous pouvant donner les Essais, par ce qu'ils ne sont pas à moy, et connoissant neantmoins, que tout ce qu'il y a d'illustre en nostre siecle passe par vos mains, ou vous doit homage, j'ai creu que le nom de votre Eminence devoit orner le frontispiece de ce livre. Il est vray, Monseigneur, qu'il vous rend icy, par mon entremise, un hommage fort irregulier; car ne pouvant vous le donner, je vous ose donner à luy: c'est a dire, que preste de tomber dans le sepulchre, je vous consigne cet orphelin qui m'étoit commis, afin qu'il vous plaise desormais de luy tenir lieu de tuteur et de protecteur. J'espère que le seul respect de vostre authorité luy rendra cet office: et que comme les mouches ne pouvoient entrer dans le Temple d'Hercule, dont vous etes emulateur, ainsi les mains impures, qui depuis longtemps avoient diffamé ce mesme livre, par tant de malheureuses editions, n'oseront plus commettre le sacrilege d'en approcher, quand elles le verront en vostre protection par celle-cy, que vostre liberalité m'a aidée a mettre au jour. Combien seray-je fière en l'autre monde, d'avoir esté assez hardie en quittant celluy cy, pour nommer un tel executeur de mon testament que le grand Cardinal de Richelieu! et de voir de la haut qu'on se souvienne icy bas, que j'ay sceu discerner, à quelle excellence et hautesse d'ame, je devois assigner la protection du plus excellent et plus haut present que les Muses ayent fait aux hommes, depuis les siecles triomphans des Grecs et des Romains! Vous, Monseigneur, autheur de tant d'ouvrages immortels de diverse sorte, qu'il semble que vous ayez entrepris d'encherir et d'emplifier l'empire de l'immortalité; ne l'obligez vous pas à vous offrir par vos vœux, pour une espece de recompense, les plus nobles des biens qu'elle tient d'ailleurs, comme ce livre; ouy mesmes à les reputer d'autant plus seurement immortels, qu'en les vous offrant, elle croit les appuyer aucunement sur le destin de vostre Eminence; de la quelle je demeureray, sans fin,

Monseigneur,
Tres humble et tres obeissant servant,
GOURNAY.

A Paris, le 12 Juin, 1635.

This edition contains:—the Essays; the dedication; the long preface by Mademoiselle de Gournay; Montaigne's preface, dated 1st March, 1580; a summary of the Life of Montaigne; translations of the Latin quotations, placed at the end of each chapter; analytical index. There are no summaries in the margin, but only references to the authors quoted. The Dictionnaire Historique, by Feller (Paris, 1818), says that, at the end of this edition, there is le Proumenoir de M. de Montaigne (a small work by Mademoiselle de Gournay), but this statement is altogether incorrect.

The apologetical preface here printed, is the same which Mademoiselle de Gournay at first inserted in the edition of 1595, and afterwards retracted and suppressed in that of 1598. She re-produced it in 1599, in the third edition of the Proumenoir de M. de Montaigne, omitting, however, two-thirds of the original quantity; subsequently, in 1617, she again printed it, before the Essays, after having made several modifications, and, more especially, a number of additions, which nearly doubled its extent. She again inserted it, with still larger additions, in the edition of the Essays published in 1625; and finally, having once more augmented and corrected it, she prefixed it to the edition now under notice, from which the reprint of it in the present volume is made. The style of the first edition of this preface was certainly somewhat diffuse and turgid, but these defects are corrected in the modification of it which now appeared. In it the authoress discusses closely and gravely the principal objections which had been advanced against the Essays, and replies to them, for the most part, in a very triumphant manner. Bayle justly remarks of this preface, that it well merits a reading; and Coste, who, in consequence of confounding it with that of the edition of 1595, had excluded it from his first edition of Montaigne, admitted it into his third and subsequent editions.

This edition of the Essays, remarks M. Payen, has been placed on an equality with that of 1595; indeed some bibliographers even give it the preference, and amongst the latter number I find the learned M. Weiss. Notwithstanding the weight which I am ever ready to concede to such an authority, I must, however, express a contrary opinion in this instance; and declare my conviction that, if the edition of 1635 is superior to its predecessor in reference to the additional pieces it contains, it is inferior to it in point of authenticity of text. Mademoiselle de Gournay herself is obliged to admit that she has made considerable alterations, and, however scrupulous she may have considered herself in venturing upon them, it is certain that they exist; and, whatever she may say as to this edition being la sœur germaine of that of 1595, the latter must always retain the pre-eminence for authenticity of text, and for superiority of typographical execution. M. Droz, who gives the preference to the edition of 1635 over that of 1595, founds it upon some differences which exist between the two editions, and his own particular taste in favour of the more modern version. But the reply is obvious, that the changes made in the text of the edition of 1635, even though they were improvements, which I take upon myself to deny, are not the work of Montaigne. Mademoiselle de Gournay had been in possession of no new materials since 1595, the period at which she announced that she had been entrusted to superintend the publication of the Essays of Montaigne, enrichis des traits de sa derniere main.

The Privilege du Roy, which is given verbatim in this edition, is remarkable, from the circumstance that it is drawn up in a manner differing from that in which these documents are ordinarily couched, and that it expresses the opinion of the Editor as to the preceding editions, without excepting even those of 1617 and 1625, in which she had indirectly participated.

The following is an extract from this Royal License, dated 13th September, 1633:—"Louis, &c. Notre chère et bien-aimée, la damoiselle de Gournay, nous a fait remontrer que le feu sieur de Montaigne lui ayant, de son vivant, recommandé le soin de son livre des Essais, et depuis son décède, ses plus proches lui ayant donné toute charge de l'impression d'iceux, comme il est notoire, et plusieurs fautes énormes s'étant coulées en la plupart des impressions, en sorte que tout le livre s'en trouve gâté et plein d'omissions et additions apostées, comme l'exposante a fait voir à aucuns de nos amés et féaux conseillers..... Elle a désiré rendre ce devoir au public et à la mémoire dudit défunt sieur de Montaigne, d'empêcher que ce désordre n'arrive plus en l'impression dudit livre, qui est d'importance comme étant un œuvre très excellent et qui fait honneur à la France..... A ces causes, désirant gratifier ladite exposante et favoriser la bonne intention qu'elle a de conserver ledit œuvre des ESSAIS en la façon qu'il a été composé par l'auteur," &c.

Conformably with the promise made in this preface by Mademoiselle de Gournay, "de répéter encore la recherche des fautes de cette édition, et d'en mettre après un exemplaire en la bibliothèque du roi, corrigé des derniers traits de sa plume, afin que la postérité y puisse avoir recours au besoin," she presented the Royal Library with a copy, in which she had made some corrections, not, however, more than thirty in number, beyond those marked in the errata, and in the title-page of which she has written: Don de Mademoiselle de Gournay.

Though I thus accord to the edition of 1595 the preference over that of 1635, still the latter edition is one of the best we have of the Essays; the print and paper are tolerably good, though inferior to the edition of 1595; while it possesses over the latter what some persons will consider the material advantage of containing translations of the quotations. The copies published by Camusat are the best, inasmuch as they contain the whole of the King's Licence, of which the other copies only give an extract.

26. The same. Dernière Edition, enrichie d'annotations en marge, corrigée suivant les premieres impressions. Paris, Salomon de la Fosse. MD.C.XXXVI. 8vo.

Some copies bear the name of Pierre Lamy; others that of Guillaume Loyson, au Palais, en la Galere des Prisonniers, au Nom de Jesus; others that of Michel Blageart.

Title printed in red and black.—The epigraph vères, &c.—The preface of Montaigne, and the short one by Mademoiselle de Gournay.—Summary of the Life of Montaigne.—Ornamented initial letters to most of the chapters.—1130 pages, without the Index.

Edition corresponding with those of 1608,-9,-11, &c. See under 1649.

27. The same. Edition nouvelle, corrigée suivant les premieres impressions de l'Angelier, et augmentée d'Annotations en marge de toutes les matieres les plus remarquable, avec la Vie de l'Auteur. Paris, Michel Blageart, rue de la Calandre, a la Fleur de Lys, pres le Palais. 1640. Folio.

Title-page in red and black, in the centre of which is the portrait of Montaigne.—No epigraph. —No preface by Mademoiselle de Gournay.—Summary of the life.—Analytical Index.—Summaries in the margins.—References to authors.—No translation of the quotations.—A good edition, the copies of which, on large paper, are very fine.

It is seen that the title-page indicates that the edition is printed "suivant les premieres impressions de l'Angelier," a sufficient evidence that the alterations made by Mademoiselle de Gournay, in the edition she inscribed to Richelieu, were not generally approved of.

I find among my notes, says M. Payen, a reference to an edition in folio of this date, Paris, Augustin Courbé, à la Palme, which is probably the edition under notice, with a different title-page.

28. The same. Edition nouvelle, enrichie d'annotations en marge, corrigée et augmentée d'un tiers, outre les precedentes impressions, avec une table tres ample des noms et des matieres remarquables et signalées; plus la vie de l'auteur, extraite de ses propres ecrits. Rouen, chez Jean Berthelin, dans la Cour du Palais. 1641. 8vo.

Engraved title-page, having in the upper part a portrait of Montaigne, with allegories, signed F. Honeruogh.—The epigraph.—The short preface by Mademoiselle de Gournay. — Summaries and references to authors in the margin.—Ornamental initial letters to the chapters.—1130 pages —Edition corresponding with those of 1608, 11, &c. (See under 1649.)

Some copies of this edition have the name à Rouen, chez Jacques Besongue, dans la Cour du Palais. No date.

29. The same. Derniere edition, enrichie d'annotations en marge, avec une table tres ample des matieres. Paris, Michel Blageart, au bout du Pont Neuf, au coin de la rue Dauphine. 1649. 8vo.

A reprint of the folio edition of the same publisher.—Title printed in red and black, the epigraph misprinted utriusque ACQUIRIT EUNDO.—The preface of Mademoiselle de Gournay is omitted.—1130 pages.—Vignettes, with fleurs de lis, at the commencement of the life, and of the two first chapters.—There is a vignette also, but of a different design, at the head of the third chapter.—Ornamented initial letters to the chapters.

30. The same. Edition nouvelle, &c. (same title as 1641), à Anvers, chez Abraham Maire. No date. 8vo.

Engraved title-page, and portrait as in the editions of 1608, 11, &c.—Neither Montaigne's nor de Gournay's preface.—Summaries and author's names in the margin.—This edition is a different one from those of 1608, 11, &c., though it resembles them in many particulars.

31. I have met with a copy of an edition of Montaigne similar to those of 1608, 11, &c., yet a different edition from those; but the title-page was missing, so that I could not ascertain either the name, place, or date.—1130 pages.—Ornamental initial letters to the chapters.—The prefaces, life, marginal summaries, analytical index, are the same as in the previously described editions; but that which distinguishes the present edition from its predecessors is a vignette, with fleur-de-lys, at the head of Book II., and other vignettes before the two other chapters, the Life, the prefaces, &c.

With reference to the editions hitherto described, M. Payen remarks: "Toutes les editions qui precedent, excepté la premiere, sont en un seul volume; mais parmi elles il en est plusieurs qui semblent être une succession de reimpression les unes des autres. Le format en est petit in-8vo.; le caractère est à peu près le même pour toutes; la plupart ont le même portrait, le même titre gravé, le même nombre de pages, c'est-a-dire onze cent trente pages; elles se suivent l'une l'autre page pour page et ligne pour ligne, de telle sorte que le plus grand nombre des pages et des lignes commencent et finissent par le même mot, et le chiffre des pages suit également; il y a plus, c'est que souvent les mêmes fautes se rencontrent, soit qu'elles aient lieu dans le texte ou dans la pagination; quant à ces dernières, lorsque dans une édition elles n'ont pas été suivies pour une page, on est sûr de les retrouver plus loin, de telle sorte qu'après quelques feuilles les deux exemplaires marchent ensemble. Ainsi, aux éditions de 1611 et de 1649, on saute de la page 605 à 608. Les éditions de 1619, 1627 et 1636 ne présentent pas cette lacune, mais on la retrouve à la page 608, où l'on passe brusquement à celle numérotée 611, et ensuite toutes les éditions marchent d'accord. La ressemblance générale qui résulte des circonstances que je viens d'énumérer est telle, qu'au premier coup d'œil on serait tenté d'admettre qu'il n'y a, pour toutes ces dates diverses, que deux ou trois éditions dont les titres seulement sont différents, et il est souvent difficile de trouver quelque particularité qui puisse les différencier les unes des autres. J'ai mis tous mes soins à distinguer ces diverses éditions, et je puis affirmer que celles que j'ai décrites comme étant différentes, le sont bien en effet. Les éditions qui ont entre elles une telle ressemblance sont celles de 1602 (les deux de Leyde), 1609, 1611, 1616, 1617 (Rouen), 1619 (les deux), 1627, 1636, 1641, et les deux qui terminent cette série, savoir celle d'Anvers et celle dont le titre manque (numéro 31).

"Dans ces éditions, les chapitres entiers sont sans un seul alinéa, excepté ceux rendus obligatoires par les citations. Le chapitre 2 du livre II., qui dans la plupart des éditions autres que celles-ci, et dans toutes celles qui suivent, est intitulé Contre la fainéantise, est ici intitulé Contre la fantasie. Ces éditions, dont plusieurs sont assez bien exécutées, ne sont pas très communes; elles sont généralement peu correctes, et cependant elles sont précieuses pour les lecteurs assidus des Essais; car le format in-8°. du temps n'étant pas plus grand que nos in-12 d'aujourd'hui, il n'est aucune des éditions de Montaigne qui offre les Essais sous un volume aussi portatif que celles-là.

" Je rappelie ici une remarque que j'ai faite antérieurement à l'occasion de l'édition de 1593; c'est que, dans un grand nombre d'exemplaires de ces éditions, le chapitre des vers de Virgile est complétement enlevé. Cette mutilation se voit surtout sur les exemplaires qui ont appartenu à des couvents. Les personnes scrupuleuses auxquelles elle est due auront sans doute pensé, contrairement à l'avis de Montaigne, que son portrait n'aurait pas souffert de n'être pas aussi complet qu'il a voulu qu'il fût; elles auront oublié que l'auteur des Essais leur avait dit, dans la préface, ' que s'il eût été parmi ces nations qu'on dit vivre encore sous la douce liberté des premieres lois de la nature, il s'y fût tres volontiers peint tout entier et tout nu.' Il faut convenir que si, par révérence, pour son lecteur, Montaigne ne s'est pas peint tout nu dans ce chapitre, on peut dire au moins qu'il s'y est peint en fort simple déshabillé."

32. The same. Nouvelle édition, exactement purgée des défauts des précédentes, selon le vrai original, et enrichie et augmentée aux marges du nom des autheurs qui y sont citez et de la version de leurs passages, Grecs et Latins; avec des observations très importantes et nécessaires pour le soulagement du lecteur, ensemble la vie de l'autheur et deux tables, l' une des chapitres et l'autre des principales matieres de beaucoup plus amples et plus utiles que celles des dernieres edition, avec augmentation de la version françoise de passages italiens. Paris, Augustin Courbé, au Palais, en la galerie des Merciers, à la Palme, 1652. Folio.

The first title-page is printed in red and black characters, with a vignette representing a palm-tree, and the motto (in allusion to the bookseller's name) Resurgo curvata. The second title is an engraved one, with a portrait, the same as that in the edition of 1635. Instead of the name of Camusat, however, we have here the following: Rue St. Jacques et au Palais, 1652. There is a vignette, with fleurs-de-lys, at the head of all the three books, and of the preface by de Gournay. Some copies bear the name of Pierre Rocolet; others of Veuve Sebastien Hurè, et Sebastien Hurè, rue St. Jacques, au Cœur-Bon. In these copies the emblem of the palm-tree is replaced by that of the tree of the Stephens', with the noli altum sapere.

This edition contains, besides the Essays, the long preface and dedication of de Gournay,—the preface of Montaigne,—a summary of his life,—references to authors in the margin, and translations of the passages quoted, the whole preceded by a notice by the printer, Henry Stephen, in which he details the improvements he has made in this edition, more especially in placing the translations opposite the text; the first time of this arrangement being introduced.

The licence granted to Henry Stephen bears date 3rd of May; and it is followed by a note, stating that the printer has made an agreement, for this edition only, with the booksellers Courbé and Le Petit. It is therefore probable that some copies bear the name of the latter bookseller.

33. The same.—Edition nouvelle (rest of title same as the edition of 1652). Paris, Jean Baptiste Loyson, Rue St.-Jacques, pres la Poste, à la Croix Rouge. Folio, 840 pages. Some copies have the names: Jacques Langlois et Emmanuel Langlois; others: Pierre Lamy, au Grand Cesar; others: Pierre Rocolet, imprimeur-ordinaire du Roi et de la Maison-de-Ville, au Palais, en la galerie des Prisonniers: others: la Veuve Marin Dupuis, rue St.-Jacques, a la Couronne d'Or; others: Sebastien Hurè et Frederic Leonard; others: Edme Coulerot, rue St.-Jacques, au Bon Pasteur et à la Bible d'Or. The first title is printed in red and black, with the emblem and motto of the Stephens: the second title is engraved, with the portrait of 1635 and 1652. At the bottom there is merely Rue St.-Jacques; and Au Palais. There is the licence of 1651 prefixed, with a note of Henry Stephen, stating that he has transferred his rights for this edition, to Le Petit and Hué, so that it is probable there are some copies bearing the name of the former bookseller. This edition is a reprint of the preceding, and would at first sight appear to be the same; but, besides several other differences, the present volume has this distinct statement:—Achevé d'imprimer pour la deuxieme fois, 1er Octobre 1657.

34. The same.—Nouvelle edition, enrichie et augmentée aux marges du nom des autheurs qui y sont citez, avec la version des passages grecs latins, et italiens. Paris, Christophe Journel, rue Vielle Boucherie, au bout du Pont-St.-Michel, à l'image St.-Jean; 1659. 12mo. 3 vols.

Each volume has an engraved title-page, with the engraver's name, N. de Larmessin; portrait of Montaigne, and beneath it the Scales and the Que scais-je? Montaigne's preface. Dedication to Richelieu. De Gournay's long preface. Life of Montaigne. In the margins, summaries, references to authors, and translations of the passages quoted. Each volume comprises one book of the Essays, and has a table of chapters and a table of contents. The Sonnets of La Boëtie are not printed in this edition. This edition is the first, since that of 1580, which forms more than one volume; the appearance of its typography is neat enough, but it is by no means irreproachable as to correctness of text.

Montaigne's preface here is headed: "Avertissement de l'autheur, inseré en toutes les precedentes editions," which is a mistake, for this preface does not appear, either in the edition of 1595 or in that of Antwerp.

35. The same. — Nouvelle edition, exactement purgée des defauts des precedentes, et augmentée aux marges du nom des autheurs qui y sont cités et de la version de leurs passages, avec des observations tres importantes et necessaires pour le soulagement du lecteur; ensemble la vie de l'autheur et deux tables, l'une des chapitres, et l'autre des principales matieres, de beaucoup plus ample et plus utile que celle des dernieres editions.—Bruxelles, François Foppens, libraire et imprimeur, M.D.CLIX.; or Amsterdam, Antoine Michiels, libraire.

The title-page is printed in red and black, and is preceded in the first volume by an engraved frontispiece, signed P. Chouwet, in the centre of which is Montaigne's portrait, with the scales and the Que sçais-je. Above it is: LES ESSAIS DE MICHEL, SEIGNEUR DE MONTAIGNE; and beneath, "mis (sic.) en 3 vol."

Besides the contents detailed in the title-page, this edition comprises the dedication to Richelieu, De Gournay's long preface, and a summary of the Life of Montaigne. At the end of the preliminary matter are two quotations from the writings of Justus Lipsius, in praise of Montaigne.

The heading to the preface by Montaigne has the same mistake which is pointed out in the preceding article. In vol. 3, there is a general analytical table, much more convenient than the three separate indexes in the preceding edition.

This edition is greatly esteemed and sought after, on account of its typographical beauty.

Some copies of this edition were printed upon different paper from the general impression. Brunet says, upon this point: "On n'en recherche plus guère maintenant que les exemplaires très grands de marges; c'est-a-dire," adds M. Payen, "ceux qui ont de 5 pouces 8 lignes a 5 pouces 11 lignes. Un exemplaire de 5 pouces 9 lignes a été vendu 90 fr. (A. Martin); 5 pouces 8 lignes, 131 fr. (Firmin Didot); 5 pouces 10 lignes, 150 fr. (Renouard); 5 pouces 11 lignes, 284 fr. Mar. (Bl. Dent. Berard) (magnifique exemplaire de la plus belle conservation, et avec témoins)."

There has been a considerable discussion as to the printer of this edition, some of the particulars of which, as a matter of interest to bibliographers, are here subjoined. M. Payen writes:—"Cette édition a été généralement attribuée aux Elzévirs. M. Bérard partage cette opinion, qui a été combattue par MM. Charles Nodier et Brunet, et par Bastien; M. Berard soutient qu'elle a été executée dans l'imprimerie de Jean et de Daniel Elzévir; il se fonde sur un passage d'une lettre que Desmarest addressait à Chapelain, et dans lequel il le félicite de s'être chargé de recueillir les éloges et les témoignages (elogia et testimonia) des auteurs qui ont parlé de Montaigne pour en enrichir l'edition que les Elzévirs preparent. M. Bérard ajoute d'ailleurs que les caractères sont ceux que les Elzévirs employaient ordinairement pour l'impression de leurs livres, et que l'on y trouve les vignettes qu'ils avaient seuls l'habitude d'employer.' M. Charles Nodier a repondu à la premiere assertion de M. Bérard: que l'absence des elogia et testimonia dans l'edition en question prouve qu'elle n'est pas celle que les Elzévirs avaient projetée; qu'il est probable que ces imprimeurs avaient preparé une édition de Montaigne, mais qu'ils ne l'ont pas publiée; que le format grand in-12 du Montaigne fournit même une présomption nouvelle, puisqu'ils avaient adopté presque exclusivement le format petit in-12, qui est celui du Charron, avec lequel leur Montaigne aurait dû necessairement faire collection. Enfin M. Charles Nodier est d'avis que cette édition tout imprimée qu'elle soit avec des caractères et des fleurons elzéviriens n'est pas digne des Elzévirs, et à cet égard M. Brunet entre dans quelques détails dont je donnerai seulement le substance. Ce bibliographe établit qu'aucune des éditions qui portent le nom d'un des Elzévirs ne présente identiquement les caractères du Montaigne, tandis que ces mêmes caractères se rencontrent déjà dans l'Alaric de Scudéry, bien certainement imprimé à Bruxelles par Fr. Foppens en 1656; or, ce Foppens, libraire et imprimeur, est le même dont le nom se lit sur les titres d'une partie des exemplaires du Montaigne de 1659, et on remarque que les caractères de ces trois volumes sont un peu usés, et par conséquent moins beaux que dans l'Alaric, publié trois ans auparavant. M. Brunet rappelle ensuite que le Montaigne de Foppens est annoncé comme étant de Bruxelles dans deux catalogues de Blaeu, imprimés à Amsterdam en 1659 et 1662. Or, comme le rédacteur de ces deux catalogues a eu soin d'y marquer avec une certaine exactitude le nom des villes où ont été imprimés les livres qu'il annonce, même lorsque ces noms ne se lisent pas sur le titre, il faut bien croire que lui, qui écrivait à Amsterdam l'année même que parut le Montaigne, devait savoir à quoi s'en tenir sur le lieu de l'impression. "Je n'ai pas la prétention," adds M. Payen, "d'appuyer de mon autorité l'opinion de MM. Charles Nodier et Brunet; mais je suis convaincu que l'édition du Montaigne de Hollande n'a pas été imprimé par les Elzévirs."

In his Nouvelles Recherches Bibliographiques. M. Brunet thus reverts to the question:—"Nous avons dit (iv. 558), qu'il ne parait pas que cette edition a été imprimée par les Elzévirs; mais comme à ce sujet M. Bérard nous reproche de n'avoir pas donné de raisons à l'appui de cette assertion qui ne suffit pas, ajoute-il, pour detruire une opinion accreditée depuis longtemps, nous croyons necessaire d'entrer ici dans quelques details. D'abord, disons nous, aucune edition portant le nom d'un des Elzévirs ne nous presente identiquement les caractères du Montaigne, tandis que ces mêmes caractères se rencontrent déjà dans l'Alaric de Scudéry, bien certainement imp. à Bruxelles, par Fr. Foppens, en 1656. Or, ce Fr. Foppens, libraire et imprimeur, est le même dont le nom se lit sur les titres d'une partie des exemplaires de Montaigne de 1659; et remarquons que les caractères de ses 3 vol. sont déjà un peu usés, et par consequent, un peu moins beaux que dans l'Alaric publié trois ans avant; c'est donc Foppens et non Elzévir qui a imprimé le livre que nous occupe. En suite, nous ajouterons, un fait qui confirmera entièrement notre opinion à cet égard; c'est que le Montaigne de Foppens est annoncé comme de Bruxelles, dans deux catalogues de Blaeu, imp. à Amsterdam en 1659 et en 1662. Or, comme le redacteur de ces deux catalogues a eu soin d'y marquer, avec une certaine exactitude, les noms des villes ou ont été impr. les livres qu'il annonce, et même lorsque ces noms ne ce lisent pas sur les titres, il faut croire que lui, qui ecrivait à Amsterdam, et l'année même que parut le Montaigne, devait bien savoir a quoi s'en tenir sur le point ici en question, et que s'il a ecrit Bruxelles, c'est à coup sur il ne fallait pas ecrire Amsterdam. Quant à la lettre de Rolland Desmaretz à Chapelain, que M. Berard cite comme un temoignage precieux en faveur de son opinion, elle n'a aucune rapport à l'edition de 1659, ainsi que l'a bien demontré M. Nodier dans ses melanges."

Those who wish to study the question more at length may consult the "Essai Bibliographique sur les éditions des Elzévirs, par M. Bérard," and the "Melanges tirés d'une petite Bibliothèque, par M. Ch. Nodier."

36. The same. Edition nouvelle, &c. (same as in title-page of the edition of Paris, 1659.) Paris, Laurent Rondet, Christophe Journel, et Robert Chevillon. M.D.C.LXIX. 3 vols. 12mo.

A reprint of the edition of Journel, containing the same pieces.

37. The same. Nouvelle edition, &c. (as in the edition of Foppens.)* Lyon, André Olyer, Rue Tupin, à la Providence. 1669. 3 vols. 12mo.

Some copies have: Lyon, Ant. Besson, Rue Tupin, proche L'Empereur. In the first volume is an engraved frontispiece, signed N. Auroux, copied from that in the editions of Foppens. The second title, which is printed in black and red in the first volume, and in black only in the two others, has, in Olyer's copies, a vignette, representing a woman holding up towards the sun a sphere, surmounted by a cross; Besson's copies have neither vignette nor date. This edition, in all other respects, is conformable to that of Holland, 1659. There is a third title-page, engraved, containing a portrait of Montaigne, with Les Essais de Montaigne, at top; the epigraph and the scales; and in a shield, "Mis (sic) en 3 vols."

38. The same. Nouvelle edition, faites sur les plus anciennes et les plus correctes, augmentées de quelques lettres de l'autheur, et ou les passages grecs, latins, et italiens sont traduits plus fidelement et cités plus exactement que dans aucune des editions precedentes, avec de courtes remarques et le nouveaux indices plus amples et plus utiles que ceux qui avaient paru jusqu'ici; par Pierre Coste, Londres, de l'imprimerie de J. Tonson et J. Watts. 1724. 4to. 3 vols.

Editor's preface. — Marginal summaries. — A variety of notes by the editor, historical, critical, and explanatory of obscure passages and obsolete phrases. At the end of the third volume are printed seven letters written by Montaigne, viz. the five which appeared in the volume of translations of La Boëtie; a sixth addressed to Mademoiselle Paulmier; and a seventh taken from Montaigne's translation of Sebond. — Analytical table of contents. — At the beginning of the work there is a portrait of Montaigne, engraved after Genest, by Chereau, beneath which are the scales, the Que scais-je?, and the arms of Montaigne, taken from the edition of 1635, and consequently altogether inexact.

This edition, printed from that of L'Angelier, 1595, is one of the best and finest that we possess of Montaigne. To it should be added a supplement, which was published in London, in 1740, under the title of: SUPPLEMENT AUX ESSAIS DE MICHEL, SEIGNEUR DE MONTAIGNE. Londres, G. Darres and J. Brindley, 1740, 4to. Some later copies of this work are entitled, MEMOIRES POUR SERVIR AUX ESSAIS DE MICHEL, SEIGNEUR DE MONTAIGNE, deuxieme edition; Londres, G. Darres, C. Du Bosc, et J. Brindley. 1741.

This supplement, which consists of 96 pages, comprises the various additions made by Coste to the edition which he published in 1739. These are: 1st, Notice from the publishers, taken principally from the preface of Coste to his edition of 1739; 2nd, the Life of Montaigne, by the President Bouhier; 3rd, the parallel between Epictetus and Montaigne, by Pascal; 4th, the Servitude Volontaire, by La Boëtie; 5th, Expilly's sonnet on Montaigne; and a note upon Arius and his Pope Leo, by Barbeyrac.

It is this supplement which is dedicated to the President Bouhier, and not the edition of 1725, as M. Beuchot incorrectly states, in his life of Bouhier, in the Biographie Universelle.

The following passage from M. Coste's preface may be thought worthy a place here:

"All men of good sense have long been agreed as to the merit of Montaigne's Essays. For my own part, I do not pretend to make a formal harangue in their praise, nor to enter into a discussion of the criticisms that have been passed upon them: for as to their merit, I can add nothing to what has been already said of it by others; and am persuaded that such as shall read the work with any application, will be easily convinced of the weakness of most of those criticisms. But there is one thing upon which I cannot help making some reflections, and that is the noble candour Montaigne has demonstrated throughout the whole book, and from which he has not once departed: Montaigne has been very much censured for having made himself so much the subject of his book: but this objection has been refuted a thousand times, and I have heard it very often repeated in company, where I could easily perceive that they who made it were not very well acquainted with Montaigne's manner of painting himself, in this book. He has done it with so much sincerity, that there is all the reason in the world to believe that he engaged in so difficult an undertaking, not so much out of vanity, as to communicate instruction. It is, however, certain that the picture he has here drawn of himself is in the nature of a faithful mirror, wherein all men may discover some of their own features, if they will but take the trouble to view themselves in it attentively, and with an honest design to see what they are in reality. And to good purpose will it be; for in this world a man must be very careful to inspect himself, or by living at random be incessantly exposed to the derision of other men, and be a prey to his own foibles, always in uneasiness and confusion, and always repining at evils, or which he will neither know the cause nor the proper remedy. 'If,' as Montaigne says, very well upon this occasion, 'the world complains that I speak too much of myself, I complain that they do not so much as think of themselves.' Would men but try to imitate Montaigne's freedom, and paint themselves in their genuine colours, they will soon perceive the undertaking not to be so blameable as it is difficult to execute.

"The generality of mankind are so blinded by a false complaisance to themselves, and by an unjustifiable kind of shame, that, far from being able to unmask themselves to the public with that amiable sincerity which appears in Montaigne, they have not even the courage to pry into the secret recesses of their own hearts, in order to make a private discovery to themselves of their own foibles, levities, and the true motives of their actions. That undoubtedly is the reason why, of so many writers who have appeared in print since Montaigne, and of whom most have been but faint imitators (a tribe which has ever been the most numerous in the republic of letters), there has not appeared one who attempted to walk in his steps.

"This is so remarkable, that the Duke of Buckingham, Marquis of Normanby, &c., famous for a nice discernment, and a judgment which was never suspected of being clouded by an idle complaisance, or ill grounded prejudices, took occasion hence to pass a noble compliment upon Montaigne. For, after having mentioned Cicero and Lord Chancellor Bacon as two excellent geniuses, whose conduct was so inconsistent with the wise maxims which adorned their writings, he says that those two celebrated authors would have done much more service to the public if they had given it a candid and particular account of the true causes of that contradiction. 'But,' he adds, 'we must never expect so much sincerity in any writer, except the incomparable Montaigne, who is like to stand alone to all posterity. I know very well,' continues the Duke of Buckingham, 'that Montaigne is charged with vanity, but, in my opinion, without reason. And supposing it true that he has not been altogether exempt from it, never did any person take so right a method to disguise it; for as all his vanity was to publish his foibles and imperfections as freely as his good qualities, it was a vanity of a very particular species, and perhaps would deserve another name.'

"Montaigne speaks of his book with the same frankness as he does of himself. Besides the quotations with which he has enriched it, he confesses ingenuously that he has concealed the names of many celebrated authors, whose reasons and comparisons he has transplanted into his work, purposely to awe those rash censurers, who no sooner see a new book come out, but they set about criticising it; moreover, so far was he from a thought of appropriating the sentiments of another writer to himself, that he says, 'He should love any one that could, by a clear judgment, strip him of his borrowed feathers.'

"---- But, from the very quotations with which Montaigne has enriched his book, some have taken occasion to impeach his sincerity, which, to dispossess him of, would be entirely to deface his character. 'How comes it,' say they, 'that Montaigne, who has filled his book with such a number of quotations, complains so often and so bitterly of the weakness of his memory? From what source has he drawn so many scraps of history, and all those beautiful passages of which he has made such singular applications? Was it not his memory that furnished him with the names of so many philosophers, their instructive maxims which he quotes at every turn, those long details which he gives of their sentiments, on the nicest questions of natural and moral philosophy, on the nature of the Divine Being, and of the essence and immortality of the soul?'

"In answer to this objection, without entering into particulars, which would carry us too far, it may be observed, in the first place, that, for want of memory, Montaigne has sometimes fallen into very gross errors, as where he mistook Crates, for Socrates; one Dionysius, for Diogenes the Cynic; Heraclides Ponticus, for Pythagoras; and where he makes Thales say the very contrary to what he said, as he sometimes did Plutarch, his most intimate friend, whose works he always had in his hands, and from whom he was inseparable, even at the time he was inclined 'to be without the company and the remembrance of every other book.'

In the second place, it is not owing to memory, nor was it in the heat of composition, that Montaigne embellished his book with all the quotations that now appear in it: he inserted them for the most part at his leisure, and as he met with them in the books that came in his way. To be convinced of this, one need only run over the first editions of the Essays, wherein there are but few quotations in chapters which were afterwards full charged with them. For instance, in the 12th chapter of the second volume, for three pages together there is a great display of the sentiments of all the most celebrated philosophers of antiquity, concerning the nature of God; but there is not a single word of it in the first edition of the Essays, printed at Bordeaux, in 1580, nor in that at Paris, in 1588. And in the edition which I have now put out, it will appear to every reader that Montaigne met with all those sentiments very exactly explained in Cicero, whence it was very easy for him, without any effort of the memory, to transplant them into his book.

"Here I cannot avoid taking notice of a censure which Montaigne has very frankly passed upon himself, and as to which nobody has ever once thought fit to contradict him; and that is what he says, in his third volume, of his loose and incoherent way of writing, or, as he calls it himself, by leaps and skips.

"This defect is not absolutely owing, as has been always believed, to the particular genius of Montaigne, which unaccountably drew him from one subject to another, so that he was not capable of giving more order and connection to his own thoughts; but to the many additions which he made here and there to his book, as often as it came to be reprinted. If we only compare the first editions of the Essays with those that followed, it is obvious that those frequent additions have very much perplexed and confounded such arguments as were originally very clear and very well connected. Montaigne's style, such as it appears in the first editions, and such as it stands in the latter editions, after having been corrupted by those additions, might be compared to a pearl necklace, with whose pearls, though at first all perfectly round, and of an equal size, others should be mixed afterwards altogether as round, but much larger, which, at the same time that they enhanced the price of the necklace, would deprive it of great part of its beauty. The case is the same with most of the thoughts which Montaigne has inserted, from time to time, in his book. One would be sorry to lose them, though, by the manner of engrafting them in it, they disfigure it in many places. Because Montaigne himself could, without any difficulty, perceive the chain of his first thoughts, notwithstanding all his insertions that broke the connection, he imagined that a reader of any attention would discern them as well as he did. But in some parts of his work the traces of that connection are so faint and obscure, that it cannot be perceived without consulting the most ancient editions."

39. The same.—Donnés sur les plus anciennes et les plus correctes éditions; augmentés de plusieurs lettres de l'auteur; et où les passages grecs, latins, et italiens, sont traduits plus fidelement, et cités plus exactement, que dans aucune des precedentes. Avec des notes et des nouvelles tables des matières, beaucoup plus utiles que celles qui avaient paru jusqu'ici. Par P. Coste. Nouvelle edition, plus ample et plus correcte que la derniere de Londres.

Paris, par la Societe, MDCCXXV. 4to. 3 vols. Title-page printed in red and black; portrait by Chereau, different from those of 1724, with the scales, the Que scais-je? and the correct arms of Montaigne. In addition to the contents of the London edition, this edition comprises—1. A notice from the publishers, setting forth the improvements they have introduced; 2. Madlle. de Gournay's preface, and dedication to Richelieu, and the summary of Montaigne's Life; 3. The two epitaphs on Montaigne, one in Latin prose, and the other in Greek verse, with a translation of the latter into Latin verse; 4. The sonnets of La Boëtie, which had not been printed in any edition since that of 1588; 5. Two additional letters by Montaigne; 6. Some additional notes at the end of the 3rd volume; and 7. The opinions of a number of eminent men upon Montaigne. This edition, which Coste preferred to his own of 1724, is supposed to have been produced under the care of M. Gueullette and M. Jamet the elder. This edition, however, though as good in many respects, and more complete, than that of 1724, is not so handsome as the latter, nor by any means so much sought after. The supplement of 1740 should be added to this edition also. In reference to this edition, M. Payen observes:—"M. Bastien, qui n'est pas toujours indulgent pour ses predecesseurs, dit que l'édition de Londres, 1724, et celle de Paris, 1725, outre les defauts de celle de 1659, qui n'ont fait qu'augmenter, sont de plus imparfaites par des membres de phrases oubliés ou supprimés, comme dans les chapitres 17 et 21 du second livre. Quoi qu'en dise cet editeur, les admirateurs de Montaigne conserveront toujours une grande reconnaissance pour les travaux de Coste; ses editions generalement bonnes, ses notes trop prolixe peut-être, mais exactes, ses traductions ont popularisé les Essais, et les ont rendus accessibles à une classe nombreuse de lecteurs; et je me fais un devoir de rapporter une note de M. Brunet, qui apprecie avec justesse ce qu'on doit à cet estimable et laborieux commentateur: 'Aux yeux de bien de gens Coste a le grand tort d'avoir rajeuni l'orthographe de Montaigne, quoique par ce moyen il ait facilité la lecture de son auteur; il est certain aussi que ses éditions sont en général moins exactes que celles de 1595 et 1635; cependant il y a donné avec beaucoup plus de soin que le précédent éditeur les noms des auteurs cités, avec une traduction plus fidèle de leurs passages. Les notes grammaticales et explicatives qu'il a placées au bas des pages ne sont pas toutes bonnes, mais il y en a beaucoup de curieuses, et l'on a peut-être eu tort de les écarter des éditions modernes.'"

40. The same.—Third edition of Coste, Geneva, or La Haye, P. Gosse et J. Neaulme. 1727. 12mo. 5 vols. Edition conformable to the preceding. Title-page printed in red and black; Mademoiselle de Gournay's preface; opinions upon Montaigne by eminent writers; La Boëtie's sonnets. Coste states that this edition is in some respects superior to that of Paris.

Fournier speaks of an edition at Geneva, in five vols. 8vo, 1725, which must be a misprint for 1727, as there is no Genevese edition of 1725.

41. The same.—Coste's French edition, augmented by the Life of Montaigne, and some new notes, not comprised in the editions of 1724, 25, 27. Londres (Trevoux), J. Nourse, 1739, 12mo. 6 vols. Engraved portrait, after that of 1724. Coste's preface of 1724, with an additional preface, dated 1738. Vol. 6 contains the Servitude Volontaire, Mademoiselle de Gournay's preface, her dedication to Richelieu, the summary of Montaigne's life, his letters, critical opinions, and analytical table. The Life of Montaigne, by the President Beubier, is here first printed, and this edition is also the first that contains the Servitude Volontaire. These additions constitute the supplement printed in 4to.

An excellent and beautiful edition.

In the new preface to this edition, Coste introduces the sonnet of Expilly, of whom he observes: "L'auteur de ces vers est sans doute le même que Claude Expilly, dont on trouve un éloge historique très intéressant dans le dictionnaire de Moréri;" and he might have readily ascertained the exactness of this supposition, if he had looked at "Les Poemes de Messire Claude Expilly, conseiller du roy en son conseil d'état, president au parlement de Grenoble. Grenoble, P. Verdier, 1624. 4to." The sonnet in question is at page 190.

42. The same.—Coste's fifth edition, "corrigée et augmentée." Londres, Nourse, 1745. 12mo. 7 vols. An edition conformable to the preceding. The preface of 1739 is here somewhat modified, and new dated, 19th May, 1745. It describes the corrections made by Coste in the present edition. Coste says: "Celle-ci sera selon toutes les apparences la dernière que je publierai; je l'ai revue et corrigée avec tout le soin dont je suis capable." He adds, that with the aid of his emendations and explanations, "les Essais seront dorénevant aussi aisés à entendre que la Princesse de Cleves." This is the best edition published by Coste, who died in 1747.

1754.

43. The same.—Londres (Paris), J. Nourse et Vaillant, 1754, 12mo, 10 vols. A reprint of the edition of 1745. A pretty edition, of which there are some copies in Dutch paper, which, says Brunet, are very rare.

1769.

44. The same.—Londres (Paris), J. Nourse et Vaillant, 1769. 12mo. 10 vols. Bordered title-page. A pretty-looking edition, but incorrect as to text. It in all other respects resembles the preceding, except that the critical opinions are somewhat abridged.

1771.

45. The same.—Londres (Paris), J. Nourse et Vaillant, 1771, 12mo. 10 vols. Portrait, after that of 1725; bordered title-page; reprint of the preceding edition.

1779.

46. The same.—Genève, Jean-Samuel Cailler, 1779; 12mo. 10 vols. Bordered title-page; edition conformable to the preceding, and quite as incorrect; it contains, in addition, the Eloge of Montaigne by the Abbé Talbert, canon of Besançon, a composition which obtained the prize of eloquence given by the Academy of Bordeaux in 1774, and the addition of which renders this edition preferable to the preceding.

1780.

47. The same. Genève, Duvillard fils, et Nouffer

1780, 12mo. 10 vols. Edition taken from that of Coste, and conformable to the preceding.

1781.

48. The same. (Title the same as in the edition of Holland, 1659.) Amsterdam (Lyon), aux depens de la Compagnie, 1781. 8vo. 3 vols. Portrait; the "Que scais-je?" the scales, and the arms. Mademoiselle de Gournay's dedication and preface. Summary of Montaigne's life. Marginal lemmas and translations. Analytical table. The same mistake in the heading of Montaigne's preface, as in the edition of 1659. A good edition.

1783.

49. This edition is simply entitled: Essais de Michel de Montaigne. Paris, Jean-François Bastien, 1783; 3 vols. Portrait by Noel Pruneau. Of this edition 600 copies were printed in 8vo. (50 on Dutch paper), and 100 in 4to. (25 on Dutch paper). In the copies on fine paper, each volume is divided into 2 volumes, the second volume having a bastard title, but the pagination runs on, the same as in the copies in three volumes.

This edition, which is "dediée aux Manes respectables de Michel de Montaigne," contains merely the text of the Essays, purged, as the editor expresses it, from all notes and commentaries, and without any translation of the quotations. The only additions are a preface by the libraire-éditeur, a summary of the life of Montaigne, and an analytical table. There are marginal summaries and references to the authors quoted; in book i. chapter 28, are La Boëtie's sonnets. An excellent edition, justly esteemed for the correctness of its text, and its exact adherence to the old orthography.

50. The same. Avec les notes de M. Coste, suivis de son éloge. Nouvelle édition. A Genève et à Paris, chez Voland, M. DCC. LXXXIX—— M.DCC.XCIII. 12mo. 10 vols.

The four first volumes appeared in 1789, the 5th and 6th in 1790, the 7th in 1791, and the three last in 1793. The first volume is on fine paper; in the succeeding volumes the quality of the papers gradually deteriorates, and that of the two or three last is detestable.

This edition is exceedingly incorrect, especially in the latter volumes. It is a reprint of Coste's edition, with the addition of Talbert's Eloge; but it has no analytical table.

51. The same. Paris, J. F. Bastien, 1793. 8vo. 3 vols. Portrait. Reprint of Bastien's edition of 1783, but inferior to that edition in paper and print.

1796.

52. The same. Paris, Langlois et Gueffier, 1793. 8vo. 4 vols. Portrait, after that of Fiquet.

The copies on Dutch paper are very fine; while those on common paper are exceedingly bad.

This edition is printed from that of Bastien, which it resembles in typography, and contains precisely the same pieces.

There are some copies on blue paper.

53. The same. Edition nouvelle, où se trouvent les lettres et le discours de La Boëtie sur la Servitude Volontaire, ou le Contr'un; avec les notes de M. Coste. Paris, Louis, 1801. 18mo. 16 vols. Portrait after that of Fiquet. Epigraph, Novit se ipsum. No critical opinions.

This edition is reprinted literally from those of Coste. It is the only edition that has the epigraph, Novit se ipsum, though M. Vernier states that this epigraph was printed in the first edition of the Essays (1580), a mistake cited, without correction, in the Biographie Universelle.

54. The same. Edition stéréotypée d'après le procédé de Firmin Didot.

Paris, Pierre Didot l'aîné et Firmin Didot, MDCCCII. 8vo. and 12mo. 4 vols. Portrait. Some of the copies in octavo are on vellum.

An edition justly esteemed for the correctness of its text and punctuation, which underwent the exact superintendence of M. Didot l'aîné. It contains, besides the text and Montaigne's preface, a preface by M. Naigeon, the editor, directions to the printer, written by Montaigne in a copy of the edition of 1588, whence Naigeon edited the present edition, and a copy of which the reader has already seen under No. 4, Montaigne's Letters, and La Boëtie's Servitude Volontaire. La Boëtie's Sonnets are omitted, the editor being of opinion "qu'ils ne meritent pas d'être réimprimés, parcequ'ils ne meritent pas d'être lus." The translations of the passages quoted, and references to the authors, are printed at the bottom of each page, together with various readings, and notes by Naigeon and Coste. There are no marginal summaries, nor is there any analytical table.

This edition was reprinted in 1811, 1816, 1828, 1833.

In a few copies of this edition, besides the pieces mentioned, there is a preface by Naigeon, upon Montaigne's character and religion, dated 15th Germinal, An x. This preface is very rare on vellum copies; on common paper it is less unusual. A copy on vellum paper, with this preface, has sold as high as 600 francs. There are but three or four copies of it on vellum, known to be in existence.

"Ce fameux avertissement," says M. Payen, fruit d'une imagination ardente et d'un esprit faux et que M. Amaury-Duval n'hésite pas à qualifier de honteux écrit, avait été annoncé dès 1793 dans une des notes que Naigeon ajouta à l'article Pyrrhonisme de Diderot, inséré au tome III. de la philosophie ancienne et moderne de l'Encyclopédie. Il fut dès son apparition jugé si mauvais, et il était tellement inopportun à cette époque où paraissait le concordat, que l'auteur se trouva forcé de le supprimer. Il a été reproduit dans l'édition de Desoër, sauf quelques suppressions qui portent sur des déclamations philosophiques, ou sur des discussions relatives aux éditions principales des Essais.

"Bibliographiquement parlant, ce commentaire a donné lieu à une singulière succession d'erreurs; ainsi M. Brunet, et d'après lui MM. Peignot et Johanneau, annoncèrent d'abord qu'il avait 73 pages. M. Labouderie releva cette inexactitude et dit que cette avertissement n'avait que 63 pages; dans sa dernière édition, M. Brunet adopta cette correction, qui est pourtant inexacte elle-même. En effet, la dernière page de cette pièce est, il est vrai, numérotée lxiij^{e}; mais la première porte le n^{o} v, de sorte que réellement elle n'a que 59 pages. Ainsi, les pièces liminaires d'un exemplaire complet sont paginées comme il suit: Le faux titre j-ij, le titre iij-iv, l'avertissement de l'éditeur (celui qui se trouve dans tous les exemplaires), v-vij, l'avis à l'imprimeur viij-x, la préface de Montaigne xj-xij, puis vient l'avertissement supprimé dont la première page porte le n° v, et la dernière le n° lxiij.

" Dans les ex. qui contiennent ce dernier avertissement, on a ajouté les pages 177-82 doubles. En voici la raison : dans toutes les éditions des Essais, au chapitre de l'Institution des enfants, Montaigne suppose le cas d'un disciple, ' qui aime mieux ouir une fable qu'un sage propos, qui au son du tabourin qui arme la jeune ardeur de ses compaignons se destourne à une aultre qui l'appelle au jeu des basteleurs, etc. et il n'y trouve aultre remède sinon qu'on le mette pastissier dans quelque bonne ville, feust-il fils d'un duc, etc.' La copie de Bordeaux porte : ' Sinon que de bonne heure son gouverneur l'estrangle s'il est sans témoins, ou qu'on le mette pastissier, etc.' A cette occasion Naigeon avait primitivement ajouté une longue note dans laquelle on rencontre cette phrase : ' Ce conseil, il faut l'avouer, a quelque chose de sévère et même de dur, comme tous les actes de rigueur commandés dans les temps difficiles par la loi impérieuse des circonstances et la raison d'état ; mais on sent d'autant plus la sagesse et la nécessité de cette mesure qu'on a soi-même plus réfléchi, mieux observé, et qu'on est plus avancé dans la connaissance de l'homme physique et moral.' Et plus loin il dit ' qu'il pense que ce passage existait dans la copie qu'a suivie mademoiselle de Gournay ; mais qu'elle l'aura supprimé et que trop attentive aux opinions aux préjugés, à la voix de son siècle, oubliant la postérité, elle n'a pas osé insérer un conseil aussi ferme, mais très éloigné des idées reçues alors, et qui ne plaira pas davantage aujourd'hui à ces esprits vulgaires, si communs dans tous les temps.'

" Cette note dut partager le sort de l'avertissement, et Naigeon se décida à la remplacer par une autre de la même étendue, dans laquelle il défend son opinion dans des termes plus mesurés. On a laissé les deux leçons dans les exemplaires complets, et c'est comme cela que les pages 177 à 182 doivent être doubles.

" Je suis entré dans ses détails à cause de la rareté des exemplaires en question, et parce qu'il m'a paru curieux de connaître l'opinion au moins très naïve de Naigeon sur ce moyen énergique d'améliorer l'espèce humaine.

" Voir sur cet avertissement : les Annales littéraires et morales, in-8°, 5e cahier, an XI. Palissot, Mem. de litterature 1809, Gab. Peignot, Répertoire des Bibliographies Spéciales, 1810. Labouderie, Christianisme de Montaigne, Amaury-Duval, dans l'edition de Chasseriau, 1820.

" Cette édition de 1802 est la copie exacte de l'exemplaire de la Bibliothèque de Bordeaux, dont il a été parlé à 1588, et qui differe en beaucoup d'endroits du texte publié primitivement par mademoiselle de Gournay qu'on avait toujours suivi jusque-là. Naigeon fait honneur à François de Neufchâteau d'avoir découvert cet exemplaire que, suivant lui, la bibliothèque des Feuillants de Bordeaux possédait sans le savoir, et il rapporte cette circonstance à une époque antérieure de quelques années à la révolution. Je ne sais à qui appartient la priorité de la découverte ; mais il n'était pas possible qu'on ignorât complétement l'existence de cette copie des Essais, seulement on n'était pas fixé sur son plus ou moins d'importance, puisque d'après M. Bernadau, le nouveau dictionnaire historique l'annonçait comme un supplément manuscrit et que M. Bernadau lui-même, en faisant connaître par la voie des journaux ce précieux autographe, le considérait comme celui qui avait servi à mademoiselle de Gournay.

" A l'apparition de cette édition, une controverse fort animée s'éleva entre les hommes de lettres pour savoir quelle devait être la leçon préférée. Naigeon se fondant sur un avis à l'imprimeur, écrit de la main de Montaigne au verso du frontispice gravé de l'exemplaire en question, soutenait que c'était bien là celui qui devait servir de copie à la nouvelle édition que l'auteur projetait, et cette opinion est partagée sans restriction par M. Amaury-Duval. Le seul moyen de décider la question, est de comparer les textes, et d'opposer l'une à l'autre, comme l'ont fait MM. Droz, Leclerc et Johanneau, les phrases qui offrent des différences. Or, il résulte manifestement de cette comparison qu'à part un petit nombre d'exceptions, une diction plus animée, des expressions plus énergiques, des tours de phrase plus hardis se rencontrent dans l'exemplaire de 1595 ; et j'ajouterai que le choix de mademoiselle de Gournay doit être ici pris en considération. On sait qu'elle était allée en Guienne après la mort de Montaigne, et qu'elle s'était chargée de publier les Essais enrichis des traits de sa dernière main ; peut-être avait-elle reçu quelques instructions de la famille sur la copie qu'elle devait préférer ; mais dans tous les cas elle eut connaissance des deux exemplaires, puisqu'elle appelle en témoignage du soin qu'elle a apporté à l'édition de 1595, une autre copie qui reste en sa maison. La vénération qu'elle portait à la mémoire de Montaigne et l'admiration qu'elle professait pour les Essais, ne permettent pas de supposer qu'elle ait négligé de comparer les deux copies avant de choisir l'une d'elles ; et sa préférence, justifiée suivant moi, est une forte présomption en faveur de la version qu'elle a suivie.

" Quoi qu'il en soit, l'édition de Naigeon offre un grand intérêt pour les lecteurs de Montaigne, et c'est avec raison que M. J.-V. Leclerc dit à son sujet : ' L'exemplaire de Bordeaux n'est pas moins precieux pour la critique ; il nous transmet fidèlement, dans les parties manuscrits, l'orthographe de l'auteur, que mademoiselle de Gournay avait trop peu respectée, et quelques heureuses corrections, quelques courtes phrases que n'avaient pas été transportées sur l'autre exemplaire. Profitons de ces avantages, mais ne défigurons pas l'ouvrage de Montaigne, pour le plaisir de suivre mot à mot une copie qu'il avait lui-même évidemment abandonnée.'

" C'est ici le lieu de faire remarquer qu'à la manière dont l'indication de l'édition de 1588 est donné par Naigeon en tête de l'avis à l'imprimeur, on pourrait croire qu'elle était la sixième, tandis qu'elle est marquée cinquième, et que c'est Montaigne qui avait ajouté le premier de ces chiffres, eu égard à l'édition qu'il projetait.

— " Le catalogue de la bibliothèque de M. S. Bérard porte au numéro 160 un exemplaire de Montaigne, Paris, Lefevre, 1808, petit in-8°. 5 vol. Il y a probablement erreur, et c'est 1818 qui est la date véritable, car je ne connais pas l'édition des Essais publiée par M. Lefevre avant 1818.

55. The same. Paris, P. Didot, 4 vol. in-12. Reprint of the edition of 1802.

1816.

56. The same. Paris, Didot et Tournachon. 4 vol. in-12.

Reprint of the edition of 1802.

57. The same. Nouvelle édition imprimée par Crapelet. Paris, Lefevre, 1818, in-8°, 5 vol. Portrait engraved by Al. Tardieu, after Cocaskis.

A hundred copies were printed on large paper. This edition, superintended by M. Eloi Johanneau, contains, besides the Essays, a notice to the reader; a summary of the life of Montaigne; the dedication and preface of Mad. de Gournay; La Boëtie's sonnets; a notice of his journey into Italy, by M. Aimé St. Martin; an extract from Montaigne's translation of Sebond; La Boëtie's Servitude Volontaire; and a table of contents. There are marginal lemmas.

The heading of Montaigne's preface has the mistake pointed out under 1659.

A good and handsome edition, the most correct and complete that had at that time ever appeared, and which still remains one of the best.

The editor has added a great number of notes, and made a selection from those of Coste.

58.—The same. Paris, Lefevre, 1818, 18mo. 6 vols. In the title-page is a medallion portrait, signed C. Hulot.

A reprint of the edition in 8vo., omitting M. Johanneau's preface, and the extracts from the journey, and the translation of Sebond.

59. The same (edited by M. de l'Aulnaye, and printed by Fain). Paris, Th. Desoer, 1818. 8vo. One volume, in double columns. Portrait engraved by Leroux, after that of Fiquet.

This edition, of which only 500 copies were printed, contains, besides the Essays, a notice by the editor, the Eloge of Montaigne, by M. Jay; reflections on the character and religion of Montaigne, by Naigeon; De Gournay's preface; nine letters by Montaigne; the Servitude Volontaire; a glossary; and an analytical table. There are translations of the passages quoted, and references to the authors, and select notes from Coste and Naigeon.

This edition is the first, printed in one vol., since the middle of the 17th century, and in this respect is exceedingly convenient. It is very well printed.

60. The same. Paris, Desoer, 1818. 18mo. 4 vols. The same portrait as in the preceding edition, to which, in all respects, except form, this edition is conformable.

61. The same Paris et Liege, Desoer, no date. 36mo., 9 vols. This edition, which, except as to form, is exactly conformable to the two preceding, forms part of the Bibliothèque Portative du Voyageur.

62. The same. Publiés d'après l'edition la plus authentique par Amaury-Duval, Membre de l'Institut. Paris, Chasseriau, 1820-1823. 8vo. 6 vols. Portrait by Audouin.

This edition forms part of a proposed collection of the French moralists, of which series, however, only Montaigne and Charron were published.

Life of Montaigne. Critical opinions; notice of some of the principal editions of the Essays; ten letters of Montaigne; extract from Sebond's Theologie Naturelle; the Servitude Volontaire; extracts from the Journey; Avis de Catherine de Medicis and Charles IX. New table of contents, compiled by M. Lourmond. This edition is printed, with some few exceptions, from Naigeon's. At the head of each chapter there is a summary of the principal matters it treats of. Notes selected from Coste, Naigeon, Johanneau, with additional illustrations by the editor.

Respecting this edition, M. Payen observes:—

"Je ferai quelques observations au sujet de la X^e^ Lettre, qui pour la première fois se trouve jointe aux Essais, et dont le fac-simile existe à la fin de la Notice sur Montaigne, insérée dans la Galerie française (Paris, 1821-23, in-4°, 3 vol.). Je remarque d'abord qu'une note annonce que dans cette copie on a exactement suivi l'orthographe de l'original, qui se voit à la Bibliothèque du roi. Cette assertion est inexacte: l'erreur a tenu à ce que la lettre a été copiée, non sur l'original ni même sur le fac-simile, mais sur une copie qu'on trouve dans les notes de la Galerie française, et dans laquelle l'orthographe et les abréviations de la lettre de Montaigne n'ont point été conservées, afin d'en faciliter la lecture. Ainsi Montaigne a écrit justemant, seulemant, honorablemant, innoçammant, par un a à la dernière syllabe, et on a partout mis un e; il fait beaucoup d'abréviations, par exemple, dans les mots que je viens de citer, il écrit mat pour mant, il écrit logue pour longue, mosieur pour monsieur, et la copie n'en a suivi aucune; on verra plus loin que cette observation n'est pas sans importance. Quant à l'existence de l'original de cette lettre au dépôt des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque, j'aurais pu douter de sa réalité, car, malgré ma persévérance et les recherches faites avec une extrême complaisance par M. Paris, cette lettre n'a point été retrouvée, et les catalogues n'en font aucune mention; mais M. Gouget, qui s'est occupé avec tant de zèle et de succés de la recherche et de l'imitation des autographes, et qui est auteur des fac-simile de la Galerie française, m'a affirmé avoir vu, touché et calqué lui même la lettre originale qui fait partie d'un volume relié intitulé Lettres françaises de divers grands hommes. Elle lui fut indiquée par M. Méon et l'abbé Lépine, qui lui parurent l'avoir nouvellement examinée. Je suis donc convaincu de l'existence de cette pièce sans l'avoir vue, et l'examen du fac-simile ne me laisse aucun doute sur son authenticité, d'apres la connaissance de l'écriture de Montaigne, que m'a donnée l'étude de manuscrit du Bordeaux.*

* Une circonstance remarquable c'est que cette Lettre est signée MOTAIGNE (sic), et toutes les signatures que j'ai vues de l'auteur des Essais sont écrites ainsi; l'N de la première syllabe étant supprimeé et remplacée par un trait qui de l'O se porte au sommet du T. C'est ainsi qu'est signé le titre de l'Histoire de Pologne, par Herbart de Fulatin (Paris, 1573, in-4°), que possede M. Aime-Martin, et l'achevé de lire que Montaigne ajoutait quelquefois à ses livres (voyez le chap. x du liv. II), et qui se rencontre à celui-ci, presente encore ce nom (pour celui de son château), écrit de la même manière. On trouve cette même signature (sans N à la première syllabe) sur le titre du precieux exemplaire des C. Julii Cæsaris Commentariæ (Antuerpiæ, 1570, in-8°), avec nombreuses notes marginales et une page entière écrites de la main de Montaigne, que posséde M. Parison, de même que sur le Cento giochi liberali e d ingegno de innocentio Ringhieri (Bologna, 1551, in-4°), qu'on voit aussi dans la bibliothèque de ce savant. C'est encore cette même signature qu'on lit sur le Theod. Bezæ poemata Paris, H. Etienne, 1569, in-8°), qui fait partie de la riche collection de M. Re-

63. The same. Mis en français moderne, auxquels on a ajouté le Discours sur l'Esclavage (la Servitude volontaire), par Etienne de la Boëtie, publiés par M. Galland. Bruxelles, Voglet, 5 vol. in-8o. Portrait.

" Ce n'est pas le premier projet qui ait été formé de traduire Montaigne en français moderne ; mais c'est la première fois qu'il ait été suivi d'une exécution complète. Des 1733, un anonyme inséra dans le Mercure de France (juin pag. 1279-1307), le projet d'une nouvelle édition des ESSAIS DE MONTAIGNE, fait dans ce sens. Plus tard, le chevalier de Plassac-Méré sollicitait M. Mitton ' d'ôter au style des ESSAIS DE MONTAIGNE les défauts de son temps, qui suivant lui ne sont plus supportables dans celui-ci. Il dit qu'Aristote prit ce soin des Œuvres d'Homére, et que lui-même a essayé ce qu'il conseille, et que la traduction du chapitre De la Vanité des Paroles ne lui a pas coûté davantage qu'à le copier. Bastide, qui admettait la necessité de cette version, a employé une grande partie de sa vie à traduire les Essais, et à composer des Observations grammaticales et critiques sur Montaigne ou à son occasion. Ces travaux ont été le sujet de communications frequentes faites par lui à l'Academie de Berlin. On trouve une partie de ses Observations grammaticales dans les Mémoires de cette société. Plusieurs lectures du Montaigne moderne y sont mentionnées, mais on n'en rencontre pas même un échantillon ; le peu qu'on trouve des travaux de Bastide sur Montaigne dans les Mémoires de Berlin, rappelle souvent la trop longue plaisanterie du docteur Mathanasius, et n'est pas de nature à faire regretter beaucoup l'ensemble de ce travail, qui est parmi les manuscrits de la Bibliothèque du roi. M. Champollion, qui en a eu connaissance, m'a dit qu'il n'offrait aucun intérêt, et M. Labouderie en a parlé dans le même sens.

" La manière dont ont été exécutées jusqu'ici les diverses tentatives de versior des ESSAIS, ne donnera pas gain de cause à ceux qui soutiennent le principe de ces traductions dont la necessité est au moins douteuse, suivant moi. Bastide prétendait qu'il fallait mettre les ESSAIS à la portée de ceux qui ont le temps de les lire, mais à qui le loisir manque pour les étudier. Mais dans ce système il n'y a pas de raison de s'arrêter; on commencera, comme le veut M. de Plassac, par ôter seulement à Montaigne les défauts de son temps, en lui laissant ceux qui lui sont propres, et de proche en proche on arrivera à exécuter ce que voulait déjà l'anonyme de 1733, qui soutenait que les ESSAIS ne sont presque plus un livre français, et que ce vieux langage est bas et grossier. ' Aussi dit-il, en donnant le programme de sa traduction, qu'elle sera extrêmement libre ; qu'il retranchera ce qui lui paraît contraire aux mœurs, et ce qui lui paraîtra peu capable de plaire ; quelquefois il prendra le fonds de la pensée, et il lui donnera un tour différent de celui dont l'auteur s'est servi ; il abrégera les histoires, et il les racontera à sa manière ; au lieu de suivre l'auteur dans son désordre, il essalera de le corriger jusqu'à un certain point, de mettre un peu plus de suite dans ses idées, et de les arranger d'une manière, sinon plus naturelle, du moins plus raisonnable ; enfin, il poussera la liberté jusqu'à ajouter, lorsqu'il croira pouvoir le faire agréablement et utilement pour le lecteur.' On pourrait penser qu'il y a exagération, si ce qui précéde n'était une citation textuelle de l'auteur ; et en preuve il donne la traduction faite à sa manière, des chapitres 1, 2, et 4 du livre I, et dans ce dernier il remplace une phrase de Montaigne par six vers de Fontenelle ! ... Je le demande : où en seraient les ESSAIS DE MONTAIGNE après une telle mutilation ? La comparaison avec le vaisseau des Argonautes ne serait-elle pas au-dessous de la réalité ? L'autorité de M. de Plassac n'est pas plus grande en cette occasion que celle de l'anonyme ; et malgré le mérite réel que lui accordent ses contemporains on peut sans injustice, mettre en doute son bon goût en cette circonstance, si on se souvient que le chevalier " trouvait un esprit mal fait dans Caton, et un esprit étroit dans Scipion ; qu'il faisait nouard, et ce savant bibliographe m'a dit qu'il croyait se rappeler que la signature de Montaigne était ainsi figurée sur deux ouvrages italiens dont l'un n'est plus en sa possession, et dont l'autre, qu'il a cité dans le Catalogue de la bibliothèque d'un amateur, n'est pas en ce moment dans sa bibliothèque de Paris (il Catechismo di Bern. Ochino da Siena, in Basilea, 1561, in-8o). Enfin, M Guilbert de Pixérécourt possède une signature de Montaigne, qui presente encore cette abréviation.

D'après ces exemples, je crois être en droit de conclure que l'auteur des Essais signait toujours MOTAIGNE ; et cette opinion me parait d'autant plus probable, que nous avons vu que la suppression de l N lui était très familière, et que toutes les fois cette lettre était suivie d'un T, il la supprimait et la remplaçait par un trait ; peut-être agissait-il ainsi pour se distinguer des familles du même nom qui habitaient la Guyenne, et qu'on voit citées dans du Verdier et Dom de Vienne; du moins j'ai rencontré un certain nombre de signatures de ces personnages. la Bibliothèque royale en possède du president de Montaigne, tout recemment j'ai examiné chez MM. Debure une Bible qui porte cette signature, et qui n'est pas celle de Michel, et dans toutes la première syllabe est écrite sans abréviation.

" C'est ici le lieu de rappeler la lettre datée d'Orleans, 1598. qui parut a la vente que fit, en 1834, le libraire Caillot des livres de madame de Castellane (sous l'anonyme de M), et qui fut achetée 760 francs par M G. de P., et puis rendue comme apocryphe à son premier propriétaire. Cette pièce portait pour signature Motaigne, ce qui confirme encore l'idée que je viens d'émettre. quelle que soit d'ailleurs l'opinion qu'on ait adoptée sur son authenticité, qu'on aurait pu attaquer par des raisons plus puissantes que celles qu'on a tirées de l'emploi du mot passeport, qui s'y rencontre. et qu on a dit être inconnu du temps de Montaigne, puisque

M. Fontaine a cité une lettre du cardinal de Lorraine, antérieure à celle-ci de 20 ans, et dans laquelle cette expression est employée, et qu'elle l'est également dans l'ordonnance de Louis XI sur les postes (1464). Je dois ajouter, au sujet de cette lettre. que M. Parison, qui l'a examinée est d'avis que c'est une copie figurée (non calquée) d'une lettre authentique qui existe ou a du exister. Sub judice lis est. (Les personnes qui seraient curieuses de connaitre les détails des discussions qu'a soulevées cette dernière Lettre, pourront consulter des feuilletons du Journal de la Librairie (mai 1834, numéros 19 et 22), le Journal des Débats de cette époque ; le Manuel de l'Amateur d'Autographes, par M. Fontaine (Paris, 1836, in 8o), la brochure du même bibliographe. sur l'utilité des collections autographiques (Paris, 1834, in-8o).

" Je terminerai cette digression par une remarque qui n'est pas sans intérêt, après l'acheré de lire, de la main de Montaigne, à la fin de l'Histoire de Pologne précitée, lequel est daté de 1586. on voit placé entre parenthèses un chiffre 52, que M. Aimé-Martin a très ingenieusement expliqué en le rapportant à l'age qu'avait alors Montaigne. En effet, notre auteur, né le dernier février 1533. n'avait point encore complété sa cinquante-troisième année. bien qu'il en fut très près ; il a donc du se donner cinquante-deux ans. Cette explication, qui paraissait tres probable, est mise hors de toute contestation par l'examen que j'ai fait des Commentaires de César, cités précédemment, puisque l'acheré de lire daté de juillet 1578, est suivi du chiffre 45, qui indique précisément l'age de Montaigne a cette époque. Ainsi ce philosophe ne se contentait pas d'inscrire à la fin de quelques ouvrages le jugement qu'il en avait retiré en gros, comme il dit lui meme, il voulait encore se rappeler l age auquel il avait porté ce jugément."

peu de cas des auteurs anciens, et surtout de Virgile, dont il disait que l'Enéide était ennuyeuse à périr, qu'il trouvait des choses de mauvais air dans Démosthène et dans Cicéron, et qu'Homère le rebutait souvent, etc.'

"Sorel, dans la Bibliothèque française, dit, au sujet même de ces essais de traduction: 'Puisqu'on n'y saurait rien changer sans les rendre tout autre que ce qu'ils sont, il faut les laisser dans un état qui leur a déjà acquis tant de réputation;' et on peut appliquer à Montaigne ce que disait Racine dans la préface de Mithridate: 'Je rapporte les paroles de Plutarque telles qu'Amyot les a traduites, car elles ont une grâce, dans le vieux style de ce traducteur, que je ne crois point pouvoir égaler dans notre langue moderne.'

"On peut croire que Montaigne n'aurait pas approuvé l'excès de zèle de ses traducteurs, lui qui ordonne aux imprimeurs de suivre toujours l'ancienne orthographe (chap. 10 du livre iii).

"Je crois ne pouvoir mieux terminer cette digression qu'en citant un passage dans lequel Naigeon me paraît avoir traité cette question avec infiniment de justesse et de goût, en reproduisant exactement des idées énoncées par Sorel: 'je ne vois qu'un seul moyen de rendre ce livre intelligible pour la plupart des lecteurs; c'est de joindre partout un commentaire presque aussi long que le texte, ou plutôt de le traduire dans la langue élégante, harmonieuse, et claire, que Voltaire, Buffon, Diderot, d'Alembert et Rousseau ont parlée et écrite. On réussira sans doute à faire des Essais un livre agréable, peut-être même d'une utilité plus générale; mais je ne crains pas d'assurer que cette espèce de traduction, en la supposant même très exacte, ce qui ne serait pas sans quelques difficultés, ferait très souvent perdre au style de Montaigne une grande partie de sa précision, de son énergie, de sa hardiesse, de ce naturel aisé qui en fait un des principaux charmes, et donnerait à son livre, qu'on ne refera pas plus que celui de Rabelais, un caractère très divers, moins original et beaucoup moins piquant. Le projet de récrire dans notre langue les Essais de Montaigne peut passer comme tant d'autres idées par la tête d'un ignorant ou d'un sot, mais il n'entrera jamais dans celle d'un lecteur judicieux, instruit et d'un goût délicat et sûr.'

"On devra consulter, comme exemple de ce qu'on pourrait se permettre à l'égard du langage des Essais, les citations qu'en fait M. Labouderie dans l'ouvrage qu'il a publié sur le Christianisme de Montaigne. Ce savant, à l'aide de quelques changements presque insensibles, et souvent par la seule addition d'un mot entre parenthèse, a rendu parfaitement intelligible les passages des Essais qu'il a cités. C'est ici le lieu de rappeler que, relativement à l'orthographe de Montaigne, M. Labouderie est d'avis que les variations qu'elle présente dans le même mot employés plusieurs fois et dans les diverses éditions autorisent à ne pas la conserver, et il dit que les raisons alléguées contre cette opinion par les derniers éditeurs n'ont pas changé sa conviction. C'est le système suivi aussi par M. Buchon dans ses éditions de Froissart."

64. The same,—avec les notes de tous les commentateurs. Paris, Lefevre (printed by Crapelet), 1823, in 8°, 5 vol.; portrait after that of 1818.

A reprint of the edition of 1818, to which it is conformable in all respects, except that the title page mentions no particular editor; and that M Johanneau's preface is omitted.

It is to be remarked that although this and the following editions are described by their publishers as embodying les notes de tous les commentateurs, they do not, in point of fact, contain more than a selection of the notes of all the commentators, and hardly any two editors agree in their selection of these notes.

65. The same,—avec les notes de tous les commentateurs, et précédés de l'Eloge de Montaigne, par M. Villemain; Paris, Froment, 1825. 18mo. 8 vols. Portrait after that of Fiquet.

Short notice (not signed) by the editor. Notes from Coste, Naigeon, Duval, Johanneau, and Lefevre.—Eloge by Villemain.—Summary of the life of Montaigne.—De Gournay's preface.—Nine letters.—The Servitude Volontaire.—Analytical table of contents. Edition conformable to the preceding.

66. The same,—avec les notes de tous les commentateurs; édition publiée par J.-V. Leclerc.—Paris, Lefevre (printed by Jules Didot l'aîné), 1826. 8vo. 5 vols. Portrait by Dupont.

A good and handsome edition, forming part of the Classiques Français, published by the same bookseller. In addition to the notes of preceding editors, M. Leclerc has added some of his own, and others taken from the commentary of M. l'Avocat-Général Servan upon the two first books of the Essays. Notice of the edition. Remarks upon the life and works of Montaigne. Notes and illustrations. Epochs of the life of Montaigne. His family. His journey. Remarks upon the admirers and detractors of Montaigne. Ten letters. Extract from Sebond's Natural Theology. The Servitude Volontaire. Analytical table of contents. La Boëtie's sonnets.

67. The same. Paris, Rapilly, 1827, 8vo.

The edition of Chasseriau, 1820, with new titles.

68. The same,—avec les notes de Coste, Naigeon, Amaury-Duval, Eloi Johanneau, et autres commentateurs. Paris, Menard et Desenne, 1827. 12mo and 18mo. 10 vols. Portrait. This edition forms part of the Bibliothèque Française, published by the same booksellers.

Summary of Montaigne's life; dedication to Richelieu; Gournay's long preface; summaries to chapters; nine letters; the Servitude Volontaire no table of contents.

69. The same. Paris, H. Bossange, 1828. 8vo. 4 vols. A reprint of the edition of 1802.

70. The same. Edition selon l'orthographe de l'auteur, avec les sommaires analytiques, et les notes de tous les commentateurs; précédés de la préface de Mademoiselle de Gournay et d'un précis de la vie de Montaigne. Paris, Tardieu Denesle, 1828. 8vo. 6 vols.

De Gournay's dedication to Richelieu, and La Boëtie's sonnets, are printed in this edition. The notes are selected from different commentators. There is an analytical table.

1830.

71. The same—(édition compacte), collationnée sur les meilleurs textes. Paris, Furne, L. Debure, 1830, royal 8vo, double columns. Some copies of this edition are dated 1831.

Villemain's Eloge. Nine letters; the Servitude Volontaire; analytical table.—The notes are different from those in Desoër's edition, though Querard says it is a reprint of that edition.

72. The same. Paris, Le Bigre et Firmin Didot, 8vo. 4 vols. Portrait.

A reprint of the edition of 1802.

73. The same, avec les notes de tous les commentateurs. Paris, Lefevre, 1834. 1 vol. Royal 8vo. Double columns. Portrait after that of Leclerc's edition.

Edition printed from that of Leclerc in 1826, omitting the preliminary pieces.

1836.

74. The same,—avec les notes de tous les commentateurs. Paris, Lefevre, 1836. 8vo. 2 vols. Portrait after that of 1826.

The text of the Essays with notes. The letters, the Servitude Volontaire, and analytical table.

72. The same—(forming part of the Panthéon Littéraire). Dedication; notice of the life of Montaigne, by M. Buchan. Bibliographical notice by Doctor Payen. De Gournay's preface. The Essays. Notes selected from all the commentators. Montaigne's journey. Ten letters. Avis de Catherine de Medicis à Charles IX. The Servitude Volontaire. List of authors quoted. Index.

EXTRACTS FROM THE ESSAYS OF MONTAIGNE.

1. At the head of these must be placed the edition of the Essays published at Geneva by Goulart. In the Scaligerana Secunda, at the article Goulart, we read: "Il a fait châtrer les œuvres de Montaigne: Quæ audacia in scripta aliena." At the article Montaigne, Scaliger says, in reference to Goulart: "Ceux de Genève ont été bien impudents d'en ôter plus d'un tiers."

2. Réponse à plusieurs injures et railleries écrites contre Michel, seigneur de Montaigne, dans un livre intitulé la Logique, ou l'Art de penser, avec un beau traité de l'éducation des enfants et cinq cents excellents passages, tirés du livre des Essais, pour montrer le mérite de cet auteur (by Guillaume Béranger, but published anonymously), Rouen, Laurens Maurry, 1667, 12mo.

3. The same. With the author's name. Paris, J. Thoury, P. Débats et Augustin Besongue, 1668, in-12.

"Cet ouvrage," says M. Payen, "n'est à proprement parler qu'un extrait des Essais. L'auteur, voulant défendre Montaigne contre les écrivains de Port-Royal, crut ne pouvoir mieux le faire qu'en leur opposant Montaigne même; il rectifie les citations inexactes faites dans la logique, en citant le texte des Essais, il rapporte quelques jugemens favorables; il donne une partie du chapitre de l'institution des enfants et termine par 502 pensées extraites des Essais.

This volume is now extremely rare; it is not in the King's Library at Paris, but it is in the British Museum, in the Library Sainte-Geneviève at Paris, and in the Public Library at Bordeaux.

4. L'Esprit des Essais de Michel, seigneur de Montaigne. Paris, Charles de Sercy, 1677, 12mo. Engraved frontispiece, with portrait, and the Que Sçais-je? Printed title-page.

"This volume is extracted not from the Essays, but from the work of Pesselier, which the present editor has, however, abridged: "Nous avons gardé," says he, "dans ce recueil ce qui a dû être inspiré seulement par le christianisme; le grec du portique a disparu. Ce livre contient, non pas Montaigne échappé des écoles d'Athènes, mais Montaigne française et chrétien."

TRAVELS OF MONTAIGNE.

1. Journal du Voyage de MICHEL MONTAIGNE en Italie par la Suisse et l'Allemagne, en 1580 et 1581, avec des notes par M. de Querlon. A Rome et Paris, Lejay, 1774, 4to. A fine portrait, engraved by Saint-Aubin. A magnificent volume, dedicated to Buffon. The notes are drawn up by Querlon, from materials supplied by M. Jamet.

2 and 3. The same.—The same titles, the same date. 2 vols. 12mo., or 3 vols. small 12mo. No portrait.

PORTRAITS OF MONTAIGNE.

There are several PORTRAITS, reputed ORIGINALS, of Montaigne.

1. Fiquet has left us one, after a very remarkable portrait, painted in 1578, by Dumoustier.

2. The Montaigne engraved by Chéreau, in 1725, is after a portrait which at that time belonged to M. Berroyer, Counsellor to the Parliament.

3. That published by Delpech is copied from a portrait which was for a long time in the Depôt des Archives, and has only been recently removed thence.

1. The most ancient of the ENGRAVED PORTRAITS that I am acquainted with is that which appeared in the editions of 1611 and 1617, signed Thomas de Leu: it has some resemblance to that of Dumoustier.

2. Father Lelong (in the Bibliothèque Historique) mentions, about this epoch, a portrait of Montaigne by Jaspard Isaac.

3. The same, by Desrochers. 4to.

4. The edition of 1635 has a portrait, with no signature, which also appeared in the editions of 1652 and 1657. The armorial bearings by which it is accompanied are incorrect. In some copies the arms are omitted.

5. The edition of 1640 has a portrait, but without any signature.

6. There is a portrait, signed N. de Larmessin, in the edition of Paris, 1659.

7. The same, also in the edition of Holland, 1659, with the signature P. Clouwet.

8. Also in the edition of Paris, 1669, with the signature Matheus.

9. There is a portrait of Montaigne, in the small size, in the work by Freher, published in 1688.

10, 11, 12. In the edition of the Essays, 1641, in that of "L'Esprit de Montaigne," 1677, and in the "Pensées," 1701, there is respectively a portrait of very small size. That of 1641 is signed F. Honervogt.

13. The same, designed by Genest, engraved by Chéreau, 4to. 1723 (after that of 1635), in the edition of London, 1724. The arms here also are incorrect.

14. The same, engraved by Chéreau, 4to. 1725 (after the portrait announced as original, communicated by M. Berroyer). The arms are correct. In the edition of Paris, 1725.

15, 16, 17. There are three reductions of this portrait: one, in 8vo., in the edition of Amsterdam, 1781; another, in 12mo., in the edition of London, 1771; the third, in 18mo., in the edition of the "Pensées," London, 1783.

18. The same, designed by Jorat, and engraved by François, in the manner of red chalk, in 4to., in the work of Saverien. (See the list of authors.)

19. The same, J. Blanchon, inv. sculps. A reduction, in 8vo., of the preceding; black, with the initials of François.

20. The same, in the line manner, in the work of Lavater, vol. 3, La Haye, 1796, folio.

21. The same, engraved by Fiquet, in 8vo., after a portrait by Dumoustier, in 1578. This portrait is one of the finest of all that have been published.

22. The same, after the same: no signature. In the edition of 1796.

23. The same, engraved by A. de Saint-Aubin, and finished by Romanet, 4to. A fine engraving, in the edition in 4to. of the Journey.

24. The same, engraved by Voyer, jun., 4to. (after the preceding.)

25. The same, signed F. N. et Martinet, 8vo. (after the preceding.)

26. The same, designed and engraved by Noel Primeau (after the preceding), 8vo., in the editions published by Bastien.

27. The same, engraved by Lebeau, 4to. (Esnauts et Rapilly.)

28. The same, Marillier del., Ponce sculp. In the work entitled Illustres Français.

29. The same, designed and engraved by F. Bonneville, 8vo. (after that by Saint-Aubin.)

30. The same, engraved by P. M. Alix, after Dumoustier, and coloured by Bechet, folio, oval form, published by Drouhin.

31. The same, designed by Cocaskis, engraved by Alex. Tardieu, 8vo., in the edition by Lefevre, 1818.

32. The same, engraved by Leroux, after Dumoustier, 8vo., in the edition by Desoer.

33. The same, engraved by P. Audoin, 8vo., in the edition by Chasserian.

34. The same, in the line manner, by Meysens (Landon dir.), 8vo. (Biogr. Univ. et galerie hist. de Landon.)

35. The same, designed and engraved by Dupont, in an edition by Lefevre, 8vo.

36. The same, exactly resembling the preceding as to the portrait, engraved by Pollet, in another edition of Lefevre, 8vo.

37. The same, designed by Deveria, engraved by Fauchery, 8vo.

38. The same, engraved on steel by Lefevre, 4to., published by Blaisot.

39. The same, Aug. Saint-Aubin, a profile in medallion, 8vo., in the edition by Naigeon.

40. The same, C. Hulot, a profile in medallion, in the edition in 18mo., by Lefevre.

41. The same, at the head of a Notice sur Montaigne, in the "Iconographie instructive."

42. The same, engraved by Read, from the original picture in the Depot des Archives du Royaume, at Paris, published by Templeman.

There are several other portraits, in different sizes, without signatures.

The full-length portraits of Montaigne are:—

43. In the engraving by M. Forster, from the picture by Gros, representing Charles the Fifth visiting the tomb of St. Denis, folio.

44. In the engraving by Baquoy, after Ducis, of Montaigne visiting Tasso, folio.

45. The same, Leroux sculp., Devéria del., 8vo. 1822.

46. The same, engraved by Leroy, after Dupont, large 8vo., 1835, in the Plutarque Français.

47. A lithographed portrait, Bouillon del., after the bust in the Musée des Monumens français, 4to. in the Galerie Française.

48. The same, 4to., Gautheret et Weber.

49. The same, folio, P. Indré.

50. The same, folio, Maurin (after that of the Musée des Monumens Français), published by Delpech.

51. The same, reduced from the preceding.

64. Talbert. Eloge de Michel Montaigne qui a remporté le prix d'éloquence à l'Académie de Bordeaux en 1774. (Printed in the editions of the Essays of 1779, 1780, 1789.) This Eloge is followed by some interesting notes.

65. Deslandes. Réflexions sur les grands hommes qui sont morts en plaisantant; Amsterdam, 1732, 12mo. (He cites Montaigne at pages 3, 23, 118, et sequent.) "L'idée de cet ouvrage," says M. Payen, "qui est d'une grand pauvreté d'exécution, a certainement été fournie à l'auteur par cette phrase de Montaigne qu'il cite dans sa préface: Si j'estois faiseur de livres je ferois un registre commenté des morts diverses. Qui apprendroit les hommes à mourir, leur apprendroit à vivre. Le registre existait, mais non commenté, du vivant même de Montaigne, car Jean Tixier de Ravisi, plus connu sous le nom de Ravisius Textor, et qui était mort dès 1524, a donné dans son Officina vel potius naturæ historia une longue liste d'un grand nombre de noms d'hommes classés en trente-six chapitres dont chacun comprend une cause particulière de mort; ainsi: De iis qui podagra mortui; de iis qui aquis submersi interierunt; de iis qui in latrinis perierunt; de gaudio et risu mortuis; de iis qui in actu venereo mortui; de iis qui siti ac fame perierunt, etc. Voy. à l'ouvrage cité, édition de Bâle, 1552, in-4, de la page 509 à 596. —Plusieurs autres ouvrages ont été composés dans le même sens. Valere Maxime a consacré le chap. xii. du livre ix. à quelques exemples de morts remarquables (de mortibus non vulgaribus); on a publié à Paris, en 1772, chez Moutard, un ouvrage en 2 vol. in-12, intitulé: Derniers sentiments des plus illustres personnages condamnés à mort, lequel est attribué par M. Barbier aux abbés Sabatier et de Vesteuil, et que Sabatier, dans ses articles inédits, attribue à l'abbé Prévost. Il a paru en 1813, à Paris, chez A. Emery, un ouvrage in-8°., sans nom d'auteur (Léon Thiessé), sous ce titre: Les derniers moments des plus grands hommes français condamnés à mort pour délits politiques.—Le professeur Desgenettes a fait paraître en 1833, un ouvrage intitulé: Etudes sur le genre de mort des hommes illustres de Plutarque et des empereurs romains.—On peut rapprocher les ouvrages suivants de ceux qui précèdent, car la mort est au nombre des accidents dont on y trouve le récit: ainsi Boccace a écrit un livre, De casibus virorum, ac fœminarum illustrium, qui a été plusieurs fois traduit en français sous les titres de: La Ruyne des nobles hommes et femmes, Lyon, 1483; le livre des cas des nobles hommes et femmes malheureux, Paris, 1483; des Nobles malheureux, Paris, 1494; Traités des mésaventures des personages signalés, Paris, 1578, etc. La liste commence à Adam et Eve et s'arrête à Jean de France. On attribue à Georges Chatelain l'ouvrage intitulé: le Temple Jehan Boccace de la Ruyne d'aulcuns nobles malheureux fait par Georges son imitateur, Paris, Galiot Dupré, 1517, in-fol., gothique; voy. l'extrait qu'en donne M. Buchon dans la notice qu'il a placée à la tête de son édition de Georges Chatelain du Panthéon Littéraire.—P. Boitel de Gaubertin est auteur d'un ouvrage qui a pour titre: Les Tragiques accidents des hommes illustres depuis le premier siècle jusqu'a présent, 1619 in-12; la liste commence par Abel et finit au chevalier de Guise, etc."

"On trouve," says M. Payen, "dans la Gironde, Revue de Bordeaux, février 1834, 9e livraison, un article intitulé Installation de Michel Montaigne, maire de Bordeaux, et l'editeur fait précéder ce récit d'une note signée G. ainsi conçue: "Il y a quelques années que des maçons en travaillant à une maison autrefois habitée par Michel de Montaigne, au coin de l'impasse des Minimettes, à Bordeaux, découvrirent sous une poutre un manuscrit renfermé dans une cassette de bois de cyprès. C'était vraisemblablement le journal inédit d'un ancien serviteur de l'auteur des Essais, lequel avait sans doute habité avec lui cette maison, dont la façade gothique a été détruite dernièrement, etc." M. Aimé Martin, à l'obligeance duquel je dois d'avoir eu connaissance de cette pièce, est convaincu que c'est un pastiche, et je crois qu'il ne peut y avoir aucun doute à cet égard. L'auteur a pris textuellement dans les Essais, les discours et les réflexions qu'il prête à Montaigne dans le cours de cette solennité, et cette circonstance seule suffirait pour démontrer la supercherie.

THE AUTHOR TO THE READER.

THIS, reader, is a book without guile. It tells thee, at the very outset, that I had no other end in putting it together but what was domestic and private. I had no regard therein either to thy service or my glory; my powers are equal to no such design. It was intended for the particular use of my relations and friends, in order that, when they have lost me, which they must soon do, they may here find some traces of my quality and humour, and may thereby nourish a more entire and lively recollection of me. Had I proposed to court the favour of the world, I had set myself out in borrowed beauties; but 'twas my wish to be seen in my simple, natural, and ordinary garb, without study or artifice, for 'twas myself I had to paint. My defects will appear to the life, in all their native form, as far as consists with respect to the public. Had I been born among those nations who, 'tis said, still live in the pleasant liberty of the law of nature, I assure thee I should readily have depicted myself at full length and quite naked. Thus, reader, thou perceivest I am myself the subject of my book; 'tis not worth thy while to take up thy time longer with such a frivolous matter; so fare thee well.

From Montaigne; this 12th of June, 1580.

THE FIRST BOOK.

CHAPTER I.

THAT MEN BY VARIOUS WAYS ARRIVE AT THE SAME END.

THE most usual way of appeasing the indignation of such as we have any way offended, when we see them in possession of the power of revenge, and find that we absolutely lie at their mercy, is, by submission, (than which, nothing more flatters the glory of an adversary,) to move them to commiseration and pity: and yet bravery, firmness, and resolution, however quite contrary means, have sometimes served to produce the same effect. Edward, Prince of Wales,[1] the same who so long governed our province of Guienne, a person whose condition and fortunes have in them a great deal of the most notable parts of grandeur, having, through some misdemeanours of theirs, been highly incensed by the Limosins, in the heat of that resentment, taking their city by assault, was not, either by the outcries of the people, or the prayers and tears of the women and children, abandoned to slaughter, and prostrate at his feet for mercy, to be stayed from prosecuting his revenge; till, penetrating farther into the body of the town, he took notice of three French gentlemen, who, with incredible bravery, alone sustained the whole power of his victorious army.[2] Then it was that consideration and respect for such remarkable valour first stopped the torrent of his fury; and his clemency, beginning in the preservation of these three cavaliers, was afterwards extended to all the remaining inhabitants of the city.

Different modes of mollifying the hearts of the offended.

Scanderberg, Prince of Epirus, in great wrath, pursuing one of his soldiers with a resolute purpose to kill him, and the soldier having in vain tried, by all the ways of humility and supplication, to appease him, seeing him, notwithstanding, obstinately bent to his ruin, resolved, as his last resource, to face about and await him, sword in hand; which behaviour of his gave a sudden check to his captain's fury, who, seeing him assume so noble a resolution, received him to favour. An example, however, that might suffer another interpretation with such as have not read of the prodigious strength and valour of that Prince.

[1] The Black Prince, son of Edward the Third.

[2] Froissart, vol. i., book iv., part ii., ch. cccxx. The names of the three gentlemen were John de Villemur, Hugh de la Roche, and Roger de Beaufort.

The Emperor Conrad III. having besieged Guelph, Duke of Bavaria,[1] would not be prevailed upon, what mean and unmanly satisfactions soever were tendered to him, to condescend to milder conditions than that the gentlewomen only, who were in the town, might go out without violation of their honour, on foot, and with so much only as they could carry about them. Which was no sooner known but that, with magnanimity of heart, they presently resolved to carry out, upon their shoulders, their husbands and children, and the Duke himself: a sight at which the Emperor was so pleased that, ravished with the generosity of the action, he wept for joy, and immediately extinguishing in his heart the mortal and implacable hatred he had conceived against this Duke, he from that time forward treated him and his with all humanity and affection.

Conjugal love.

The one, or the other, of these two ways would, with great facility, work upon my nature; for I have a marvellous propensity to mercy and mildness; nay, to such a degree, that I fancy, of the two, I should sooner surrender my anger to compassion than to esteem: and yet pity is reputed a vice amongst the Stoics, who will that we succour the afflicted, but not that we should be so affected with their sufferings as to suffer or sympathize with them. Now, I conceived these examples suited to the question in hand, and the rather because therein we observe these great souls assaulted and tried by these two several ways to resist the one without relenting, and to be shaken and subjected by the other. It is true that to suffer a man's heart to be totally subdued by compassion may be imputed to facility, effeminacy, and over-tenderness; whence it comes to pass that the weakest natures, as those of women, children, and the common sort of people, are the most subject to it: but after having resisted, and disdained the power of sighs and tears, to surrender a man's animosity to the sole reverence of the sacred image of virtue—this can be no other than the effect of a strong and inflexible soul, enamoured of, and doing honour to, a masculine and obstinate valour. Nevertheless, astonishment and admiration may, in less generous minds, beget a like effect. Witness the people of Thebes, who, having put two of their generals upon trial for their lives, for having continued in arms beyond the prescribed term of their commission, would hardly pardon Pelopidas, who, bowing under the weight of so dangerous an accusation, made no manner of defence for himself, nor produced other arguments than prayers and supplications to secure his head; whereas, on the contrary, Epaminondas being brought to the bar, and falling to magnify the exploits he had performed in their service, and, after a haughty and arrogant manner, reproaching them with ingratitude and injustice, they had not the heart to proceed any further in his trial, but broke up the court, and departed, the whole assembly highly commending the courage and confidence of this great man.[2]

Pity reputed a vice amongst the Stoicks.

Dionysius the Elder, after having, by a tedious siege, and through exceeding great difficulties, taken the city of Rhegium, and in it the governor Phyton, a great and good man, who had made so obstinate a defence, he was resolved to make him a tragical example of his revenge; in order whereunto, and the more sensibly to afflict him, he first told him that he had the day before caused his son and all his kindred to be drowned: to which Phyton returned no other answer but this, that they were then, by one day, happier than he. After which, causing him to be stripped, and delivering him into the hands of the tormentors, he was, by them, dragged through the streets of the town, and most ignominiously and cruelly whipped, and, moreover, vilified with bitter and contumelious language. Yet still, in the fury of all this persecution, he maintained his courage entire all the way, with a strong voice and undaunted countenance, proclaiming the honourable and glorious cause of his death; namely, for that he would not deliver up his country into the hands of a merciless tyrant; at the same time denouncing against him a speedy chastisement from the offended gods. At which the tyrant, rolling his eyes about, and reading in his soldiers' looks that, instead of being incensed at the haughty language of this conquered enemy, to the contempt of him, their captain, and his triumph, they not only seemed struck with admiration of so rare a virtue, but, moreover, inclined to mutiny, and were even ready to rescue the prisoner out of the hangman's hands, he ordered the execution to cease, and, afterwards, privately caused him to be thrown into the sea.[3]

The cruelty of Dionysius the Elder.

Man, in sooth, is a marvellous, vain, fickle, and unstable subject, and on whom it is very hard to form any certain or uniform judgment. For Pompey could pardon the whole city of the Mamertines, though furiously incensed against it, upon the single account of the virtue and magnanimity of one citizen, Zeno, who took the fault of the public wholly upon himself; neither intreated other favour but alone to undergo the punishment for all.[4] And yet Sylla's host having, in the city of Perusia, manifested the same virtue, obtained nothing by it, either for himself or his fellow-citizens.'[1] And, directly contrary to my first examples, the bravest of all men, and who was reputed so gracious and kind to all those he overcame, Alexander the Great, having, after many great difficulties, forced the city of Gaza, and, on entering, found Betis, who commanded there, and of whose valour, in the time of this siege, he had most noble and manifest proofs, alone, forsaken by all his soldiers, his armour hacked and hewed to pieces, and his body covered all over with blood and wounds, and yet still fighting in the crowd of a great number of Macedonians, who were laying on him on all sides, he said to him (nettled at so dear-bought a victory, and at two fresh wounds he had newly received in his own person), "Thou shalt not die, Betis, so honourably as thou dost intend, but shalt assuredly suffer all the torments that can be inflicted on a miserable captive." To which menaces the other returning no other answer but only a fierce and disdainful look; "What," says the conqueror (observing his obstinate silence), "Is he too stiff to bend a knee? Is he too proud to utter one supliant word? I will assuredly conquer this silence; and, if I cannot force a word from his mouth, I will, at least, extract a groan from his heart." And, thereupon, converting his anger into fury, presently commanded his heels to be bored through, and caused him to be dragged, alive, mangled, and dismembered, at a cart's tail.[2] Was it that the height of courage was so natural and familiar to this conqueror that, no longer holding it in admiration, he had come not even to respect it? Or was it that he conceived valour to be a virtue so peculiar to himself that his pride could not, without envy, endure it in another? Or was it that the natural impetuosity of his fury brooked not opposition? Certainly had it been capable of any manner of moderation, it is to be believed, that in the sack and desolation of Thebes, to see so many valiant men, lost and totally destitute of any farther defence, cruelly massacred before his eyes, would have appeased it. For there were above six thousand put to the sword, of whom not one was seen to fly, or heard to cry out for quarter; but, on the contrary, every one running here and there to seek out and to provoke the victorious enemy to help them to an honourable end. There was not one who did not, to his last gasp, endeavour to revenge himself; and, with all the fury of a brave despair, to sweeten his own death in the death of an enemy. Yet did their valour create no pity, and the length of one day was not enough to satiate the conqueror's revenge; but the slaughter continued to the last drop of blood that was capable of being shed, and stopped not till it met with none but naked and impotent persons, old men, women, and children, of whom thirty thousand were carried away slaves.[3]

Obstinate silence of Betis.

CHAPTER II.

OF SORROW.[4]

No man living is more free from this passion than I, who neither like it in myself, nor admire it in others; and yet, generally, the world is pleased to honour it with a particular esteem; endeavouring to make us believe that wisdom, virtue, and conscience shroud themselves under this grave and affected appearance. Foolish and sordid guise! The Italians, however, more fitly apply the term[5] to indicate a clandestine nature, a dangerous and bad nature. And with good reason, it being a quality always hurtful, always idle and vain, and so cowardly, mean, and base that 'tis by the Stoics expressly and particularly forbidden their sages.

A contemptible passion.

But the story, nevertheless, says, that Psammenitus, King of Egypt, being defeated and taken prisoner by Cambyses, King of Persia, seeing his own daughter pass by him habited as a menial, with a bucket to draw water, though his friends about him were so concerned as to break out into tears and lamentations at the miserable sight, yet he himself remained unmoved, without uttering a word, with his eyes fixed upon the ground. And seeing, moreover, his son, immediately after, led to execution, still maintained the same gravity and indifference of countenance; till spying, at last, one of his domestics[6] dragged away amongst the captives, he could then hold no longer, but fell to tearing his hair and beating his breast, with all the other extravagances of a wild and desperate sorrow.[7] A story that may very fitly be coupled with another of the same kind, of a late prince of our own nation, who, being at Trent, and having news there brought him of the death of his elder brother, a brother on whom depended the whole support and honour of his house; and, soon after, of that of a younger brother, the second hope of his family; and, having withstood these two assaults with an exemplary resolution, one of his servants happening, a few days after, to die, he suffered his constancy to be overcome by this last accident; and, parting with his courage, so abandoned himself to sorrow and mourning, that some, thence, were forward to conclude that he was only touched to the quick by this last stroke of fortune; but, in truth, it was that, being before brim-full of grief, the least addition overflowed the bounds of all patience. Which might also be said of the former example, did not the story proceed to tell us that Cambyses asking Psammenitus why, not being moved at the calamity of his son and daughter, he should with so great impatience bear the misfortune of his friend? "It is," answered he, "because this last affliction was only to be manifested by tears, the two first exceeding all manner of expression."

Extreme sorrow is unutterable.

And, peradventure, something like this might be working in the fancy of the painter of old, who, having, in the sacrifice of Iphigenia, to represent the sorrow of the bystanders, proportionably to the several degrees of interest each had in the death of this fair innocent virgin; and having, in the other figures, exhausted the utmost power of his art, when he came to that of her father, he drew him with a veil over his face, meaning thereby that no kind of countenance was capable of expressing such a degree of sorrow. Which is also the reason why the poets feign the miserable mother, Niobe, having first lost seven sons, and then successively as many daughters, overwhelmed with misery, to be at last transformed into a rock, thereby to express that melancholy, dumb, and deaf stupidity, which benumbs all our faculties when oppressed with misfortunes greater than we are able to bear; and, indeed, the violence and impression of an excessive grief must, of necessity, astonish the soul, and wholly deprive her of her ordinary functions: as it happens to every one of us who, upon any sudden alarm of very ill news, find ourselves surprised, stupified, and in a manner deprived of all power of motion, till the soul, beginning to vent itself in sighs and tears, seems a little to free and disengage itself from the oppression, and to obtain some room to work itself out at greater liberty.

Diriguisse malis,[1]

"Hardened with woes—a statue of despair."

Et via vix tandem voci laxata dolore est.[2]

"Till sorrow breaks
A passage, and at once he weeps and speaks."

In the war that King Ferdinand made upon the widow of King John of Hungary, in a battle near Buda, a man at arms was particularly taken notice of by every one, for his singularly gallant behaviour in an encounter; and, though unknown, was highly commended and lamented when left dead upon the spot; but by none so much as by Raisciac, a German lord, who was infinitely enamoured of so rare a valour. The body being brought off, the Count, with the common curiosity, came to view it; and the armour was no sooner taken off, but he immediately knew him to be his own son. A thing that added a second blow to the compassion of all the beholders; he only, without uttering a word or turning away his eyes, stood fixedly contemplating the body of his son, till the vehemence of sorrow, having overcome his vital spirits, made him sink down, stone dead, to the ground.

Great grief deprives us of the use of speech, and sometimes causes death.

"Thou, Lesbia, robb'st my soul of rest,
And rais'dst those tumults in my breast;
For while I gazed, in transports tost,
My breath was gone, my voice was lost.
My bosom glowed, the subtle flame
Ran quick through all my vital frame;
O'er my dim eyes a darkness hung,
My ears with hollow murmurs rung."

So that it is not in the height and greatest fury of the fit that we are in a condition to pour out our complaints and our persuasions, the soul being, at that time, overburthened, and labouring with profound thoughts, and the body dejected and languishing with desire. And thence it is that proceed those accidental impotences that sometimes so unseasonably surprise the willing lover, and that frigidity which, by the force of an immoderate ardour, seizes him even in the very lap of fruition. All passions that suffer themselves to be relished and digested are but moderate.

Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.[5]

The surprise of unexpected joys often produces the same effect.

sica, on reading the news of the honours the Roman senate had decreed him,[1] we have, moreover, one in our own time, of Pope Leo the Tenth, who, upon news of the taking of Milan, a thing he had so ardently desired, was wrapt with so sudden an excess of joy that he immediately fell into a fever and died.[2] And, for a more notable testimony of the imbecility of human nature, it is recorded, by the ancients,[3] that Diodorus the Dialectician, died on the spot, out of an extreme passion of shame, for not having been able, in his own school, and in the presence of a great auditory, to disengage himself from a nice argument that was propounded to him. I, for my part, am very little subject to these violent passions; I am naturally of a stubborn apprehension, which, by reason, I every day harden and fortify more and more.

CHAPTER III.

THAT OUR AFFECTIONS CARRY THEMSELVES BEYOND US.

Mankind too curious after futurity.

SUCH as accuse mankind of always gaping after future things, and advise us to make the most of the good which is present, and to set up our rest upon that, as having no hold upon that which is to come, even less than that we have upon what is past, have hit upon the most universal of human errors, if that may be called an error to which nature itself has disposed us, who, in order to the subsistence and continuation of her own work, has, amongst several others, prepossessed us with this deceiving imagination, as being more jealous of our action than afraid of our knowledge.

We are never present with, but always beyond, ourselves. Fear, desire, and hope, are still pushing us on towards the future, depriving us, in the mean time, of the sense and consideration of that which is, to amuse us with the thought of what shall be, even when we shall be no more. Calamitosus est animus futuri anxius.[4] "'Tis a great calamity to have a mind anxious about things to come." We find this great precept often repeated in Plato, "Do thine own work, and know thyself." Of which two parts, both the one and the other, generally comprehends our whole duty, and, in like manner, do each of them involve the other. He who will do his own work aright will find that his first lesson is to know himself, and what is proper for him; and he who rightly understands himself will never mistake another man's work for his own, but will love and improve himself above all other things, will refuse superfluous employments, and reject all unprofitable thoughts and propositions. As folly on the one side, though it should enjoy all it can desire, would, notwithstanding, never be content; so, on the other, wisdom ever acquiesces with the present, and is never dissatisfied with its immediate condition; and that is the reason why Epicurus dispenses his sages from all forecast and care of the future.

That the conduct of princes should be canvassed after death.

Amongst those laws that relate to the dead, I look upon that to be a very sound one, by which the actions of princes are to be examined and sifted after their decease.[5] While living, they are equal with, at least, if not above, the laws, and, therefore, what justice could not inflict upon their persons it is but reason should be executed upon their reputations and the estates of their successors; things that we often value above life itself. It is a custom of singular advantage to those countries where it is in use, and much to be desired by all good princes who have reason to take it ill, that the memories of the tyrannical and wicked should be treated with the same respect as theirs. We owe, it is true, subjection and obedience to all our kings, whether good or bad, alike, for that has respect unto their office; but, as to affection and esteem, these are only due to their virtue. Let it be granted that, for the sake of political order, we are, with patience, to endure unworthy princes, to conceal their vices, and to assist them in their indifferent actions, whilst their authority stands in need of our support; yet, the relation of prince and subject being once at an end, there is no reason we should deny the expression of our resentment to our own liberty, and to common justice; or, more especially, deprive good subjects of the glory of having submissively and faithfully served a prince whose imperfections were, to them, so well known; this were to rob posterity of a most useful example; and those who, out of respect to some private obligation, iniquitously vindicate the memory of a faulty prince, do a private right at the expense of public justice. Livy very truly says: "That the language of men bred up in courts is always full of vain ostentation and false testimony,"[6] every one indifferently magnifying his own master, and stretching his commendation to the utmost extent of virtue and sovereign grandeur. And it is not impossible but some may condemn the magnanimity of those two soldiers, who so roundly answered Nero to his face; the one being asked, by him, Why he bore him ill-will? "I loved thee," answered he, "whilst thou wert worthy of it; but since thou art become a parricide, an incendiary, a player, and a coachman, I hate thee as thou dost deserve." And the other, Why he should attempt to kill him? "Because," said he, "I could think of no other remedy against thy perpetual mischiefs."[1] But the public and universal testimonies that were given against him, after his death (and will be to all posterity, both against him and against all other wicked princes like him), of his tyrannies and abominable conduct, who, of a sound judgment, can reprove them?

Ceremony of the Lacedemonians at the interment of their kings.

I am scandalized, I confess, that in so sacred a government as that of the Lacedemonians, there should have been mixed that hypocritical ceremony at the death of their kings; where all their confederates and neighbours, and all sorts and degrees of men and women, as well as their slaves, cut and slashed their foreheads in token of sorrow, repeating in their cries and lamentations that that king (let him have been as wicked as the devil,) was the best that ever they had; thus attributing to his quality the praises that only belong to merit, and that of right are due to desert, though lodged in the lowest and most inferior subject.[2]

No man is happy till he is dead.

Aristotle (who will still have a hand in every thing,) makes a query upon the saying of Solon, "That none can be said to be happy until he is dead;" whether, then, any one who has lived and died according to his heart's desire, if he have left an ill repute behind him, and that his posterity be miserable, can be said to be happy?[3] Whilst we have life and motion, we convey ourselves, by fancy and anticipation, whither and to what we please; but once out of being, we have no more any manner of communication with what is in being; and Solon, therefore, had better have said, "That man is never happy at all, since he is never so till after he is no more."

The dead treated as though alive.

Bertrand du Glesquin dying before the castle of Randon,[5] near unto Puy, in Auvergne, the besieged were afterwards, upon surrender, enjoined to lay down the keys of the place upon the corpse of the dead general. Bartholomew d'Alviano, the Venetian general, dying in the service of the Republic, in their wars in Brescia, and his corpse being to be carried to Venice, through the territory of Verona, an enemy's country, most of the army were of opinion to demand safe conduct from the Veronese: but Theodore Trivulsio opposed the motion, rather choosing to make way for the body by force of arms, and to run the hazard of a battle; saying, it was not fit that he, who in his life was never afraid of his enemies, should seem to apprehend them when he was dead.[6] And, in truth, in cases of the same nature, by the Greek laws, he who made suit to an enemy for a body to give it burial, did, by that act, renounce his victory, and had no longer the right to erect a trophy; and he to whom such suit was made was ever, whatever otherwise the success had been, reputed victor. By this means it was that Nicias lost the advantage he had visibly obtained over the Corinthians,[7] and that Agesilaus, on the contrary, assured that which he had before very doubtfully gained over the Bœotians.[8]

These things might appear very odd had it not been a general practice in all ages not only to extend the concern of our persons beyond this life, but, moreover, to fancy that the favours of heaven accompany us to the grave, and continue, even after life, to our ashes. Of which there are so many examples among the ancients, waiving those of our times, that it is not necessary I should insist upon it. Edward the First, King of England, having, in the long wars between him and Robert, King of Scotland, had sufficient experience of how great importance his own immediate presence was to the success of his affairs, having ever been victorious in whatever he undertook in his own person; when he came to die, bound his son in a solemn oath, that so soon as he should be dead, he should boil his body till the flesh parted from the bones, and, having burned the flesh, preserve the bones to carry continually with him in his army so often as he should be obliged to go against the Scots; as if destiny had attached victory even to those miserable remains. John Zisca, the same who so often, in vindication of Wickliffe's errors, overran Bohemia, left order that they should flay him after his death, and of his skin make a drum, to carry in the war against his enemies, fancying this would contribute to the continuation of the successes he himself had always obtained in the war against them. In like manner some Indians, in a battle with the Spaniards, carried with them the bones of one of their captains, in consideration of the victories they had formerly obtained under his conduct. And other people, in the same new world, carry about with them, in their wars, the relics of valiant men, who have died in battle, to incite their courage and advance their fortune. Of which examples the first reserve nothing for the tomb but the reputation they have acquired by their former achievements; while these assign to these great men, even in the grave, a certain power of operation.

The last act of the captain Bayard is of a much better composition; who, finding himself wounded to death with a harquebuss shot, and, being by his friends importuned to retire out of the fight, made answer, "That he would not begin, at the last gasp, to turn his back to the enemy;" and, accordingly, still fought on, till, feeling himself too faint and no longer able to sit his horse, he commanded his steward to set him down against the root of a tree, but so that he might die with his face towards the enemy, which he did.[1]

I must yet add another example, equally remarkable, for the present consideration, with any of the former. The Emperor Maximilian, great grandfather to the present King Philip,[2] was a prince endowed with great qualities, and, amongst the rest, with a singular beauty of person; but had, withal, a humour very contrary to that of other princes, who, for the dispatch of their most important affairs, convert their close-stool into a chair of state; which was that he would never permit any of his bed-chamber, in what familiar degree of favour soever, to see him in that posture; and would steal aside to make water, as religiously shy as a virgin, not to discover either to his physician, or any other person, those parts that we are accustomed to conceal. And I myself, who have so impudent a way of talking, am, nevertheless, so modest this way that, unless at the great importunity of necessity or pleasure, I very rarely and unwillingly communicate to the sight of any, those parts or actions, that custom orders us to conceal; wherein I suffer more constraint than I conceive is very well becoming a man, especially of my profession. But he nourished this modest humour to such a degree that he gave express orders in his last will that they should put him on drawers so soon as he should be dead; to which, methinks, he would have done well to have added, by way of codicil, that he should be hoodwinked, too, who put them on. The charge that Cyrus left with his children, that neither they nor any other should either see or touch his body after the soul was departed from it,[3] I attribute to some superstitious devotion of his; both his historian and himself, amongst their other great qualities, having strewed the whole course of their lives with a singular attention and respect to religion.

Modesty of Maximilian the Emperor.

Cyrus's reverence to religion.

I was by no means pleased with a story that was told me by a man of great quality, of a relation of mine, one who had given a very good account of himself both in peace and war; that, coming to die in a very old age, tormented with an excessive pain of the stone, he spent the last hours of his life in an extraordinary solicitude about ordering the pomp and ceremony of his funeral, pressing all the men of condition who came to see him to engage their word to attend him to his grave; importuning this very prince, who came to visit him at his last gasp, with a most earnest supplication, that he would order his family to be assisting there, alleging several reasons and examples to prove that it was a respect due to a man of his condition; and seemed to die content, having obtained this promise, and appointed the method and order of his funeral parade. I have seldom heard of so long-lived a vanity. The contrary solicitude, of which also I do not want domestic example, seems to be somewhat a-kin to this; that a man shall cudgel his brains, at the last moments of his life, to contrive his obsequies to some particular and unusual a parsimony, to one single servant with a candle and lanthorn; yet I see this humour commended, and the appointment of Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, who forbad his heirs to bestow upon his corpse even the common ceremonies in use upon such occasions.[4] Is it temperance and frugality to avoid expense and pleasure, of which the use and knowledge is imperceptible to us? This were an easy and cheap reformation. If instructions were at all necessary in this case, I should be of opinion that in this, as in all other actions of life, the ceremony and expense should be regulated by the condition of the person deceased; and the philosopher Lycon prudently ordered his executors to dispose of his body where they should think most fit, and as to his funeral, to order it to be neither too superfluous, nor too mean.[5] For my part, I shall wholly refer the ordering of this ceremony to custom, and leave the whole matter to the discretion of those to whose lot it shall fall to do me that last office. Totus hic locus est contemnendus in nobis, non negligendus in nostris.[6] "The place of our sepulture is wholly to be contemned by us, but not to be neglected by our friends." And it was a holy saying of a saint, Curatio funeris, conditio sepulturæ, pompa exsequiarum, magis sunt vivorum solatia, quàm subsidia mortuorum.[7] "The care of funerals, the place of sepulture, and the pomp of obsequies, are rather consolations to the living than any benefit to the dead." Which made Socrates answer Criton, who, at the hour of his death, asked him, how he would be buried? "How you will," said he.[8] If I were to concern myself farther about this affair, I should be most tempted, as the greatest satisfaction of this kind, to imitate those who in their life-time entertain themselves with the ceremony of their own obsequies before-hand, and are pleased with viewing their own monument, and beholding their own dead countenance in marble. Happy are they who can gratify their senses by insensibility, and live by their death! I can hardly keep from an implacable hatred against all popular government, though I cannot but think it the most natural and equitable of all others, so often as I call to mind the inhuman injustice of the people of Athens, who, without remission, or once vouchsafing to hear what they had to say for themselves, put to death their brave captains, newly returned triumphant from a naval victory they had obtained over the Lacedæmonians near the Arginusian Isles, the most bloody and obstinate engagement that ever the Greeks fought at sea, for no other reason but that they had followed up their blow and pursued the advantages presented to them by the rule of war, instead of staying to gather up and bury their dead; an execution that is yet rendered more odious by the behaviour of Diomedon, one of the condemned, and a man of eminent virtue, both political and military, who, after having heard their sentence, advancing to speak, no audience till then having been allowed, instead of pleading his cause, and representing the evident injustice of so cruel a sentence, only expressed a solicitude for his judges' preservation, beseeching the gods to convert this sentence to their good, and praying that for neglecting to fulfil those vows which he and his companions had made (which he also acquainted them with,) in acknowledgment of so glorious a success they might not pull down the indignation of the gods upon them; and so without more words went courageously to his death.[1] But fortune a few years after punished the Athenians in a suitable way. For Chabrias, captain-general of their naval forces, having got the better of Pollis, admiral of Sparta, off the Isle of Naxos, totally lost the fruits of his victory, of very great importance to their affairs, in order not to incur the danger of this example, and in his anxiety not to lose a few bodies of his dead friends that were floating in the sea, gave opportunity to a world of living enemies to sail away in safety, who afterwards made them pay dear for this unseasonable superstition.

"Nor with a tomb as with a haven blest,

Just as nature demonstrates to us that several dead things retain yet an occult sympathy and relation to life; wine changes its flavour and complexion in cellars, according to the changes and seasons of the vine whence it came; and the flesh of venison, 'tis said, alters its condition and taste in the powdering tub, according to the seasons of the living flesh of its kind.

CHAPTER IV.

THAT THE SOUL DISCHARGES ITS PASSIONS UPON FALSE OBJECTS, WHERE THE TRUE ARE WANTING.

A GENTLEMAN of my country, who was very subject to the gout, being importuned by his physicians totally to abstain from all manner of salt meats, was wont pleasantly to reply, that he must needs have something to quarrel with in the extremity of his pain, and that he fancied that railing at and cursing, one while the Bologna sausages, and at another the dried tongues and the hams, was some mitigation to his torments. And, in good earnest, as one's arm when it is advanced to strike, if it fail of meeting with that upon which it was designed to discharge the blow, and spends itself in vain, does offend the striker himself; and as, also, to make a pleasant prospect the sight should not be lost and dilated in a vast extent of empty air, but have some bounds to limit and circumscribe it at a reasonable distance—

Ventus ut amittit vires, nisi robore denso
Occurrunt Silvæ, spatio diffusus inani;[4]

"As winds exhaust their strength, unless withstood
By some thick grove of strong opposing wood."

so it appears that the soul, being transported and discomposed, turns its violence upon itself, if not supplied with something to oppose it, and therefore always requires an object at which to aim, and to keep it in action. Plutarch says of those who are delighted with monkeys and lap dogs, that the amorous part which is in us, for want of a legitimate object, rather than lie idle, does after that manner forge and create one frivolous and false;[5] and we see that the soul, in the exercise of its passions, inclines rather to deceive itself, by creating a false and fantastical subject, even contrary to its own belief, than not to have something to work upon. And after this manner brute beasts direct their fury to fall upon the stone or weapon that has hurt them, and with their teeth even execute their revenge upon themselves, for the injury they have received from another.

"So the fierce bear, made fiercer by the smart
Of the bold Lybian's mortal wounding dart,
Turns round upon the wound, and the tough spear

What causes of the misadventures that befal us do we not invent? What is it that we do not lay the fault to, right or wrong, that we may have something to quarrel with? 'Tis not those beautiful tresses, young lady, you so liberally tear off, nor is it the whiteness of that delicate bosom you so unmercifully beat, that, with an unlucky bullet, have slain your beloved brother; quarrel with something else. Livy, speaking of the Roman army in Spain, says, that for the loss of the two brothers,[2] their great captains, Flere omnes repente, et offensare capita.[3] "They all wept and tore their hair." 'Tis the common practice of affliction. And the philosopher Bion said pleasantly of the king, who by handfuls pulled his hair off his head for sorrow, "Does this man think that baldness is a remedy for grief?"[4] Who has not seen peevish gamesters tear the cards with their teeth, and swallow the dice in revenge for the loss of their money? Xerxes whipped the sea, and wrote a challenge to Mount Athos.[5] Cyrus employed a whole army several days at work, to revenge himself of the river Gnidus, for the fright it had put him into in passing over it;[6] and Caligula demolished a very beautiful palace for the discomfort his mother had once had there.[7]

There was a story current, when I was a boy, that one of our neighbouring kings,[8] having received a blow from the hand of God, swore he would be revenged, and, in order to it, made proclamation that, for ten years to come, no one throughout his dominions should pray to him, nor mention him, nor believe in him; by which we are not so much to take measure of the folly, as of the vain-glory of the nation of which this tale was told. These are vices that indeed always go together; but such actions as these have in them more of presumption than want of sense. Augustus Cæsar, having been tost with a tempest at sea, fell to defying Neptune, and in the pomp of the Circensian games, to be revenged of him, deposed his statue from the place it had amongst the other deities.[9] Wherein he was less excusable than the former, and less than he was afterwards, when, having lost a battle under Quintilius Varus in Germany, in rage and despair, he went running his head against the walls, and crying out, "O Varus! give me my men again!"[10] for these exceed all folly, forasmuch as impiety is joined with it, who invade God himself, or at least Fortune, as if she had ears that were subject to our batteries; like the Thracians, who, when it thunders or lightens, fall to shooting against heaven with Titanian fury,[11] as if by flights of arrows they intended to reduce God to reason. The ancient poet in Plutarch tells us,

We must not quarrel heaven in our affairs,
That nothing for a mortal's anger cares.[12]

But we can never enough condemn the senseless and ridiculous sallies of our passions.

CHAPTER V.

WHETHER THE GOVERNOR OF A PLACE BESIEGED OUGHT HIMSELF TO GO OUT TO PARLEY.

Deceit in warfare condemned.

LUCIUS MARCIUS,[13] the Roman Legate, in the war against Perseus, king of Macedon, to gain time wherein to re-inforce his army, set on foot some overtures of accommodation, with which the king being lulled asleep, concluded a cessation for certain days; by this means giving his enemy opportunity and leisure to repair his army, which was afterwards the occasion of his own ruin. The elder sort of senators, notwithstanding, mindful of their forefathers' virtue, were by no means satisfied with this proceeding; but on the contrary condemned it, as degenerating from their ancient practice, which they said was by valour, and not by artifice, surprises, and night encounters, or by pretended flight, ambuscades, and deceitful treaties, to overcome their enemies; never making war till having first denounced it, and very often assigned both the hour and place of battle. Out of this generous principle it was that they delivered up to Pyrrhus his treacherous physician, and to the Phaliscians their disloyal school-master. And this was indeed a procedure truly Roman, and nothing allied to the Græcian subtilty, or Punic cunning, where it was reputed a victory of less glory to overcome by force than by fraud. Deceit may serve for a need, but he only confesses himself overcome who knows he is neither subdued by policy nor misadventure, but by dint of valour, in a fair and manly war. And it very well appears by the discourse of these good old senators, that this fine sentence was not yet received amongst them,

——Dolus, an virtus, quis in hoste requirat?[14]

"No matter if by valour, or deceit,
We overcome, so we the better get."

The Achaians, says Polybius, abhorred all manner of double-dealing in war, not reputing it a victory unless where the courage of the enemy was fairly subdued. Eam vir sanctus et sapiens scietveram esse victoriam, quæ, salva fide et integra dignitate, parabitur.[1] "An honest and wise man will acknowledge that only to be a true victory which is obtained without violation of faith, or blemish upon honour," says another.

Vosne velit, an me, regnare hera, quidve ferat, fors,
Virtute experiamur.[2]

"If you or I shall rule, let 's fairly try,
And force or fortune give the victory."

In the kingdom of Ternate, amongst those nations which we so roundly call barbarian, they have a custom never to commence war till it be first denounced; adding withal, an ample declaration of what they have to carry it on withal, how many men, what supplies, and what arms, both offensive and defensive; but, that being done, if their enemies do not yield, they afterwards deem it lawful to employ this power without reproach, by any means that may best conduce to their own ends.

The ancient Florentines were so far from wishing to obtain any advantage over their enemies by surprise that they always gave them a month's warning before they drew their army into the field, by the continual tolling of a bell they called Martinella.[3]

As to us, who are not so scrupulous in this matter, who attribute the honour of the war to him who has the better of it, after what manner soever obtained, and who, after Lysander, say, "Where the lion's skin is too short, we must eke it out with the fox's case,"[4] the most usual occasions of surprise are derived from this practice, and we hold that there are no moments wherein a chief ought to be more circumspect, and to have his eye so much at watch, as those of parlies and treaties of accommodation; and it is therefore become a general rule amongst the military men of these latter times that a governor of a place never ought in a time of siege to go out himself to parley. It was for this that in our fathers' days the Seigneurs de Montmord and de l'Assigni, defending Mousson against the Count de Nassau, were so highly censured; yet in this case it would be excusable in that governor who, going out for this purpose, should do it in such a manner that the safety and advantage should be on his side; as Count Guido de Rangoni did at Reggio, (if we are to believe du Bellay, for Guicciardin says it was he himself,) when Monsieur de l' Escut approached to parley; for he went so little a way from the wall of his fortress that, a disorder happening during the parley, not only Monsieur de l' Escut and his party, who were advanced with him, found themselves by much the weaker (insomuch that Alessandro de Trivulcio was there slain), but he himself was constrained, as the surest way, to follow the Count, and relying upon his honour to secure himself from the danger of the shot within the very walls of the town.[5]

Eumenes, being shut up in the city of Nora, by Antigonus, and by him importuned to come out to speak with him, as he sent him word it was fit he should to a better man than himself, who had the advantage over him, returned this noble answer, "I never shall think any man better than myself, whilst I have my sword in my hand;" and would not consent to come out to him, till first, according to his own demand, Antigonus had delivered his own nephew Ptolemy in hostage.[6]

And yet some have done well in going out in person to parley with the assailant on his word of honour; witness Henry de Vaux, a cavalier of Champagne, who being besieged by the English in the castle of Courmicy,[7] and Bartholomew de Bruwes,[8] who commanded at the siege, having so sapped the greatest part of the castle without that nothing remained but setting fire to the props to bury the besieged under the ruins, he required the said Henry to come out to speak with him for his own good; which the other accordingly doing, with three more in company with him, and his own evident ruin being made apparent to him, he conceived himself singularly obliged to his enemy, to whose discretion he and his garrison then surrendered themselves; and, fire being presently applied to the mine, the props no sooner began to fail but the castle was immediately turned topsy-turvy, no one stone being left upon another.[9]

I could, and do, with great facility, rely upon the faith of another; but I should very unwillingly do it in any case where it might be judged that it was rather an effect of my despair and want of courage than voluntarily and out of confidence and security in the faith of him with whom I had to do.

CHAPTER VI.

THAT THE HOUR OF PARLEY IS DANGEROUS.

YET I saw, lately at Mussidan,[10] a place not far from my house, that those who were driven out thence by our army, and others of their party, highly complained of treachery, for that, during a treaty of accommodation, and in the very interim that their deputies were treating, they were surprised and cut to pieces: a thing that, peradventure, in another age, might have had some colour of foul play; but, as I said before, the practice of arms in these days is quite another thing, and there is now no confidence in an enemy excusable till after the last seal of obligation is fixed; and even then the conqueror has enough to do to keep his word; so hazardous a thing it is to intrust the observation of the faith a man has engaged to a town that surrenders upon easy and favourable conditions, to the necessity, avarice, and license of a victorious army, and to give the soldiers free entrance into it in the heat of blood.

The faith of military men very uncertain.

Lucius Æmilius Regillus, a Roman Prætor, having lost his time in attempting to take the city of Phocæa by force, by reason of the singular valour wherewith the inhabitants defended themselves against him, conditioned at last to receive them as friends to the people of Rome, and to enter the town, as into a confederate city, without any manner of hostility; of which he gave them all possible assurance: but, having, for the greater pomp, brought his whole army in with him, it was no more in his power, with all the endeavour he could use, to command his people; so that, avarice and revenge despising and trampling under foot both his authority and all military discipline, he there at once saw his own faith violated, and a considerable part of the city sacked and ruined before his face.[1]

Cleomenes was wont to say that, whatever mischief a man could do his enemy in time of war was above justice, and nothing accountable to it in the sight of Gods and men. And, according to this principle, having concluded a cessation with those of Argos for seven days, the third night after he fell upon them when they were all buried in security and sleep, and put them to the sword; alleging, for his excuse, that there had no nights been mentioned in the truce. But the Gods punished his subtle perfidy.[2] In a time of parley also, and while the citizens were intent upon their capitulation, the city of Casilinum was taken by surprise,[3] and that even in the age of the justest captains, and the most perfect discipline of the Roman army; for it is not said that it is not lawful for us in time and place to make advantage of our enemies' want of understanding, as well as their want of courage. And doubtless war has naturally a great many privileges that appear reasonable, even to the prejudice of reason. And therefore here the rule fails, Neminem id agere, ut ex alterius prædetur inscitia.[4] "No one should prey upon another's folly." But I am astonished at the great liberty allowed by Xenophon in such cases,[5] and that both by precept and the example of several exploits of his complete general; an author of very great authority, I confess, in those affairs, as being in his own person both a great captain and a philosopher of the first form of Socrates' disciples; and yet I cannot consent to such a measure of license as he dispenses in all things and places.

Monsieur d'Aubigny besieging Capua, after having played a furious battery against it, Signior Fabricio Colonna, governor of the town, having from a bastion begun to parley, and his soldiers in the mean time being a little more remiss in their guard, our people took advantage of their security, entered the place at unawares, and put them all to the sword. And of later memory, at Yvoy,[6] Signior Juliano Rommero having played that part of a novice to go out to capitulate with Monsieur the Constable, at his return found his place taken. But, that we might not escape scot free, the Marquis of Pescara having laid siege to Genoa, where Duke Ottavio Fregosa commanded under our protection, and the articles betwixt them being so far advanced that it was looked upon as a done thing, and upon the point to be concluded, the Spaniards, in the mean time, being slipped in under the privilege of the treaty, seized on the gates, and made use of this treachery as an absolute and fair victory.[7] And since, at Ligny in Barrois, where the Count de Brienne commanded, the Emperor having in his own person beleagured that place, and Bartheville, the said Count's lieutenant, going out to parley, while he was capitulating the town was taken.[8]

Fù il vincer sempre mai laudabil cosa

And conquest aye was deem'd a glorious thing,
Which way soe'er the conqu'ror purchas'd it, say they. But the philosopher Chrysippus was of another opinion, wherein I also concur; for he was used to say that those who run a race ought to employ all the force they have in what they are about, and to run as fast as they can; but that it is by no means fair in them to lay an hand upon their adversary to stop him, nor to set a leg before him to throw him down.[10] And still more generous was the answer of the Great Alexander to Polypercon, who was persuading him to take the advantage of the night's obscurity to fall upon Darius; "no," said he, "it is not for such a man as I to steal a victory:" malo me fortunæ pœniteat, quam victoriæ pudeat.[11] "I had rather have to lament my fortune than be ashamed of my victory."

CHAPTER VII.

THAT THE INTENTION IS JUDGE OF OUR ACTIONS.

Whether death discharges us of an obligation.

'Tis a saying, that death discharges us of all our obligations. However, I know some who have taken it in another sense. Henry VII., king of England, articled with Don Philip, son to Maximilian the emperor, or, to give him the more honourable title, father to the Emperor Charles V., that the said Philip should deliver up into his hands the duke of Suffolk, of the White Rose, his mortal enemy, who was fled into the Low Countries; which Philip (not knowing how to evade it) accordingly promised to do, but upon condition, nevertheless, that Henry should attempt nothing against the life of the said duke, which during his own life the king kept to; but, coming to die, in his last will, he commanded his son to put him to death immediately after his decease.[2] And lately, in the tragedy that the duke of Alva presented to us at Brussels, in the persons of Count Egmont and Horne, there were many very remarkable passages, and one amongst the rest, that Count Egmont, upon the security of whose word and faith Count Horne had come and surrendered himself to the duke of Alva, earnestly entreated that he might first mount the scaffold, to the end that death might disengage him from the obligation he had passed to the other. In these cases, methinks death did not acquit the king of his promise, and the Count was freed from his, even though he had not died. For we cannot be obliged beyond what we are able to perform, by reason that effects and performances are not at all in our power, and that indeed we are masters of nothing but the will, in which, by necessity, all the rules and whole duty of mankind are founded and established. And therefore Count Egmont, holding his soul and will bound and indebted to his promise, although he had not the power to make it good, had doubtless been absolved of his obligation, even though he had out-lived the other; but the king of England, premeditatedly breaking his faith, was no more to be excused for deferring the execution of his infidelity till after his death than Herodotus' mason, who having inviolably, during the time of his life, kept the secret of the treasure of the king of Ægypt his master, at his death discovered it to his children.[3]

I have noticed several, in my time, who, plagued by their consciences for unjustly detaining the goods of another, have thought to make amends by their will, and after their decease; but they had as good do nothing as delude themselves both in taking so much time in so pressing an affair, and in going about to repair an injury with so little damage to themselves. They owe, over and above, something of their own, and by how much their payment is more strict and incommodious to themselves, by so much is their restitution more perfect, just, and meritorious; for penitence requires penance. But they do yet worse than these, who reserve the declaration of their animosity against their neighbour to the last gasp, having concealed it all the time of their lives before, wherein they declare themselves to have little regard for their own honour, irritating the party offended against their memory only; and less for their conscience, not having the power, even out of respect to death itself, to make their malice die with them; but extending the life of their hatred even beyond their own. Unjust judges, who defer judgment to a time wherein they can have no cognizance of the cause! For my part I shall take care, if I can, that my death discover nothing that my life has not first declared, and that openly.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF IDLENESS.

As we see ground that has long lain idle and untilled, if it be rich and naturally fertile, abound with innumerable sorts of weeds and unprofitable wild herbs; and that, to make it perform its true office, we must cultivate and prepare it for such seeds as are proper for our service; and as we see women that, without the knowledge of men, do sometimes of themselves bring forth inanimate and formless lumps of flesh, but that to cause a natural and perfect generation they are to be husbanded with another kind of seed; even so it is with our minds, which if not applied to some certain study that may fix and restrain them, run into a thousand extravagances, and are eternally roving here and there in the inextricable labyrinth of restless imagination.

Sicut aquæ tremulum labris ubi lumen ahenis,

Omnia pervolitat late loca; jamque sub auras
Erigitur summique ferit laquearia tecti.[4]

"Like as the quivering reflection

Sheds on the bason, or the moon's pale beam
Gives light and colour to the captive stream,

And walls and roof strikes with its trembling rays."

"Like sick men's dreams, that, from a troubled brain, Phantasms create, ridiculous and vain."

The soul that has no established limit to circumscribe it, loses itself; for as the Epigrammatist says: He that is every where is no where.

Quisquis ubique habitat, Maxime, nusquam habitat.

When I lately retired myself to my own house, with a resolution, as much as possibly I could, to avoid all manner of concern in affairs, and to spend in privacy and repose the little remainder of time I have to live, I fancied I could not more oblige my mind than to suffer it at full leisure to entertain and divert itself, which I hoped it might now the better be entrusted to do, as being by time and observation become more settled and mature; but I find,

Variam semper dant otia mentem.[2]

"—— E'en in the most retir'd estate, Leisure itself does various thoughts create:"

that, quite the contrary, it is like a horse that has broken from his rider, who voluntarily runs into a much wilder career than any horseman would put him to, and creates me so many chimæras and fantastic monsters, one upon another, without order or design, that, the better at leisure to contemplate their strangeness and absurdity, I have begun to commit them to writing, hoping in time to make them ashamed of themselves.

CHAPTER IX.

OF LIARS.

THERE is not a man living whom it would so little become to speak of memory as myself, for I have scarcely any at all; and do not think that the world has again another so marvellously treacherous as mine. My other faculties are all very ordinary and mean; but in this I think myself so singular, and to have the defect to such a degree of excellence, that I deserve, methinks, to be famous for it, and to have more than a common reputation. Besides the natural inconveniences which I experience from this cause, (for, in truth, the use of memory considered Plato had reason when he called it a great and powerful Goddess;[4]) in my country, when they would describe a man that has no sense, they say, such an one has no memory; and when I complain of mine,[5] they seem not to believe I am in earnest, and presently reprove me, as though I accused myself for a fool, not discerning the difference betwixt memory and understanding; wherein they are very wide of my intention, and do me wrong, experience rather daily shewing us, on the contrary, that a strong memory is commonly coupled with infirm judgment. And they do me, moreover, who am so perfect in nothing as in friendship, a greater wrong in this, that they make the same words, which accuse my infirmity, represent me for an ungrateful person; bringing my affection into question upon the account of my memory, and, from a natural imperfection, unjustly derive a defect of conscience. "He has forgot," says one, "this request, or that promise; he no longer remembers his friends, he has forgot to say or do, or to conceal, such and such a thing for my sake." And truly, I am apt enough to forget many things, but to neglect any thing my friend has given me in charge, I never do it. And it should be enough, methinks, that I feel the misery and inconvenience of it without being branded with malice, a vice so contrary to my nature.

Montaigne's bad memory.

However, I derive these comforts from my infirmity; first, that it is an evil from which, principally, I have found reason to correct a worse, that would easily enough have grown upon me, namely ambition; this defect being intolerable in those who take upon them the negociations of the world. That, as several like examples in the progress of nature demonstrate to us, she has fortified me in my other faculties proportionably as she has left me unfurnished in this; I should otherwise have been apt, implicitly, to have reposed my understanding and judgment upon the bare report of other men, without ever setting them to work for themselves upon any inquisition whatever, had the inventions and opinions of others been ever present with me by the benefit of memory. That by this means I am not so talkative, for the magazine of the memory is ever better furnished with matter than that of the invention; and had mine been faithful to me, I had, e'er this, deafened all my friends with my eternal babble, the subjects themselves rousing and stirring up the little faculty I have of handling and applying them, and heating and extending my discourse. 'Tis a great imperfection, and what I have observed in several of my intimate friends who, as their memories supply them with a present and entire review of things, carry back their narratives so far, and crowd them with so many irrelevant circumstances, that, though the story be good in itself, they make a shift to spoil it; and if otherwise, you are either to curse the strength of their memory, or the weakness of their judgment. And it is a hard thing to close up a discourse and to cut it short, when you are once in, and have a great deal more to say. There is nothing wherein the strength and breeding of a horse is so much seen as in a round, graceful, and sudden stop. I see some, even among those who talk pertinently enough, who would, but cannot, stop short in their career; for whilst they are seeking out a handsome period to conclude with, they go on talking at random, and are so perplexed and entangled in their own eloquence that they know not what they say, but go on staggering amidst unmeaning sentences, as men stagger and totter on their feet from weakness. But, above all, old men, who yet retain the memory of things past, and forget how often they have told them, are the most dangerous company for this fault; and I have known stories from the mouth of a man of very great quality, otherwise very pleasant in themselves, become very troublesome by being a hundred times repeated over and over again.

[5] He complains of this defect again in the 17th chapter of the second book. Malebranche, and others, charge him with falsehood, in this respect, (see particularly Baudius, Not. ad Jamb. II.) and they alledge, as a proof of this, his numerous quotations. But besides that these quotations are frequently inexact, and that he occasionally contradicts himself, even when not quoting, persons accustomed to authorship know that it requires no great memory to quote, and this frequently. A faulte de memoire naturelle, says the forgetful Montaigne, j'en forge de pupier (book 3. c. 13.) and this is the whole secret.

The second obligation I have to this infirm memory of mine is that, by this means, I less remember the injuries I have received; insomuch that (as one of the ancients[1] said,) I should have a protocol, a register of injuries, or a prompter, like Darius, who, that he might not forget the offence he had received from those of Athens, so often as he sat down to dinner, ordered one of his pages three times to bawl in his ear, "Sir, remember the Athenians."[2] And, besides, the places which I revisit, and the books I read over again, still smile upon me with a fresh novelty.

Liars should have good memories.

It is not without good reason said that he who has not a good memory should never take upon him the trade of lying. I know very well that the grammarians distinguish betwixt an untruth and a lie, and say that to tell an untruth is to tell a thing that is false, but which we ourselves believe to be true;[3] but that the definition of the Latin verb, to lie,[4] whence our French verb is taken, signifies the going against our conscience; and that, therefore, this touches only those who speak against their own knowledge; and it is to this last sort of liars only that I now refer. Now, these either wholly contrive and invent the untruths they utter, or so alter and disguise a true story, that it always ends in a lie; and when they disguise and often alter the same story according to their own fancy, 'tis very hard for them at one time or another to escape being trapped, by reason that the real truth of the thing having first taken possession of the memory, and being there lodged, and imprinted by the way of knowledge and fact, it will be ever ready to present itself to the imagination, and to shoulder out any falsehood of their own contriving, which cannot there have so sure and settled footing as the other; and the circumstances of the first true knowledge evermore running in their minds, will be apt to make them forget those that are illegitimate, and only forged by their own fancy. In what they wholly invent, forasmuch as there is no contrary impression to justle their invention, there seems to be less danger of tripping; and yet, even this also, by reason it is a vain body, and without any other foundation than fancy only, is very apt to escape the memory, if they be not careful to make themselves very perfect in their tale. Of which I have often had very pleasant experience at the expense of such as profess only to form and accommodate their speech to the affair they have in hand, or to the humour of the personage with whom they have to do; for the circumstances to which these men stick not to enslave their consciences and their faith, being subject to various changes, their language must vary accordingly. Whence it happens, that of the same thing they tell one man that it is this, and another that it is that, giving it several forms and colours; but if these several men once come to compare notes and find out the cheat, what becomes of this fine art? Besides which they must, of necessity, very often ridiculously trap themselves; for what memory can be sufficient to retain so many different shapes as they have forged upon one and the same subject? I have known many in my time very ambitious of the reputation of this fine sort of cleverness; but they do not see that he who has the reputation of it can do nothing with it.

In plain truth, lying is a hateful and an accursed vice. We are not men, we have no other tie upon one another but our word. If we did but perceive the horror and ill consequences of it, we should pursue it with fire and sword, and more justly than other crimes. I see that parents commonly, and with indiscretion enough, correct their children for little innocent faults, and torment them for wanton childish tricks that have neither impression, nor tend to any consequence: whereas, in my opinion, lying only, and, what is of something a lower form, wilful obstinacy, are the faults which ought, on all occasions, to be combatted, both in the infancy and progress of these vices, which will otherwise grow up and increase with them; and, after a tongue has once got the knack of lying, 'tis not to be imagined how impossible almost it is to reclaim it. Whence it comes to pass that we see some, who are otherwise very honest men, so subject to this vice. I have a good fellow for my tailor, who, yet, I never knew guilty of one truth; no, not even when it had been to his advantage. If falsehood had, like truth, but one face only, we should be upon better terms; for we should then take the contrary to what the liar says for certain truth; but the reverse of truth has a hundred thousand shapes, and a field indefinite, without bound or limit. The Pythagoreans make good to be certain and finite; evil, infinite and uncertain; there are a thousand ways to miss the white, there is only one to hit it. For my own part, I have this vice in so great horror, that I am not sure I could prevail with my conscience to secure myself from the most manifest and extreme danger by an impudent and solemn lie. An ancient father says that a dog we know is better company than a man whose language we do not understand. Ut externus alieno non sit hominis vice.[1] And how much less sociable is false speaking than silence?

King Francis the First bragged that he had, by this means, nonplussed Francis Taverna, the Ambassador of Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan, a man very famous for his eloquence in those days. This gentleman had been sent to excuse his master to his Majesty about a thing of very great consequence, which was this: King Francis, to maintain some correspondence in Italy, out of which he had been lately driven, and particularly in the Duchy of Milan, had thought it, to that end, convenient to have a gentleman, on his behalf, reside at the Court of that Duke; an Ambassador in effect, but in outward appearance no other than a private person, who pretended to be there upon the single account of his own particular affairs; for the Duke, much more depending upon the Emperor, especially at that time, when he was in a treaty of a marriage with his niece, daughter to the King of Denmark, and since Dowager of Lorraine, could not own any friendship or intelligence with us, but very much to his own prejudice. For this commission then, one Merveille, a Milanese gentleman, and equerry to the King, being thought very fit, he was accordingly dispatched thither, with private letters of credence and his instructions of Ambassador, and with other letters of recommendation to the Duke about his own private concerns, the better to colour and cloak the business; and he so long continued in that Court that the Emperor, at last, had some notion of his real employment there, and complained of it to the Duke, which was the occasion of what followed after, as we suppose; which was, that under pretence of a murder by him said to be committed, his trial was in two days dispatched, and his head, in the night, struck off in prison. Signior Francisco then, being upon this account come to the Court of France, prepared with a long counterfeit story to excuse a thing of so dangerous example, (for the King had applied himself to all the Princes of Christendom, as well as to the Duke himself, to demand satisfaction for this outrage upon the person of his minister,) had his audience at the morning council, where, after he had, for the support of his cause, in a long premeditated oration, laid open several plausible justifications of the fact, he concluded with roundly saying that the Duke, his master, had never looked upon this Merveille for other than a private gentleman, and his own subject, who was there only in order to his own business, and who had lived there under no other character; absolutely disowning that he had ever heard he was one of the king's servants, or that his Majesty so much as knew him, so far was he from taking him for an Ambassador. When he had made an end, the King, pressing him with several objections and assertions, and sifting him on all hands, gravelled him at last by asking, why then the execution was performed by night, and as it were by stealth? At which the poor confounded Ambassador, the more handsomely to disengage himself, made answer that the Duke would have been very loth, out of respect to his Majesty, that such an execution should have been performed in the face of the sun. Any one may guess if he was not well schooled when he came home, for having so grossly tripped in the presence of a prince of so delicate a nostril as King Francis.[2]

Pope Julius the Second having sent an Ambassador to the King of England, to animate him against King Francis, the Ambassador having had his audience, and the King, before he would give a positive answer, insisting upon the difficulties he found in setting on foot so great a preparation as would be necessary to attack so potent a king, and, urging some reasons to that effect, the Ambassador very unseasonably replied that he had also himself considered the same difficulties, and had represented as much to the Pope. From which speech of his, so directly opposite to the thing propounded, and the business he came about, which was immediately to incite him to war, the King first derived argument to conceive, which he afterwards found to be true, that this Ambassador, in his own private bosom, was a friend to the French; of which, having advertised the Pope, his estate, at his return home, was confiscated, and himself very narrowly escaped the losing his head.[3]

CHAPTER X.

OF QUICK OR SLOW SPEECH.

Onc ne feurent à tous toutes graces données.[1]

"All graces were never yet to all men given,"

as we see in the gift of eloquence, wherein some have such a facility and promptness, and that which we call a present wit, so easy that they are ever ready upon all occasions, and never to be surprised: and others, more heavy and slow, never venture to utter anything but what they have long premeditated, and taken great care and pains to fit and prepare. Now, as we teach young ladies those sports and exercises which are the most proper to set out the grace and beauty of those parts wherein their chief ornament and perfection lie; so in these two different advantages of eloquence, of which the lawyers and preachers of our age seem principally to make profession, if I were worthy to advise, the slow speaker, methinks, should be more proper for the pulpit, and the other for the bar; and this because the employment of the first does naturally allow him all the leisure he can desire to prepare himself, and, besides, his career is performed in an even and unintermitted line, without stop or interruption; whereas, the pleader's business and interest compels him to enter the lists upon all occasions, and the unexpected objections and replies of his adverse party often justle him out of his course, and put him, upon the instant, to pump for new and extempore answers and defences. Yet, at the interview betwixt Pope Clement and King Francis, at Marseilles, it happened, quite contrary, that Monsieur Poyet, a man bred up all his life at the bar, and in the highest repute for eloquence, having the charge of making the harangue to the Pope committed to him, and having so long meditated on it beforehand, as, it was said, to have brought it ready along with him from Paris; the very day it was to have been pronounced, the Pope, fearing something might be said that might give offence to the other Princes' Ambassadors who were there attending on him, sent to acquaint the King with the argument which he conceived most suiting to the time and place, which, by chance, was quite another thing to that Monsieur Poyet had taken so much pains about; so that the fine speech he had prepared was of no use, and he had, upon the instant, to contrive another; which, finding himself unable to do, Cardinal du Bellay was constrained to perform that office.[2] The pleader's part is, doubtless, much harder than that of the preacher; and yet, in my opinion, we see more passable lawyers than preachers, at least in France. It should seem that the nature of wit is to have its operation prompt and sudden, and that of judgment, to have it more deliberate and more slow: but he who remains totally silent for want of leisure to prepare himself to speak well, and he also whom leisure does no ways benefit to better speaking, are equally unhappy.

The different sorts of eloquence.

'Tis said of Severus Cassius, that he spoke best extempore, that he stood more obliged to fortune than his own diligence, that it was an advantage to him to be interrupted in speaking, and that his adversaries were afraid to nettle him, lest his anger should redouble his eloquence.[3] I know, by experience, a disposition so impatient of a tedious and elaborate premeditation, that if it do not go frankly and gaily to work, can do nothing to the purpose. We say of some compositions that they smell of the lamp, by reason of a certain rough harshness that laborious handling imprints upon those where it has been employed. But, besides this, the extreme solicitude of doing well, and the striving and contending of a mind too far strained and over-bent upon its undertaking, breaks and hinders itself, like water that, by force of its own pressing violence and abundance, cannot find a ready issue through the neck of a bottle, or a narrow sluice. In this condition of nature, of which I now speak, there is this also, that it would not be disordered and stimulated with such a passion as the fury of Cassius; for such a motion would be too violent and rude; it would not be justled, but solicited; it would be roused and heated by unexpected, sudden, and accidental occasions. If it be left to itself, it flags and languishes; agitation only gives it grace and vigour. I am always worst in my own possession; and when wholly at my own disposition, accident has more title to any thing that comes from me, than I; occasion, company, and even the very rising and falling of my own voice, extract more from my fancy than I can find when I examine and employ it by myself, so that the things I say are better than those I write, if either were to be preferred where neither is worth any thing. This also befals me, that I am at a loss when I seek, and light upon things more by chance than by any inquisition of my own judgment. I, perhaps, sometimes hit upon a good point, when I am writing (I mean that seems so to me, though it may appear dull and heavy to another—but no more of these complimentaries—every one says this sort of thing about himself,) but when I come to read it, afterwards, I cannot make out what I meant to say, and, in such cases, a stranger often finds it out before me. If I were always to scratch out such parts, I should make clean work of my book; but then, some other time, chance shews me the meaning as clear as the sun at noon-day, and makes me wonder what I should stick at.

CHAPTER XI.

OF PROGNOSTICATIONS.

Decay of oracles.

As to oracles, it is certain that, long before the coming of Jesus Christ, they began to lose their credit; for we see that Cicero is troubled to find out the cause of their decay, in these words: Cur isto modo jam oracula Delphis eduntur, non modo nostrâ ætate, sed jamdiu, ut nihil possit esse contemptius.[1] "What should be the reason that the oracles at Delphos are so uttered, not only in this age of ours, but for a great while since, that nothing can be more contemptible?" But as to the other prognostics, calculated from the anatomy of beasts at sacrifices, which Plato does, in part, attribute to the natural constitution of the intestines of the beasts themselves, from the scraping of poultry, the flight of birds, (Aves quasdam, rerum augurandarum causâ natas esse putamus;[2] "We think some sorts of birds were purposely created for the purposes of augury;") claps of thunder, the winding of rivers, multa cernunt aruspices, multa augures provident, multa oraculis declarantur, multa vaticinationibus, multa somniis, multa portentis.[3] "Soothsayers and augurs conjecture and foresee many things, and many things are foretold in oracles, prophecies, dreams, and portents;" and others of the like nature, upon which antiquity founded most of their public and private enterprizes, our Christian religion has totally abolished, although there yet remain amongst us some practices of divination from the stars, from spirits, from the shapes and complexions of men, from dreams and the like (a notable proof of the wild curiosity of our nature grasping at, and anticipating, future things, as if we had not enough to do to digest the present).

Ne utile quidem est scire quid futurum sit; miserum est enim nihil proficientem angi.[5] "It is of no avail to know what shall come to pass, for it is a miserable thing to be vexed and tormented to no purpose." Yet are they of much less authority now than heretofore. Which makes the example of Francis, Marquis of Saluzzo, so much more remarkable; who, being lieutenant to King Francis the First, in his army beyond the mountains, infinitely favoured and esteemed in our Court, and obliged to the king's bounty for the Marquisate itself, which had been forfeited by his brother; and, as to the rest, having no manner of provocation given him to do it, and even his own affection opposing any such disloyalty; suffered himself to be so terrified, as it was confidently reported, with the fine prognostics that were spread abroad in favour of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and, to our disadvantage, especially in Italy; where these foolish prophecies were so far believed that, at Rome, great sums of money were ventured out upon return of greater when they came to pass, so certain they made themselves of our ruin; that, having bewailed, to those of his acquaintance who were most intimate with him, the mischiefs that he saw would inevitably fall upon the Crown of France, and the friends he had in that Court, he revolted and turned to the other side; but to his own misfortune, however, what constellation soever governed at that time. But he carried himself in this affair like a man agitated with divers passions; for, having both towns and forces in his hands, the enemy's army, under Antonio de Leyva, close by him, and we not at all suspecting his design, it had been in his power to have done more than he did; for we lost no men by this treason of his, nor any town but Fossan only, and that after a long siege and a brave defence.[6]

And, on the contrary, those who believe this saying are in the wrong: Ista sic reciprocantur, ut et, si divinatio sit, dii sint; et, si dii sint, sit divinatio.[9] "These things have that mutual relation to one another that, if there be such a thing as divination, there must be deities; and, if deities, divination." "Those who birds' language understand, and who

Origin of the art of divination.

The so celebrated art of divination, amongst the Tuscans, took its beginning thus: a labourer, striking deep with his coulter into the earth, saw the Demi-God Tages to ascend with an infantile aspect, but endued with a mature and senile wisdom. Upon the rumour of which all the people ran to see the sight, by whom his words and knowledge, containing the principles and means to attain to this art, were collected and kept for many ages.[2] A birth suitable to its progress! I, for my part, should sooner regulate my affairs by the chance of a die than by such idle and vain dreams. And indeed, in all Republics, a good share of the government has ever been referred to chance. Plato,[3] in the system that he models according to his own fancy, leaves the decision of several things, of very great importance, wholly to it; and will, amongst other things, that marriages, of the better sort, as he reputes, be appointed by lot, attributing so great virtue and adding so great a privilege to this accidental choice as to ordain that the children begot in such wedlock be brought up in the country, and those begot in any other to be thrust out as spurious and base; yet so that if any of those exiles, notwithstanding, should, peradventure, in growing up, give any early hopes of future ability, they might be recalled, as, on the other hand, those who had been retained were to be exiled in case they gave little promise of themselves in their greener years.

I see some, who are mightily given to study, pore and comment upon their almanacs, and produce them for authority when any thing has fallen out; and, indeed, it is hardly possible but that, in saying so much, they must sometimes stumble upon some truth amongst an infinite number of lies. Quis est enim qui totum diem jaculans non aliquando collineet? "For who shoots all day at buts that does not sometimes hit the white?" I think never the better of them for some accidental hits. There would be more certainty in it if there were a rule and a truth in always lying. Besides, nobody records their flim-flams and false prognostics, forasmuch as they are infinite and common; but if they chop upon one truth, that carries a mighty report, as being rare, incredible, and prodigious. So Diagoras, surnamed the Atheist, answered him in Samothrace, who shewing him, in the Temple, the several offerings and stories, in painting, of those who had escaped shipwreck, said to him, "Look, you who think the Gods have no care of human things, what do you say to so many persons preserved from death by their especial favour?" "Why, I say," answered he, "that their pictures are not here who were cast away, which were by much the greater number."

Cicero observes that, of all the philosophers who have acknowledged a Deity, only Xenophanes, the Colophonian, has endeavoured to eradicate all manner of divination.[6] Which makes it the less a wonder if we have sometimes seen some of our princes, to their own cost, rely too much upon these fopperies. I had given any thing, that I had, with my own eyes, seen those two great rarities, the book of Joachim, the Calabrian Abbot, which foretold all the future Popes, their names, and figures; and that of the Emperor Leo, which prophesied all the Emperors and Patriarchs of Greece. This I have been an eye-witness of, that, in public confusions, men, astonished at their fortune, have abandoned their own reason, superstitiously to seek out, in the stars, the ancient causes and menaces of their present mishaps, and, in my time, have been so strangely successful in it as to make me believe that, as this study is the amusement for men of leisure and penetration, those who have been versed in this knack of unfolding and untying riddles are able, in any writing, to find out what they want to find there. But, above all, that which gives them the greatest room to play in is the obscure, ambiguous, and fantastic gibberish of their prophetic canting, where the authors deliver nothing of clear sense, but shroud all in riddle, to the end that posterity may interpret and apply it according to their own fancy.

Socrates' Dæmon.

Socrates's Dæmon, or Familiar, might perhaps be no other but a certain impulsion of the will, which obtruded itself upon him without the advice or consent of his judgment; and, in a soul so enlightened as his was, and so prepared by a continual exercise of wisdom and virtue, 'tis to be supposed those inclinations of his, though sudden and undigested, were ever very important and worthy to be followed. Every one finds in himself some image of such agitations, of a prompt, vehement, and fortuitous opinion; and I must needs allow them some authority who attribute so little to our own prudence, and who also myself have had some, weak in reason, but violent in persuasion or dissuasion (which were most frequent with Socrates),[7] by which I have suffered myself to be carried away so fortunately, and so much to my own advantage, that they might have been judged to have had something in them of a divine inspiration.

CHAPTER XII.

OF CONSTANCY, OR FIRMNESS.

In what constancy and resolution consists.

THE law of resolution and constancy does not imply that we ought not, as much as in us lies, to decline, and to secure ourselves from, the mischiefs and inconveniences that threaten us; nor, consequently, that we shall not fear lest they should surprise us; on the contrary, all decent and honest ways and means of securing ourselves from harm are not only permitted, but moreover commendable, and the business of constancy chiefly is bravely to stand to, and stoutly to suffer those inconveniences which are not to be avoided. There is no motion of body nor any manner of handling arms, how irregular or ungraceful soever, that we condemn, if it serve to defend us from the blow that is made against us.

Several very warlike nations have made use of a retiring and flying way of fight, as a thing of singular advantage, and, by so doing, have made their backs more dangerous than their faces to their enemies. Of which kind of fighting the Turks yet retain something in their practice of arms to this day; and Socrates, in Plato, laughs at Laches, who had defined fortitude to be standing firm in the ranks against the enemy: "What," says he, "would it then be reputed cowardice to overcome them by giving ground?"[1] urging, at the same time, the authority of Homer, who commends Æneas for his skill in running away. And whereas Laches, considering better of it, admits 'twas the practice of the Scythians, and in general of all cavalry whatever, he again attacks him with the example of the Lacedemonian foot (a nation, of all others, the most obstinate in maintaining their ground), who, in the battle of Platea, not being able to break into the Persian phalanx, bethought themselves to disperse and retire, that, by the enemies' supposing they fled, they might break and disunite that vast body of men in the pursuit, and, by that stratagem obtained the victory.

As for the Scythians, 'tis said of them that, when Darius went on his expedition to subdue them, he sent, by a herald, highly to reproach their King that he always retired before him and declined a battle; to which Indathyrsis,[2] for that was his name, returned answer, "That it was not for fear of him or of any man living, that he did so, but that it was the way of marching in practice with his nation, who had neither tilled fields, cities, nor houses to defend, or to fear the enemy should make any advantage of; but that if he had such a stomach to fight, let him come but to view their ancient place of sepulture, and there he should have his fill."

Nevertheless, as to what concerns cannon shot, when a body of men are drawn up in the face of a train of artillery, as the occasion of war does often require, 'tis unhandsome to quit their post to avoid the danger, and a foolish thing to boot, forasmuch as by reason of its force and swiftness we account it inevitable, and many a one, by ducking, stepping aside, and such other motions of fear, has, if no worse, got laughed at by his companions. And yet, in the expedition that the Emperor Charles the Fifth made against us into Provence, the Marquis de Guasto going to reconnoitre the city of Arles, and venturing to advance out of the shelter of a wind-mill, under favour of which he had made his approach, was perceived by the Seigneurs de Bonneval and the Seneschal d'Agenois, who were walking upon the Theatre aux arènes,[3] who, having shewed him to the Sieur de Villiers, commissary of the artillery, he traversed a culverine so admirably well, and levelled it so exactly right at him, that had not the Marquis, seeing fire put to it, slipped aside, it was certainly concluded the shot had taken him full in the body.[4] And, in like manner, some years before Lorenzo de Medici, Duke of Urbino, and father to the Queen-mother,[5] laying siege to Mondolpho, a place in the territories of the Vicariat, in Italy, seeing the cannoneer give fire to a piece that pointed directly against him, ducked, and it was well for him, for otherwise the shot, that only razed the top of his head, had, doubtless, hit him full in the breast. To say truth, I do not think that these dodgings are at all a matter of judgment or reflection; for how is a man to judge of high or low aim on so sudden an occasion? It is much more easy to believe that fortune favoured their fear, and that the same movement, that at one time saves a man, may, at another, make him step into danger. For my own part, I confess, I cannot forbear starting when the rattle of a harquebuse thunders in my ears on a sudden, and in a place where I am not to expect it, which I have also observed in others, braver fellows than I.

Philosophers not blameable for yielding to the first impulses of the passions.

Neither do the Stoicks pretend that the soul of their philosopher should be proof against the first visions and fantasies that surprise him; but, as a natural subject, consent that he should tremble at the terrible noise of thunder or the sudden clatter of some falling ruin, and be affrighted even to paleness and convulsion.

And so in other passions, provided a man's judgment remains sound and entire, and that the site of his reason suffers no concussion nor alteration, and that he yields no consent to his fright and discomposure. To him who is not a philosopher, a fright is the same in the first part of it, but quite another thing in the second; for the impression of the passions does not only remain superficially in him, but penetrates farther, even to the very seat of reason, and so as to infect and to corrupt it. He judges according to his fear, and conforms his behaviour to it.[1] But in this verse you may see the true state of the wise stoick learnedly and plainly expressed.

Mens immota manet, lacrymæ volvuntur inanes.[2]

"His humid eye frail, fruitless, tear-drops rains,
But the firm purpose of his mind remains."

The wise Peripatetick is not himself totally free from perturbations of mind, but he moderates them by his wisdom.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CEREMONY OF THE INTERVIEW OF PRINCES.

THERE is no subject so frivolous that does not merit a place in this rhapsody. According to the common rule of civility, it would be a notable affront to an equal, and much more to a superior, to fail of being at home when he has given you notice he will come to visit you. Nay, queen Margaret of Navarre farther adds that it would be rudeness in a gentleman to go out to meet any one that is coming to see him, let him be of what condition soever; and that it is more respectful and more civil to stay at home to receive him, if only upon the account of missing of him by the way, and that it is enough to receive him at the door, and to wait upon him to his chamber. For my part, who, as much as I can, endeavour to reduce the ceremonies of my house, I very often forget both the one and the other of these vain offices, and peradventure some one may take offence at it; if he do, I am sorry, but I cannot find in my heart to help it; it is much better to offend him once than myself every day, for it would be a perpetual slavery; and to what end do we avoid the servile attendance of courts, if we bring the same, or a greater, trouble, home to our own private houses? It is also a common rule in all assemblies that those of less quality are to be first at the place, by reason that it is a state more due to the better sort to make others wait for them.

The respect which gentlemen are obliged to pay to a great man who visits them.

Nevertheless, at the interview betwixt pope Clement,[3] and king Francis, at Marseilles, the king, after he had in his own person taken order for the necessary preparations for his reception and entertainment, withdrew out of the town, and gave the pope two or three days' leisure for his entry, and wherein to repose and refresh himself before he came to him. And in like manner, at the meeting of the pope[4] and the emperor at Bologna, the emperor gave the pope opportunity to come thither first, and came himself after; for which the reason then given was this—that, at all the interviews of such princes, the greater ought to be first at the appointed place, especially before the other in whose territories the interview is appointed to be, intimating thereby a kind of deference to the other, and that it appears proper for the less to seek out, and to apply themselves to the greater, and not the greater to them

The usual ceremony at the interview of princes.

Not every country only, but every city, and so much as every profession, has its particular forms of civility. There was care enough taken in my education, and I have lived in good company enough to know the formalities of our own nation, and am able to give lessons in it; I love also to follow them, but not to be so servilely tied to their observation that my whole life should be enslaved to ceremonies; of which there are some that, provided a man omits them out of discretion, and not for want of breeding, it will be every whit as handsome in him. I have seen some people rude, by being over civil, and troublesome by their courtesy; though, these excesses excepted, the knowledge of courtesy and good manners is a very necessary study. It is, like grace and beauty, that which begets liking and an inclination to love one another at the first sight, and in the very beginning of an acquaintance and familiarity; and, consequently, that which first opens the door for us to better ourselves by the example of others, if there be any thing in the society worth notice.[5]

Too much nicety in behaviour not desirable.

The advantages of good manners.

CHAPTER XIV.

THAT MEN ARE JUSTLY PUNISHED FOR BEING OBSTINATE IN THE DEFENCE OF A FORT THAT IS NOT IN REASON TO BE DEFENDED.

VALOUR, as well as other virtues, has its bounds, which once transgressed, the next step is into the territories of vice; so that by having too large a proportion of this heroic virtue, unless a man be very perfect in its limits, which upon the confines are very hard to discern, he may very easily unawares run into temerity, obstinacy, and folly. From this consideration it is that we have derived the custom, in time of war, to punish, even with death, those who are obstinate to defend a place that is not tenable by the rules of war. Otherwise, if there were not some examples made, men would be so confident upon the hopes of impunity that not a hen-roost but would resist and stop a royal army.

Why too obstinate a defence of a place is punished.

Monsieur the constable de Montmorency, having at the siege of Pavia been ordered to pass the Tesino, and to take up his quarters in the Fauxbourg St. Antonio, being hindered from doing so, by a tower that was at the end of the bridge, which was so impudent as to stand a battery, hanged every man he found within it for their labour.[1] And again, since, accompanying the Dauphin in his expedition beyond the Alps, and taking the castle of Villano by assault, and all within it having been put to the sword, the governor and his ensign only excepted, he caused them both to be trussed up for the same reason;[2] as also did Captain Martin du Bellay, then governor of Turin, the governor of St. Bony, in the same country, all his people being cut in pieces at the taking of the place.[3]

But, forasmuch as the strength or weakness of a fortress is always measured by the estimate and counterpoise of the forces that attack it (for a man might reasonably enough despise two culverines that would be a mad-man to abide a battery of thirty pieces of cannon); where also the greatness of the prince who is master of the field, his reputation, and the respect that is due unto him, are put into the account, there is always danger that the balance will turn that way; and thence it is that such people have so great an opinion of themselves and their power that, thinking it unreasonable any place should dare to shut its gates against them, they put all to the sword where they meet with any opposition, whilst their fortune continues; as is observable in the fierce and arrogant forms of summoning towns and denouncing war, savouring so much of barbarian pride and insolence, in use amongst the oriental princes, and which their successors to this day do yet retain and practise. And in that part of the world where the Portuguese subdued the Indians, they found some states where it was an universal and inviolable law amongst them that every enemy, overcome by the king in person, or by his representative lieutenant, was out of composition both of ransom and mercy.

So that above all things a man should take heed of falling into the hands of a judge who is an enemy, in arms, and victorious.

CHAPTER XV.

OF THE PUNISHMENT OF COWARDICE.

I ONCE heard of a prince, and a great captain, who having a narration given him as he sat at table of the proceeding against Monsieur de Vervins, who was sentenced to death for having surrendered Boulogne to the English,[4] openly maintained that a soldier could not justly be put to death for his want of courage. And in truth, a man should make a great difference betwixt faults that merely proceed from infirmity and those that are visibly the effects of treachery and malice; for, in the last, men wilfully act against the rules of reason that nature has imprinted in us; whereas in the former it seems as if we might produce the same nature, who left us in such a state of imperfection and defect of courage, for our justification. Insomuch that many have thought we are not justly questionable for any thing but what we commit against the light of our own conscience. And it is partly upon this rule that those ground their opinion who disapprove of capital and sanguinary punishments inflicted upon heretics and infidels; and theirs also who hold that an advocate or a judge is not accountable for having failed in his commission from ignorance.

How cowardice ought to be punished in a soldier.

But as to cowardice, it is certain that the most usual way of chastising it is by ignominy and disgrace; and it is supposed that this practice was first brought into use by the legislator Charondas; and that before his time the laws of Greece punished those with death who fled from a battle; whereas he ordained only that they should be three days exposed in the public place dressed in women's attire, hoping yet for some service from them, having awakened their courage by this open shame;[5] Suffundere malis hominis sanguinem quam effundere,[6] "Choosing rather to bring the blood into their cheeks than to let it out of their bodies." It appears, also, that the Roman laws did anciently punish those with death who had run away; for Ammianus Marcellinus says that the emperor Julian commanded ten of his soldiers, who had turned their backs in an encounter against the Parthians, to be first degraded, and afterwards put to death, according, says he, to the ancient laws.[7] Yet, elsewhere for the like offence, he only condemns others to remain amongst the prisoners under the baggage ensign. The severe punishment the people of Rome inflicted upon those who fled from the battle of Cannæ, and in the same war upon those who ran away with Cneius Fulvius, at his defeat, did not extend to death.[1] And yet methinks men should consider what they do in such cases, lest disgrace should make such delinquents desperate, and not only faint friends, but implacable and mortal enemies.

How the governor of a place was punished for his cowardice.

Of late memory, the Seigneur de Frauget, lieutenant to the Mareschal de Chatillon's company, having, by the Mareschal de Chabannes, been put in governor of Fontarabia, in the place of Monsieur de Lude, and having surrendered it to the Spaniards, he was for that condemned to be degraded from all nobility, and both himself and his posterity declared ignoble, taxable, and for ever incapable of bearing arms; which hard sentence was executed at Lyons;[2] and since that all the gentlemen who were in Guise when the Count de Nassau entered it, underwent the same punishment, as several others have done since for the like offence. However, in case of such a manifest ignorance or cowardice as exceeds all ordinary example, 'tis but reason to take it for a sufficient proof of treachery and malice, and to punish it accordingly.

CHAPTER XVI.

A PROCEEDING OF SOME AMBASSADORS.

A wise custom observed by Montaigne.

I OBSERVE in my travels this custom, ever to learn something from the information of those with whom I confer (which is the best school of all others) and to put my company upon those subjects they are the best able to speak of:

> Basti al nocchiero ragionar de' venti,
> Al bifolco dei tori; et le sue piaghe
> Conti 'l guerrier, conti 'l pastor gli armenti.[3]
> "The seaman best discourses of the winds,
> Of oxen none so well as lab'ring hinds;
> The soldier best can talk of wounds and knocks,
> And gentle shepherds of their harmless flocks;"

for it often falls out that, on the contrary, every one will rather choose to be prating of another man's business than his own, thinking it so much new reputation acquired; witness the jeer Archidamus put upon Periander, that he had quitted the glory of being an excellent physician to gain the repute of a very bad poet.[4] And do but observe what a vast deal of pains Cæsar is at to make us understand his inventions in building bridges, and contriving engines of war,[5] and how succinct and reserved in comparison, where he speaks of the rules of his profession, and his own valour, and military conduct. His exploits sufficiently prove him a great captain, and that he knew well enough, but he would be thought a good engineer to boot; a quality not to be expected in him. The elder Dionysius was a very great captain, as it befitted his fortune he should be; but he took very great pains to get a particular reputation by poetry, and yet he never was cut out for a poet. A gentleman of the long robe being not long since brought to see a study furnished with all sorts of books, both of his own and all other faculties, took no occasion to discourse of any of them, but fell very rudely and impertinently to animadvert upon a barricado placed before the study door, a thing that a hundred captains and common soldiers see every day without taking any notice or offence at.

> Optat ephippia bos piger, optat arare caballus.[6]
> "The lazy ox would saddle have and bit,
> The steed a yoke; neither for either fit."

By this course a man shall never improve himself, nor arrive at any perfection in any thing. He must, therefore, make it his business always to put the architect, the painter, the shoe-maker, and so on, upon discourse of his own business.

The importance of knowing the profession of the writer of any book

And, to this purpose, in reading histories, which is every body's subject, I use to consider what kind of men are the authors; if they be persons that profess nothing but mere learning, I, in and from them, principally observe and learn the style and language; if physicians, I upon that account the rather incline to credit what they report of the temperature of the air, of the health and complexions of princes, of wounds, and diseases; if lawyers, we are from them to take notice of the controversies of right and title, the establishment of laws and civil government, and the like; if divines, of the affairs of the church, ecclesiastical censures, marriages and dispensations; if courtiers, of manners and ceremonies; if soldiers, of the things that belong to their trade, and principally the accounts of such actions and enterprizes wherein they were personally engaged; and if ambassadors, we are to observe their negotiations, intelligences, and practices, and the manner how they are to be carried on.

And this is the reason why that which perhaps I should have lightly passed over in another, I dwelt upon and maturely considered in the history writ by the Seigneur de Langey,[7] (a man well versed in, and of very great judgment in things of that nature,) that is, where after having given a narrative of the fine oration Charles V. had made in the consistory at Rome, and in the presence of the bishop of Mascon and the Seigneur du Velly, our ambassadors there, wherein he had mixed several tart and injurious expressions to the dishonour of our nation; and, amongst the rest, that if his captains and soldiers were not men of another kind of fidelity, resolution, and sufficiency in the knowledge of arms, than those of the king, he would immediately go with a rope about his neck and sue to him for mercy (and it should seem the emperor had really this, or a very little better, opinion of our military men, for he afterwards, twice or thrice in his life, said the very same thing); as also that he challenged the king to fight him in his shirt with rapier and poniard, in a boat: the said Sieur de Langey, pursuing his history, adds that the forenamed ambassadors, sending a dispatch to the king of these things, concealed the greatest part, and particularly the two last passages.

A question whether a prince's ambassador ought to conceal any thing from him of his own affairs.

At which I could not but wonder that it should be in the power of an ambassador to dispense with any thing which he ought to signify to his master especially of so great importance as this, coming from the mouth of such a person, and spoken in so great an assembly; and should rather conceive it had been the servant's duty faithfully to have represented to him the whole and naked truth as it passed, to the end that the liberty of disposing, judging and concluding might have remained in the master; for either to conceal, or to disguise the truth, for fear he should take it otherwise than he ought to do, and lest it should prompt him to some extravagant resolution, and in the mean time to leave him ignorant of his affairs, should seem, methinks, rather to belong to him who is to give the law, than to him who is only to receive it; to him who is in supreme command, and best can judge of his own interests, and not to him who ought to look upon himself as inferior, not only in authority, but in prudence and good counsel. At any rate, I for my part would be loth to be so served in my little concerns.

Nothing more dear to a superior than implicit obedience.

We do so willingly slip the collar of command, upon any pretence whatever, and are so ready to usurp dominion, and every one does so naturally aspire to liberty and power, that no advantage whatever derived from the wit or valour of those he employs ought to be so dear to a superior as a downright and implicit obedience. To obey more as a matter of discretion than subjection is to corrupt the office, and to subvert the power of command; and P. Crassus, the same whom the Romans reputed five times happy,[1] at the time when he was consul in Asia, having sent to a Greek engineer to cause the greater of two masts of ships, that lie had taken notice of at Athens, to be brought to him, to be employed about some engine of battery he had a design to make; the other, presuming upon his own science and sufficiency in those affairs, thought fit to do otherwise than directed, and to bring the less: as being, according to the rules of his art, more proper for the use to which it was designed. But Crassus, though he gave ear to his reasons with great patience, caused him to be well whipped for his pains, valuing the interest of discipline much more than that of the thing in hand.

Yet we may, on the other side, consider that so precise and implicit an obedience as this is only due to positive and peremptory commands. The functions of an ambassador are not so fixed and precise but they must, in the various and unforeseen occurrences and accidents that may fall out in the management of a negociation, be wholly left to their own discretion. They do not simply execute the will of their master, but by their own wisdom form and model it also; and I have in my time known men of command who have been checked for having rather obeyed the express words of the king's letters than the necessity of the affairs they had in hand. Men of understanding do yet to this day condemn the custom of the Kings of Persia, to give their lieutenants and agents so little rein that, upon the least arising difficulties they must evermore have recourse to farther commands; this delay, in so vast an extent of dominion, having often very much prejudiced their affairs. And Crassus writing to a man whose profession it was best to understand those things, and pre-acquainting him to what use this mast was designed, did he not seem to consult his advice, and in a manner invite him to interpose his judgment?

CHAPTER XVII.

OF FEAR.

Obstupui, steterunteque comæ, et vox faucibus hæsit.[2]

"Aghast, astonished, and struck dumb with fear,
I stood: like bristles rose my stiffened hair."

The strange effects of fear.

I AM not so good a naturalist (as they call it[3]) as to discern by what secret springs fear acts in us; but I am wise enough to know that it is a strange passion, and such an one that the physicians say there is no other whatever that sooner dethrones our judgment from its proper seat; which is so true that I myself have seen very many become frantic through fear; and even in those of the best settled temper, it is most certain that it begets a terrible astonishment and confusion during the fit. I omit the vulgar sort, to whom it one while represents their great grandsires risen out of their graves

[1] In that he was very rich, most noble, most eloquent, most skilful in the law, and the highest in the priesthood.—Aul. Gell. i. 13.

[3] By this parenthesis, it would appear that the term naturalist was but just adopted into the French language.

in their shrouds, another while hobgoblins, weir-wolves, and chimeras; but even amongst soldiers (a sort of men over whom, of all others, it ought to have the least power) how often has it converted flocks of sheep into armed squadrons, reeds and bull-rushes into pikes and lances, friends into enemies, and the French white into the red crosses of Spain! When Monsieur de Bourbon took the city of Rome,[1] an ensign, who was on guard at the Bourg St. Pierre, was seized with such a fright, upon the first alarm, that he threw himself out at a breach with his colours upon his shoulder, ran directly upon the enemy, thinking he was retreating toward the inward defences of the city; and, with much ado, seeing Monsieur de Bourbon's people, who thought it had been a sally upon them, draw up to receive him, at last came to himself; and finding his error, and then facing about, retreated full speed through the same breach by which he had gone out; but not until he had first blindly advanced above three hundred paces into the open field. It did not, however, fall out so well with Captain Julius's ensign, at the time when St. Pol was taken from us by the Count de Bures and Monsieur du Reu; for he, being so scared with fear as to throw himself and his fellows out at a port-hole, was immediately cut to pieces by the enemy;[2] and in the same siege it was a very memorable fear that so seized, contracted, and froze up the heart of a young gentleman, that he sunk down stone dead in the breach, without any manner of wound or hurt at all.[3] The like madness sometimes seizes on a whole multitude; for in one of the encounters that Germanicus had with the Germans, two great parties were so amazed with fear that they ran two opposite ways, the one flying to the same place from which the other set out.[4] Sometimes it adds wings to the heels, as in the two first cases, and sometimes nails them to the ground, and fetters them from moving; as we read of the Emperor Theophilus, who, in a battle he lost against the Agarenes, was so astounded and stupified that he had no power to fly; adeò pavor etiam auxilia formida:[5] "so much does fear dread even the means of safety:" 'till such time as Manuel, one of the principal commanders of his army, having jogged and shaken him so as to rouse him out of his trance, said to him, "Sir, if you will not follow me, I will kill you; for it is better you should lose your life than, by being taken, lose the empire."[6] But fear does then manifest its utmost power and effect when it throws us upon a valiant despair, having before deprived us of all sense, both of duty and honour. In the first pitched battle the Romans lost against Hannibal, under the Consul Sempronius, a body of ten thousand foot, that had taken a fright, seeing no other escape for their cowardice, went and threw themselves headlong upon the great array of the enemy, which, with wonderful force and fury, they charged through and through, and routed with a very great slaughter of the Carthaginians; thus purchasing an ignominious flight at the same price they might have done a glorious victory.[7]

Fear sometimes incites to desperate valour.

The thing in the world I am most afraid of is fear; and with good reason, that passion alone, in the trouble of it, exceeding all other accidents. What affliction could be greater or more just than that of Pompey's followers and friends, who, in his ship, were spectators of his horrid and inhuman murder? Yet so it was, that the fear of the Egyptian vessels they saw coming to board them possessed them with so great a fear that it is observed, they thought of nothing but calling upon the mariners to make haste, and, by force of oars, to escape away; 'till being arrived at Tyre, and delivered from the apprehension of further danger, they then had leisure to turn their thoughts to the loss of their captain, and to give vent to those tears and lamentations that the other more prevalent passion had 'till then suspended.[8]

Fear supersedes every other passion.

Tum pavor sapientiam omnem mihi ex animo expectorat.[9]

"My mind with great and sudden fear oppress'd,
Was, for the time, of judgment dispossessed."

Such as have been well banged in some skirmish may yet, all wounded and bloody as they are, be brought on again the next day to charge: but such as have once conceived a good sound fear of the enemy will never be got so much as to look him in the face. Such as are in immediate fear of losing their estates, of banishment, or of slavery, live in perpetual anguish, and lose all appetite and repose; whereas such as are actually poor, slaves and exiles, oft-times live as merrily as men in a better condition. And so, many people who, impatient of the perpetual alarms of fear, have hanged and drowned themselves, and thrown themselves from precipices, give us sufficiently to understand that it is still more importunate and insupportable than death itself.

The Greeks recognise another kind of fear, exceeding any we have spoken of yet,—a fear that surprises us without any visible cause, by an impulse from heaven; so that whole armies and nations have been struck with it. Such a one was that which brought so wonderful a desolation upon Carthage, where nothing was to be heard but voices and outcries of fear; where the inhabitants were seen to sally out of their houses as to an alarm, and there to charge, wound, and kill one another, as if they had been enemies come to surprise their city. All things were in disorder and fury, till with prayers and sacrifices they had appeased their gods. And this is that they call a panic terror.[1]

CHAPTER XVIII.

THAT MEN ARE NOT TO JUDGE OF OUR HAPPINESS TILL AFTER DEATH.

Scilicet ultima semper
Expectanda dies homini est, dicique beatus,
Ante obitum nemo supremaque funera debet.[2]

"Till man's last day is come, we should not dare
Of happiness to say what was his share:
Since of no man can it be truly said
That he is happy, 'till he first be dead."

EVERY school-boy knows the story of King Crœsus, to this purpose:—that, being taken prisoner by Cyrus, and by him condemned to die, as he was going to execution he cried out, "O Solon! Solon!" which being presently reported to Cyrus, and he sending to enquire of him what it meant, Crœsus gave him to understand that he now found the warning Solon had formerly given him, true to his cost; which was, "That men, however fortune may seem to smile upon them, could never be said to be happy 'till they had been seen to pass over the last day of their lives; by reason of the uncertainty and mutability of human things, which in an instant are subject to be totally changed into a quite contrary condition."[3] And therefore it was that Agesilaus made answer to one that was saying what a happy man the King of Persia was, to come so young to so mighty a kingdom, "True," said he, "but neither was Priam unhappy at his years."[4] In a short space of time kings of Macedon, successors to the mighty Alexander, have become joiners and scriveners at Rome; a tyrant of Sicily a pedant at Corinth; a conqueror of one half of the world, and general of innumerable armies, a miserable suppliant to the rascally officers of a king of Egypt! So much did the prolongation of five or six months of life cost the great and noble Pompey; and no longer since than our fathers' days, Lodovico Sforza, the tenth Duke of Milan, at whose name all Italy had so long trembled, was seen to die a wretched prisoner at Loches,[5] not till he had lived ten years in captivity, which was the worst part of his fortune. The fairest of all queens,[6] widow to the greatest King in Christendom, has she not just come to die by the hand of an executioner? Unworthy and barbarous cruelty! and a thousand more examples there are of the same kind; for it seems that, as storms and tempests have a spite against the proud and towering heights of our lofty castles, there are also spirits above that are envious of the grandeurs here below.

Usque adeò res humanas vis abdita quædam
Obterit, et pulchros fasces sævasque secures Proculcare, hac ludibrio sibi habere videtur![7]

"And hence we fancy unseen powers in those Whose force and will such strange confusion brings,
And spurns and overthrows our greatest kings."

And it should seem also that fortune sometimes lies in wait to surprise the last hour of our lives, to shew the power she has in a moment to overthrow what she has been so many years in building, making us cry out with Laberius, Nimirum hac die unâ plus vixi mihi quàm vivendum fuit:[8] "I have lived longer by this one day than I ought to have done." And in this sense the good advice of Solon may reasonably be taken; but he being a philosopher, with which sort of men the favours and disgraces of fortune stand for nothing, either to the making a man happy or unhappy, and with whom grandeur and power are mere accidents, almost equally indifferent, I am apt to think he had some further aim, and that his meaning was, that the very felicity of life itself, which depends upon the tranquillity and contentment of a well-descended spirit, and the resolution and assurance of a well-ordered soul, ought never to be attributed to any man till he has first been seen to play the last, and doubtless the hardest, act of his part, because there may be disguise and dissimulation in all the rest, where these fine philosophical discourses are only put on, or where accidents not touching us to the quick, give us leisure to maintain the same sober gravity; but in this last scene of death and ourselves there is no more counterfeiting, we must speak plain, and must discover what there is of pure and clean in the bottom.

Nam verse voces tum demum pectore ab imo
Ejiciuntur, et eripitur persona, manet res.[9]

"For then their words will with their thoughts concur,
And, all the mask pulled off, show what they were."

Wherefore, at this last, all the other actions of our life ought to be tried and sifted. 'Tis the master-day, 'tis the day that is judge of all the rest, "'tis the day," says one of the ancients, "that ought to judge of all my foregone years."[10] To death do I refer the proof of the fruit of all my studies. We shall then see whether my discourses came only from my mouth or from my heart. I have seen many, by their death, give a good or an ill repute to their whole life. Scipio, the father-in-law of Pompey the Great, in dying well, wiped away the ill opinion that, till then, every one had conceived of him.[1] Epaminondas being asked which of the three he had in greatest esteem, Chabrias, Iphicrates, or himself, "You must first see us die," said he, "before that question can be resolved:"[2] and, in truth, he would infinitely wrong that great man who would weigh him without the honour and grandeur of his end. God has ordered these things as it has best pleased him. But I have, in my time, seen three of the most execrable persons that ever I knew in all manner of abominable living, and the most infamous, who all died a very regular death, and, in all circumstances, composed even to perfection. There are brave and fortunate deaths: I have seen death cut the thread of the progress of a prodigious advancement, and in the flower of its increase, of a certain person,[3] with so glorious an end that, in my opinion, his ambitious and generous designs had nothing in them so high and great as was their interruption; and he arrived, without completing his course, at the place to which his ambition pretended, with greater glory and grandeur than he could himself have either hoped or desired, and anticipated by his fall the name and power to which he had aspired by perfecting his career. In the judgment I make of another man's life, I always observe how he carried himself at its close; and the principal concern I have for my own is that I may die handsomely, that is, patiently and without noise.

CHAPTER XIX.

THAT TO STUDY PHILOSOPHY IS TO LEARN TO DIE.

What is the study of philosophy.

CICERO says that to study philosophy is nothing but to prepare a man's self to die.[4] The reason of which is because study and contemplation do, in some sort, withdraw from us, and deprive us of our soul, and employ it separately from the body, which is a kind of discipline of, and a resemblance of, death, or else because all the wisdom and reasoning in the world does, in the end, conclude in this point, to teach us not to fear to die. And, to say the truth, either our reason does grossly abuse us, or it ought to have no other aim but our contentment only, nor to endeavour any thing but, in sum, to make us live well, and, as the Holy Scripture says,[5] at our ease. All the opinions of the world agree in this, that pleasure is our end, though we make use of divers means to attain unto it; they would all of them otherwise be rejected at the first motion; for who would give ear to him that should propose affliction and misery for his end? The controversies and disputes of the philosophical sects upon this point are merely verbal; Transcurramus solertissimas nugas.[6] "Let us skip over those learned trifles." There is more in them of opposition and obstinacy than is consistent with so sacred a profession: but what kind of person soever man takes upon him to personate, he ever mixes his own part with it. Let the philosophers say what they will, the main thing at which we all aim, even in virtue itself, is pleasure. It pleases me to rattle in their ears this word, which they so nauseate to hear; and, if it signify some supreme pleasure and excessive delight, it is more due to the assistance of virtue than to any other assistance whatever. This delight for being more gay, more sinewy, more robust, and more manly, is only more seriously voluptuous, and we ought to give it the name of pleasure; as that which is more benign, gentle, and natural, and not that of vigour, from which we have derived it.

Pleasure the universal aim.

The other more mean and sensual part of pleasure, if it could deserve this fair name, it ought to be upon the account of concurrence, and not of privilege; I find it less exempt from traverses and inconveniences than virtue itself; and, besides that, the enjoyment is more momentary, fluid, and frail; it has its watchings, fasts, and labours, even to sweat and blood; and, moreover, has, particular to itself, so many several sorts of sharp and wounding passions, and so stupid a satiety attending it, as are equal to the severest penance. And we much mistake to think that difficulties serve it for a spur and a seasoning to its sweetness, as in nature, one contrary is quickened by another; and to say, when we come to virtue, that like consequences and difficulties overwhelm and render it austere and inaccessible; whereas, much more aptly than in voluptuousness, they ennoble, sharpen, and heighten the perfect and divine pleasure they procure us. He renders himself unworthy of it who will counterpoise

[1] This remark is taken, if I mistake not, from Seneca. It is a pretty long passage, but so curious a one that I cannot help transcribing it here. Seneca, desirous to fortify his friend against the terrors of death, said to him, in the first place, "I should prevail on you with more ease were I to show that not only heroes have despised the moment of the soul's departure out of the body, but that even dastards have, in this matter, equalled those of the greatest fortitude of mind." And, immediately after, he adds, "Even like that Scipio, the father-in-law of Cn. Pompey, who, being driven by contrary winds to the coast of Africa, when he saw his ship detained by the enemy, stabbed himself with his own sword; and, to those who asked him 'where the General was,' said, 'The General is well.' This word equalled him to his superiors, and did not suffer the glory fatal to the Scipios, in Africa, to be interrupted. It was a great task to conquer Carthage, but a harder to conquer death." Seneca, Epist. 24.

[3] Montaigne speaks here of his friend Boetius, at whose death he was present, as appears by a speech which Montaigne caused to be printed at Paris, in 1571, wherein he mentions the most remarkable particulars of Boetius's sickness and death. As this speech does honour to both these eminent friends, and is become very scarce, I shall insert it hereafter.

[4] Tuscul. Quæs. i. 31. The passage is a translation from the Phædo of Plato.

his expense with the fruit, and does neither understand the blessing, nor how to use it. Those who preach to us that the quest of it is craggy, difficult, and painful, but the fruition pleasant and grateful, what do they mean by that, but to tell us that it is always unpleasing? What human means ever attained it? the most perfect have been forced to content themselves to aspire unto it, and to approach it only without ever possessing it. But they are deceived, for of all the pleasures we know the very pursuit is pleasant. The attempt ever relishes of the quality of the thing to which it is directed, for it is a good part of, and consubstantial with, the effect. The felicity and beatitude that glitters in virtue, shines throughout all her avenues and ways, even to the first entry, and utmost pale and limits.

The contempt of death one of the principal benefits of virtue.

Now, of all the benefits that virtue confers upon us, the contempt of death is one of the greatest, as the means that accommodates human life with a soft and easy tranquillity, and gives us a pure and pleasant taste of living, without which all other pleasures would be extinct; which is the reason why all the rules of philosophy centre and concur in this one article.[1] And although they all, in like manner, with one consent, endeavour to teach us also to despise grief, poverty, and the other accidents, to which human life, by its own nature and constitution, is subjected, it is not, nevertheless, with the same earnestness, as well by reason these accidents are not so certain, the greater part of mankind passing over their whole lives without ever knowing what poverty is; and some without sorrow or sickness, as Xenophilus, the musician, who lived a hundred and six years in a perfect and continual health; as also, because at the worst, death can, whenever we please, cut short and put an end to all of these inconveniences. But as to death it is inevitable.

> Omnes eodem cogimur; omnium
> Versata urna; serius, ocyus
> Sors exitura, et nos in æternum
> Exilium impositura cymbæ.[2]
>
> "To the same fate we all must yield in turn,
> Sooner or later, all must to the urn:
> When Charon calls abroad, we must not stay,
> But to eternal exile sail away."

And consequently, if it frights us, 'tis a perpetual torment, and for which there is no consolation nor redress. There is no way by which we can possibly avoid it; it commands all points of the compass: we may continually turn our heads this way and that, and pry about as in a suspected country; quæ quasi saxum Tantalo, semper impendet;[3] "But it ever, like Tantalus's stone, hangs over us." Our courts of justice often send back condemned criminals to be executed upon the place where the fact was committed, but carry them to all the fine houses by the way and give them the best entertainment they can.

> —— non Siculæ dapes
> Dulcem elaborabunt saporem;
> Non avium citharæque cantus
> Somnum reducent.[4]
>
> "Choicest Sicilian dainties cannot please,
> Nor yet of birds or harps the harmonies
> Once charm asleep, or close their watchful eyes."

Do you think they could relish it? And that the fatal end of their journey being continually before their eyes would not alter and deprave their palate from all relish of these fine things?

> Audit iter numeratque dies, spatioque viarum
> Metitur vitam, torquetur peste futurâ.[5]
>
> "He time and space computes by length of ways,
> Sums up the number of his few sad days;
> And his sad thoughts, full of his fatal doom,
> Have room for nothing but the blow to come."

The end of our race is death, 'tis the necessary object of our aim: if it frights us, how is it possible to advance a step without a fit of ague? The remedy the vulgar use is not to think on't: but from what brutish stupidity can they derive so gross a blindness? He must needs bridle the ass by the tail:

> Qui capite ipse suo instituit vestigia retro.
>
> "He who the order of his steps has laid
> To light and natural motion retrograde."

'Tis no wonder if he be often trapped in the pitfall. They used to fright people with the very mention of death, and most cross themselves as if it were the name of the devil; and because the making a man's will is in reference to dying, not a man will be persuaded to take a pen in hand, to that purpose, till the physician has passed sentence upon him and totally given him over; and then, betwixt grief and terror, God knows in how fit a condition of understanding he is to do it.

The Romans, by reason that this poor syllable death was observed to be so harsh to the ears of the people, and the sound so ominous, found out a way to soften and spin it out by a periphrasis, and instead of pronouncing bluntly "such a one is dead," to say "such a one has lived," or, "such a one has ceased to live." For, provided there was any mention of life in the case, though 'twas past, it carried yet some sound of consolation. And from them it is that we have borrowed our expression of "the late Monsieur such a one." Peradventure, as the saying is, the term is worth the money.[7] I was born betwixt eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, the last of February, 1533, according to our present computation, beginning the year the first of January,[1] and it is now just fifteen days since I was complete nine and thirty years old; I make account to live, at least, as many more. In the mean time, to trouble a man's self with the thought of a thing so far off, is a senseless foolery. But, after all, young and old die after the very same manner, and no one departs out of life otherwise than as though he had just before entered into it; neither is any so old and decrepid, who has heard of Methusalem, that does not think he has yet another twenty years of constitution good at least. Fool that thou art, who has assured unto thee the term of thy life? Thou dependest upon physicians, and their old wives' tales, but rather consult fact and experience, and the fragility of human nature. According to the common course of things, 'tis long since that thou livest by extraordinary favour. Thou hast already out-lived the ordinary term of life, and, to convince thyself that it is so, reckon up thy acquaintance, how many more have died before they arrived at thy age, than have attained unto it; and of those who have ennobled their lives by their renown, take but an account, and I dare lay a wager thou wilt find more who have died before, than after, five and thirty years of age. It is full both of reason and piety too to take the example of the human existence of Jesus Christ himself, who ended his life at three and thirty years. The greatest man that ever was, who was no more than man, Alexander, died also at the same age. How many several ways has death to surprise us!

> Quid quisque vitet, nunquam homini satis.
> Cautum est in horas.[2]
>
> "Man fain would shun, but 'tis not in his power
> T' evade the dangers of each threat'ning hour."

To omit fevers and pleurisies, who would ever have imagined that a Duke of Brittany should be pressed to death in a crowd, as that Duke was at the entry of Pope Clement, my neighbour, into Lyons?[3] Have we not seen one of our Kings killed at a tilting;[4] and did not one of his ancestors die by the justle of a hog?[5] Æschylus, being threatened with the fall of a house, got nothing by going into the fields to avoid that danger, for there he was knocked on the head by a tortoise falling out of an eagle's talons.[6] Another was choaked with a grape-stone.[7] An Emperor was killed with the scratch of a comb, in combing his head; Æmilius Lepidus with a stumble at his own threshold;[8] Aufidius, with a justle, against the door, as he entered the council-chamber. And, in the very embrace of women, Cornelius Gallus, the Prætor; Tigillinus, captain of the watch at Rome; Ludovico, son of Guido de Gonzaga, Marquis of Mantua; and a still worse example, Speusippus, a platonick philosopher;[9] and one of our Popes. The poor Judge Bibius, in the eight days' reprieve he had given a criminal, was himself caught hold of, his own reprieve of life being expired.[10] And Caius Julius, the physician, while anointing the eyes of a patient, had death close his own;[11] and if I may bring in an example of my own blood, a brother of mine, Captain St. Martin, a young man of three and twenty years old, who had already given sufficient testimony of his valour, playing a match at tennis, received a blow of a ball a little above his right ear, which, though it was without any manner or sign of wound, or depression of the skull, and though he took no great notice of it, nor so much as sat down to repose himself, he nevertheless died within five or six hours after, of an apoplexy occasioned by that blow.

Which so frequent and common examples passing every day before our eyes, how is it possible a man should disengage himself from the thought of death; or avoid fancying that it has us every moment by the collar? What matter is it, you will say, which way it comes to pass, provided a man does not terrify himself with the expectation? For my part, I am of this mind, and by whatever means one could shield ones-self from the blow, were it under a calf's skin, I am not the man to shrink from it; for all I want is to pass my time pleasantly and at my ease, and the recreations that most contribute to it I take hold of; as to the rest, as little glorious and exemplary as you would desire.

> Prætulerim * * * delirus inersque videri,
> Dum mea delectent mala me, vel denique fallant,

> "As fool, or sluggard, let me censur'd be.
> Whilst either fault does please or cozen me,
> Rather than be thought wise, and feel the smart
> Of a perpetual aching anxious heart."

But 'tis folly to think of doing any thing that way. People go and come, and dance and gad about, and not a word of death. All this is very fine while it lasts, but when death does come either to themselves, or their wives, or their children, or their friends, surprising them at unawares, unprepared, then what torments, what outcries, what madness and despair overwhelm them! Did you ever see any thing so subdued, so changed, and so confounded? A man must, therefore, make himself more early ready for it; and this brutish negligence, even could it lodge in the brain of any man of sense, which I think utterly impossible, sells us its merchandize too dear. Were it an enemy that could be avoided, I would then advise to borrow arms, even of cowardice itself, to that effect. But seeing it is not, and that it will catch you as well flying and playing the poltroon, as standing to it, like a man of honour:

Mors et fugacem persequitur virum,
Nec parcit imbellis juventæ
Poplitibus timidoque tergo.[1]

"No speed of foot can rob death of his prize,
He cuts the hamstrings of the man that flies;
Nor spares the fearful stripling's back who starts
To run beyond the reach of 's mortal darts."

And seeing that no temper of arms is of proof to secure us,—

Ille licet ferro, cautus se condat et ære,
Mors tamen inclusum protrahet inde caput;[2]

"Shield thee with steel or brass, advised by dread, Death from the casque will pull thy cautious head;"

let us learn bravely to stand our ground and fight him. And, to begin to deprive him of the greatest advantage he has over us, let us take a way quite contrary to the common course. Let us disarm him of his strangeness; let us converse and be familiar with him, and have nothing so frequent in our thoughts as death: let us, upon all occasions, represent him in all his most dreadful shapes to our imagination. At the stumbling of a horse, at the falling of a tile, at the least prick of a pin, let us presently consider, and say to ourselves, "Well, and what if it had been death itself?" And thereupon let us encourage and fortify ourselves: let us evermore, amidst our jollity and feasting, keep the remembrance of our frail condition before our eyes, never suffering ourselves to be so far transported with our delights but that we have some intervals of reflecting upon and considering how many several ways this jollity of ours tends to death, and with how many traps it threatens us. The Egyptians were wont to do after this manner, who, in the height of their feasting and mirth, caused a dried skeleton of a man to be brought into the room to serve for a memento to their guests.[3]

Omnem crede diem tibi diluxisse supremum,
Grata superveniet, quæ non sperabitur, hora.[4]

"Think every day, soon as the day is past,
Of thy life's date that thou hast lived the last;
The next day's joyful light thine eyes shall see,
As unexpected, will more welcome be."

Where death waits for us is uncertain; let us every where look for him. The premeditation of death is the premeditation of liberty; he who has learnt to die has forgot what it is to be a slave. There is nothing of evil in life for him who rightly comprehends that the loss of life is no evil; to know how to die delivers us from all subjection and constraint. Paulus Æmilius answered him whom the miserable King of Macedon, his prisoner, sent to intreat him that he would not lead him in his triumph, "Let him make that request to himself."[5]

In truth, in all things, if nature do not help a little, it is very hard for art and industry to perform anything to purpose. I am, in my own nature, not melancholy, but thoughtful; and there is nothing I have more continually entertained myself withal than the imaginations of death, even in the gayest and most wanton time of my life;—

Jucundum cùm ætas florida ver ageret.[6]

"When that my youth rolled on in pleasant spring."

In the company of ladies, and in the height of mirth, some have perhaps thought me possessed with some jealousy, or meditating upon the uncertainty of some imagined hope, whilst I was only entertaining myself with the remembrance of some one surprised a few days before with a burning fever, of which he died, returning from an entertainment like this, with his head full of idle fancies of love and jollity, as mine was then, and that, for aught I knew, the same destiny was attending me.

Jam fuerit, neque post unquam revocare licebit.[7]

"He who of late a being had 'mongst men,
Is gone, and ne'er to be recalled again."

Yet did not this thought wrinkle my forehead any more than any other. No doubt it is impossible but we must feel a sting in such imaginations as these, at first; but with often revolving them in a man's mind, and having them frequent in our thoughts, they at last become so familiar as to be no trouble at all. Otherwise I, for my part, should be in a perpetual fright and frenzy; for never man was so distrustful of his life, never man so indifferent for its duration. Neither health, which I have hitherto ever enjoyed very strong and vigorous, and very seldom interrupted, prolongs, nor sickness contracts, my hopes. Every minute methinks 'tis about to escape me; and it eternally runs in my mind that what may be done to-morrow may be done to-day. Hazards and dangers do in truth little or nothing hasten our end; and if we consider how many more remain and hang over our heads beside the misfortune that immediately threatens us, we shall find that the sound and the sick, those that are abroad at sea and those that sit by the fire; those that are in the wars, and those that sit idle at home, are the one as near it as the other: Nemo altero fragilior est, nemo in crastinum sui certior.[8] "No man is more frail than another, nor more certain of the morrow. For anything I have to do before I die, the longest leisure would appear too short, were it but an hour's business I had to do.

A friend of mine, the other day, turning over my table-book, found in it a memorandum of something I would have done after my decease; whereupon I told him, as was really true, that, though I was no more than a league's distance from my own house, and merry and well, yet when that thing came into my head I made haste to write it down there, because I was not certain to live till I came home. As a man that am eternally brooding over my own thoughts, and who confine them to my own particular concerns, I am at all hours as well prepared as I am ever like to be; and death, whenever he shall come, can bring nothing along with him I did not expect long before. We should always (as near as we can) be booted and spurred, and ready to go, and, above all things, take care at that time to have no business with any one but ones-self.

Quid brevi fortes jaculamur ævo
Multa?[1]

"Why cut'st thou out such mighty work, vain man?
Whose life's short date 's comprised in one poor span?"

For we shall then find work enough to do, without any need of addition. One complains, more than of death, that he is thereby prevented of a glorious victory; another that he must die before he has married his daughter, or settled and educated his children; a third seems only troubled that he must lose the society of his wife; a fourth the conversation of his son, as the principal concerns of his being. For my part I am, thanks be to God, at this instant in such a condition that I am ready to dislodge, whenever it shall please him, without any manner of regret. I disengage myself throughout from all worldly relations: my leave is soon taken of all but myself. Never did any one prepare to bid adieu to the world more absolutely and purely, and to shake hands with all manner of interest in it, than I expect to do. The deadest deaths are the best.[2]

—— miser! O miser! (aiunt) omnia ademit
Una dies infesta mihi tot præmia vitæ.[3]

"Wretch that I am (they cry) one fatal day
So many joys of life has snatched away."

And the builder,

—— manent (says he) opera interrupta, minæque
Murorum ingentes, aequataque machina cœlo.[4]

"The mounds, the works, the walls neglected lie, Short of their promised height, that seemed to threat the sky."

A man must design nothing that will require so much time to the finishing, or at least with no such passionate desire to see it brought to a conclusion. We are born to action.

Cùm moriar, medium solvar et inter opus.[5]

"When death shall come, he me will find Engaged on something I've design'd."

I would always have a man to be doing, and as much as in him lies, to extend and spin out the offices of life; and then let death take me planting cabbages, but without any careful thought of him, and much less of my garden's not being finished. I saw one die, who, at his last gasp, seemed to be concerned at nothing so much as that destiny was about to cut the thread of a history he was then compiling, when he was got no farther than the fifteenth or sixteenth of our kings.

Illud in his rebus non addunt, nec tibi earum
Jam desiderium rerum, super insidet una.[6]

"They tell us not, that, dying, we've no more
The same desire of things as heretofore."

We should discharge ourselves from these vulgar and hurtful humours and concerns. To this purpose it was that men first put the places of sepulture, the dormitories of the dead, near adjoining to the churches, and in the most frequented places of the city, to accustom (says Lycurgus) the common people, women, and children, that they should not be startled at the sight of a dead corpse; and to the end that the continual sight of bones, graves, monuments, and funeral obsequies, should keep us in mind of our frail condition.[7]

Quinetiam exhilarare viris convivia cæde
Mos olim, et miscere epulis spectacula dira
Certantum ferro, sæpè et super ipsa cadentum
Pocula, respersis non parco sanguine mensis.[8]

"'Twas therefore that the ancients at their feasts
With tragic slaughter used to treat their guests;
Making their fencers, with their utmost spite,
Skill, force, and fury in their presence fight;
Till streams of blood o'erflow'd the spacious hall,
Crims'ning their tables, drinking-cups, and all."

And as the Egyptians after their feasts were wont to present the company with a great image of death, by one that cried out to them, "Drink and be merry, for such shalt thou be when thou art dead;" so it is my custom to have death not only in my imagination, but continually in my mouth. Neither is there any thing of which I am so inquisitive, and delight to inform myself, as the manner of men's deaths, their words, looks, and gestures; nor any places in history I am so intent upon; and it is manifest enough, by my crowding in examples of this kind, that I have a particular fancy for that subject. If I were a writer of books, I would compile a register, with a comment, of the various deaths of men; and it

1 Horace, Od. ii. 16, 17.

2 Death is here considered as the introduction and actual passage to a state of insensibility which puts a period to our life. The more silently and rapidly we arrive to that state the less ought the passage to terrify us. This comes up very near to the import of that bold and enigmatical expression of Montaigne, viz. "That the deadest deaths are the best."

could not but be useful, for he who should teach men to die would at the same time teach them to live. Dicearchus made one, to which he gave some such title; but it was designed for another and less profitable end.[1] Peradventure some one may object, and say that the pain and terror of dying indeed does so infinitely exceed all manner of imagination that the best fencer will be quite out of his play when it comes to the push. But, let them say what they will, to premeditate it is doubtless a very great advantage; and besides, is it nothing to get so far, at least, without any visible disturbance or alteration? But moreover Nature herself does assist and encourage us. If the death be sudden and violent, we have not leisure to fear; if otherwise, I find that as I engage further in my disease, I naturally enter into a certain loathing and disdain of life. I find I have much more ado to digest this resolution of dying when I am well in health than when sick, languishing of a fever; and by how much I have less to do with the comforts of life, I even begin to lose the relish and pleasure of them, and by so much I look upon death with less terror; which makes me hope that the further I remove from the first, and the nearer I approach to the latter, I shall sooner strike a bargain, and with less unwillingness exchange the one for the other. And, as I have experienced in other occurrences what Cæsar says, "That things often appear greater to us at a distance than near at hand,"[2] I have found that, being well, I have had diseases in much greater horror than when really afflicted with them. The vigour wherein I now am, and the jollity and delight wherein I now live, make the contrary estate appear in so great a disproportion to my present condition, that by imagination I magnify and make those inconveniences twice greater than they are, and apprehend them to be much more troublesome than I find them really to be, when they lie the most heavy upon me, and I hope to find death the same.

It is of great advantage to think of death beforehand.

Let us but observe in the ordinary changes and declinations our constitutions daily suffer, how nature deprives us of all sight and sense of our bodily decay. What remains to an old man of the vigour of his youth and better days?

> Heu! senibus vitæ portio quanta manet![3]
> "Alas! how small a part of life's short stage > Remains to travellers advanced in age!"

Cæsar, to an old weather-beaten soldier of his guards, who came to ask him leave that he might kill himself, taking notice of his withered body and decrepid motion, pleasantly answered, "Thou fanciest, then, that thou art yet alive!"[4] Should a man fall into the aches and impotencies of age from a sprightly and vigorous youth, on the sudden, I do not think humanity capable of enduring such a change. But nature leading us by the hand an easy, and, as it were, an insensible pace, little by little, step by step, conducts us gently to that miserable condition, and by that means makes it familiar to us, so that we perceive not, nor are sensible of the stroke then, when our youth dies in us, though it be really a harder death than the final dissolution of a languishing body, which is only the death of old age; forasmuch as the fall is not so great from an uneasy being to none at all, as it is from a sprightly and florid being to one that is unwieldy and painful. The body, when bowed beyond its natural spring of strength, has less force either to rise with, or support, a burthen; and it is with the soul the same, and therefore it is that we are to raise her up firm and erect against the power of this adversary. For as it is impossible she should ever be at rest or at peace within herself whilst she stands in fear of it, so if she once can assure herself, she may boast (which is a thing, as it were, above human condition) that it is impossible that disquiet, anxiety, or fear, or any other disturbance, should inhabit or have any place in her.

> Non vultus instantis tyranni
> Mente quatit solidâ: neque Auster
> Dux inquieti turbidus Adriæ,
> Nec fulminantis magna Jovis manus.[5]
>
> "A soul well settled is not to be shook
> With an incensed tyrant's threat'ning look;
> Nor can loud Auster once that heart dismay,
> The ruffling Prince of stormy Adria;
> Nor yet th' uplifted hand of mighty Jove,
> Though charg'd with thunder, such a temper move."

She is then become sovereign of all her lusts and passions, mistress of necessity, shame, poverty, and all the other injuries of fortune. Let us therefore, as many of us as can, get this advantage, which is the true and sovereign liberty here on earth, and that fortifies us wherewithal to defy violence and injustice, and to contemn prisons and chains.

> —— in manicis et
> Compedibus, sævo te sub custode tenebo.
> Ipse Deus, simul atque volam, me solvet. Opinor,
> Hoc sentit: moriar; Mors ultima linea rerum est.[6]
>
> "'With bolts and chains I'll load thy hands and feet,
> And to a surly keeper thee commit.'—
> But let him show his worst of cruelty,
> The gods propitious soon will set me free;
> By death release me, that full comfort brings,
> For death 's the utmost term of human things."

Our very religion itself has no surer human foundation than the contempt of death. Not only the argument of reason invites us to it,—for why should we fear to lose a thing which, being lost, can never be missed or lamented?—but, also, seeing that we are threatened by so many sorts of deaths, is it not infinitely worse eternally to fear them all than once to undergo one of them? And what matter is it when it shall happen, since it is inevitable once? To him that told Socrates, "The thirty tyrants have sentenced thee to death"—"And nature them," said he.[1] What a ridiculous thing it is to trouble and afflict ourselves about taking the only step that is to deliver us from all misery and trouble! As our birth brought us the birth of all things, so in our death is the death of all things included. And therefore to lament and take on that we shall not be alive a hundred years hence is the same folly as to be sorry we were not alive a hundred years ago. Death is the beginning of another life. So did we weep, and so much it cost us to enter into this, and so did we put off our former veil in entering into it. Nothing can be grievous that is but once; and is it reasonable so long to fear a thing that will so soon be dispatched? A long life and a short are by death made all one; for there is no long nor short to things that are no more. Aristotle tells us that there are certain little beasts upon the banks of the river Hypanis that never live above a day: they which die at eight of the clock in the morning die in their youth, and those that die at five in the evening in their extremest age.[2] Which of us would not laugh to see this moment of continuance put into the consideration of weal or woe? Yet the most, and the least of ours, in comparison of eternity, or even to the duration of mountains, rivers, stars, trees, nay, of some animals, is no less ridiculous.[3]

The contempt of death a certain foundation of religion.

Death a part of the order of the universe.

But Nature compels us to it: "Go out of this world," says she, "as you entered it; the same passage you made from death to life, without passion or fear, the same, after the same manner, repeat from life to death. Your death is a part of the order of the universe, 'tis a part of the life of the world.

"Every day that you live you purloin from life, you live at the expensé of life itself: the perpetual work of your whole life is but to lay the foundation of death; you are in death whilst you live, because you still are after death when you are no more alive. Or if you had rather have it so, you are dead after life, but dying all the while you live; and death handles the dying more rudely, and more feelingly, and essentially than the dead. If you have made your profit of life you have had enough of it, go your way satisfied.

Do we do thee any wrong? Is it for thee to govern us, or for us to dispose of thee? Though peradventure thy age may not be accomplished, yet thy life is. A man of low stature is a whole man as well as a giant; neither men nor their lives are measured by the ell. Chiron refused to be immortal, when he was acquainted with the conditions under which he was to enjoy it, by the god of time itself and its duration, his father Saturn. Do but seriously consider how much more insupportable an immortal and painful life would be to man than what I have already designed him.[10] If you had not death to ease you of your pains and cares, you would eternally curse me for having deprived you of the benefit of dying. I have, 'tis true, mixed a little bitterness in it, to the end that, seeing of what conveniency and use it is, you might not too greedily and indiscreetly seek and embrace it: and that you might be so established in this moderation, as neither to nauseate life, nor have any antipathy for dying, which I have decreed you shall once do, I have tempered the one and the other betwixt pleasure and pain. the most eminent of all your sages, that to live and die were indifferent; which made him very wisely answer him who asked him, "Why then did he not die?" "Because," said he, "it is indifferent."[1] The elements of water, earth, fire, and air, and the other parts of this creation of mine, are no more the instruments of thy life than they are of thy death. Why dost thou fear thy last day? it contributes no more to thy dissolution than every one of the rest. The last step is not the cause of lassitude; it does but confess it. Every day travels towards death; the last only arrives at it."[2] These are the good lessons our Mother Nature teaches.

Why death appears less dreadful on the field of battle than at home.

I have often considered with myself whence it should proceed that in war the image of death, whether we look upon it as to our own particular danger or that of another, should without comparison appear less dreadful than at home in our own houses (for if it were not so, it would be an army of whining milksops); and that being still in all places the same, there should be, notwithstanding, much more assurance in peasants and the meaner sort of people than in others of better quality and education; and I do verily believe that it is those terrible ceremonies and preparations wherewith we set it out that more terrify us than the thing itself. An entirely new way of living, the cries of mothers, wives, and children, the visits of astonished and afflicted friends, the attendance of pale and blubbering servants, a dark room set round with burning tapers, our beds environed with physicians and divines; in short, nothing but ghostliness and horror round about us, render it so formidable that a man almost fancies himself dead and buried already. Children are afraid even of those they love best, and are best acquainted with, when disguised in a vizor, and so are we: the vizor must be removed as well from things as persons;[3] which being taken away, we shall find nothing underneath but the very same death that a mean servant or a poor chamber-maid died a day or two ago, without any manner of apprehension or concern. Happy therefore is the death that deprives us of the leisure for such grand preparations!

CHAPTER XX.

OF THE FORCE OF IMAGINATION.

Fortis imaginatio generat casum. "A strong imagination creates what it imagines," say the schoolmen. I am one of those who are most sensible of the power of imagination: every one is jostled, but some are quite overthrown by it. It has a very great impression upon me; and I make it my business to avoid, wanting force to resist it. I could live by the sole help of healthful and jolly company. The very sight of another's pain greatly pains me; and I often go entirely into the feelings of a third person, and share with him in his torment. A perpetual cough in another tickles my lungs and throat. I more unwillingly visit the sick, in whom I am by duty interested, than those I care not for, and to whom I am less bound. I take possession of the disease I look at, and do not at all wonder that fancy should give fevers, and sometimes kill such as allow of too much scope and are too willing to entertain it. Simon Thomas was a great physician of his time; and I remember that, happening one day at Thoulouse to meet him at a rich old fellow's house, who was troubled with bad lungs, and discoursing with his patient about the method of his cure, he told him that one thing which would be very conducing to it was to give me such occasion to be pleased with his company that I might come often to see him, by which means, and by fixing his eyes upon the freshness of my complexion, and his imagination upon the sprightliness and vigour that glowed in my youth, and possessing all his senses with the flourishing state wherein I then was, his habit of body might, peradventure, be amended; but he forgot to say that mine at the same time might be made worse. Gallus Vibius so long cudgelled his brains to find out the essence and motions of madness that in the end he went quite out of his wits, and to such a degree that he could never after recover his judgment; and he might brag that he was become mad by too much wisdom.[4] Some there are who through fear anticipate the hangman; like him whose eyes being unbound to have his pardon read to him, was found dead upon the scaffold by the stroke of imagination. We start, tremble, turn pale, and blush, as we are variously moved by imagination; and being covered over head and ears in bed, feel our bodies so agitated with its power as even sometimes to expire. And boiling youth, when fast asleep, grows so warm with fancy, as in a dream to satisfy its amorous desires:

Imagination occasions diseases and death.

[4] Seneca, the Rhetorician, from whom Montaigne must have taken this story, does not say that Gallus Vibius lost his reason by endeavouring to comprehend the essence of madness, but by too studious an application to imitate its motions. As this Gallus was a rhetorician by profession, he imagined that the transports of madness, well represented in dialogue, would charm his audience; and took so much pains to play the madman in jest, that he became so in earnest. He is the only man I ever knew (says Seneca) that became mad, not by accident, but by an act of judgment.—Controvers. ix. 2.

that had none when he went to bed, yet what befel Cippus, King of Italy, is very memorable; who having one day been a very delighted spectator of a bull-baiting, and having all the night dreamt that he had horns on his head, did, by the force of imagination, really cause them to grow there.[1] Passion made the son of Crœsus to speak, who was born dumb, thus supplying him with that which Nature had denied him.[2] And Antiochus fell into a fever, inflamed with the beauty of Stratonice, too deeply imprinted in his soul.[3] Pliny pretends to have seen Lucius Cossitius, who from a woman was turned into a man upon her very wedding-day.[4] Pontanus and others report the like metamorphoses to have happened in these later days in Italy; and through the vehement desire of him and his mother,

Vota puer solvit, quæ fœmina voverat Iphis.[5]

"Iphis, a boy, the vow defray'd
That he had promis'd when a maid."

Myself passing by Vitry le Francois,[6] a town in Champagne, saw a man the Bishop of Soissons had in confirmation, called Germain, whom all the inhabitants of the place had known and seen to be a girl till two and twenty years of age, by the name of Mary. He was, at the time of my being there, very full of beard, old, and not married, and told us that, in straining himself in a leap, his virile appurtenances came out; and the maids of that place have to this day a song wherein they advise one another not to take too great strides for fear of being turned into men, as Mary Germain was. It were no great wonder if this sort of accident frequently happened; for if imagination have any power in such things, it is so continually and vigorously bent upon this subject that, to the end it may not so often relapse into the same thought and violence of desire, it were better, once for all, to give the wenches the thing they long for.

Some stick not to attribute the scars of King Dagobert and St. Francis to the force of imagination; and it is said, that by it bodies will sometimes be moved from their places; and Celsus tells us of a priest whose soul would sometimes be ravished into such an ecstacy that the body would, for a long time, remain without sense or respiration. St. Augustine makes mention of another,[7] who, upon the hearing of any lamentable or doleful cries, would presently fall into a swoon, and be so far out of himself that it was in vain to call, halloo in his ears, pinch, or burn him, till he voluntarily came to himself; and then he would say that he had heard voices but, as it were, afar off, and felt when they pinched and burned him. And that this was no obstinate dissimulation, in defiance of his sense of feeling, was manifest from this, that all the while he had neither pulse nor breathing.

'Tis very probable that visions, enchantments, and all extraordinary effects of that nature, derive their credit principally from the power of imagination, working as they do, and making their chiefest impression upon vulgar and easy souls, whose belief is so full as to think they see what they do not.

Why such credit is given to visions, enchantments, &c.

I am not satisfied, and make a very great question, whether those pleasant marriage locks or impediments, with which this age of ours is so fettered that there is hardly anything else talked of, are not merely the impressions of apprehension and fear; for I know, by experience, in the case of a particular friend of mine, one for whom I can answer as for myself, and a man that cannot possibly fall under any manner of suspicion of insufficiency, and as little of being enchanted, who having heard a companion of his make a relation of an unusual disability that surprised him at a very unseasonable time, being afterwards himself engaged upon the same occasion, the horror of that story on a sudden so strangely possessed his imagination that he ran the same fortune the other had done; and from that time forward (the scurvy remembrance of his disaster running in his mind, and tyrannizing over him,) was extremely subject to relapse into the same misfortune He found some remedy, however, for this inconvenience, by himself frankly confessing and declaring before-hand to the lady with whom he was to have to do, the subjection he lay under, and the infirmity he was victim to, by which means the agitation of his soul was in some sort appeased; and knowing that now some such misbehaviour was expected from him, the obligation he felt under grew less, and weighed less upon his imagination; and when he had an opportunity at his leisure, at such times as he could be in no such apprehension (his thoughts being then disengaged and free, and his body being in its true and natural estate,) by causing this to be communicated to the knowledge of others, he was at last totally freed from that vexatious infirmity. After a man has once done a woman right, he is never Whence it is that lovers sometimes find themselves unable to perform their pleasant labours.

[1] Pliny, xi. 45, who, however, puts this story in the same class with that of Actæon, and supposes both to be fabulous. Valerius Maximus, v. 6, gives this Cyppus, or Cippus, the title of Prætor, and says that as he departed from Rome, in the habit of a general, the accident which Montaigne speaks of here happening to him, the diviners declared that Cyppus would be king if he returned to Rome; whereupon he voluntarily condemned himself to perpetual exile, in order to prevent it. This explains why Montaigne calls him King of Italy.

after in danger of misbehaving himself with that person, unless upon the account of some physical weakness. Neither is this disaster to be feared, but in adventures where the soul is extended beyond measure with desire or respect, and especially where one's opportunity happens in a sudden and pressing manner; in those cases, there is no means for a man always to keep himself from a scrape of this sort. And yet I have known some, to whom it has been of service to come to their mistress, with their heat half sated elsewhere, and having abated thus the ardour of their fury; and others, who when old, find themselves less impotent by being less able; and again, I knew one, who found an advantage in being assured by a friend of his that he had a counter battery of charms that would defend him from this disgrace. The story itself is not much amiss, and therefore you shall have it.

A curious remedy for imaginary insufficiency in love.

A Count of a very great family, and with whom I was very familiarly intimate, married a very fair lady, who had formerly been pretended to and importunately courted by one who was present at the wedding: all his friends, especially an old lady, his kinswoman, who had the ordering of the solemnity, and in whose house it was kept, were in great fear lest his rival should in revenge, offer foul play, and procure some of these kind of sorceries, to put a trick upon him; which fear the old lady communicated to me, who, to comfort her, bid her not trouble herself, but rely upon my care to prevent or frustrate any such designs. Now I had by chance about me a certain flat plate of gold, whereon were graven some cœlestial figures, supposed to be good against head-ache, when applied to the suture; and which, that it might the better remain firm on its place, was sowed to a ribbon, to be tied under the chin. A piece of quackery, a thing cousin-german to that of which I am speaking, and which was by Jaques Pelletier, who lived in my house, presented to me for a singular rarity, and a thing of sovereign virtue. I had a fancy to make some use of this knack, and therefore privately told the Count that he might possibly run the same fortune other bridegrooms had sometimes done; especially some persons being in the house who no doubt would be glad to play him such a trick, but let him boldly go to bed, for I would do him the office of a friend, and if need were, would not spare a miracle that it was in my power to do, provided he would engage to me, upon his honour, to keep it to himself, and only when they came to bring him his caudle in the night,[1] if matters had not gone well with him, to give me such a sign, and leave the rest to me. Well, he had had his ears so battered, and his mind so prepossessed with the eternal tattle of this business that, when he came to it, he did really find himself tied with the trouble of his imagination, and accordingly at the time appointed gave me the sign: whereupon I whispered him in the ear that he should rise, under pretence of putting us out of the room, and after a jesting manner pull my night-gown from my shoulders, (we were nearly of a height) throw it over his own, and there keep it till he had performed what I appointed him to do, which was that when we were all gone out of the chamber he should withdraw to make water, should three times repeat such and such words, and as often do such and such actions: that at every of the three times he should tie the ribband I put into his hand about his middle, and be sure to place the medal that was fastened to it, the figures in such a posture, exactly upon his reins, which being done, and having, the last of the three times, so well girt and fast tied the ribband that it could neither untie nor slip from its place, let him confidently return to his business, and withal not forget to spread my gown upon the bed, so that it might be sure to cover them both. These apes' tricks are the main of the effect, our fancy being so far seduced as to believe that such strange and uncouth formalities must of necessity proceed from some abstruse science. Their very inanity gives them reverence and weight. However, certain it is that my figures proved themselves more venerean than solar, more in action than in prohibition, and the fair bride had no reason to complain. Now I must tell you, it was a sudden whimsey, mixed with a little curiosity, that made me do a thing so contrary to my nature; for I am an enemy to all tricks and counterfeits, and abominate all manner of finesse, though it be in sport, and of advantage; for though the action may not be wicked in itself, yet 'tis done after a wicked manner.

Amasis, king of Ægypt, having married Laodicea, a marvellously beautiful Greek virgin, though famous for his abilities elsewhere, found himself quite another man with his wife, and could by no means enjoy her; at which he was so enraged that he threatened to kill her, suspecting her to be a witch. As 'tis usually in things that consist in fancy, she put him upon devotion, and, having accordingly made his vows to Venus, he found himself divinely restored the very first night after his oblations and sacrifices.[2] Women are to blame, to entertain us with that disdainful, coy, and angry countenance they commonly do, which extinguishes our vigour, as it kindles our desire. The daughter-in-law of Pythagoras said that the woman who goes to bed to a man must put off her modesty with her petticoat, and put it on again with the same.[1] The soul of the assailant being disturbed with a variety of alarms, is easily dispirited, and soon loses the power of performance; and whoever the imagination has once put this shame upon (and she never does it but at the first acquaintance, by reason men are then more ardent and eager, and that at this first account a man gives of himself he is much more timorous of miscarrying,) having made an ill-beginning, he becomes peevish at the accident, which will on following occasions be apt to stick to him.

[1] It was formerly a custom in France to bring the bridegroom a candle in the middle of his wedding-night.

[2] Herod, ii. 181, who, however, says that, not Amasis, but Laodicea, or Ladice, faithfully performed a vow she had made to Venus, by erecting a statue; "which," the author adds, "was still standing in my time."

As to married people, whose time is all before them, they ought never to compel, or so much as to offer at the affair, if they do not find themselves quite ready: and it is better to fail in the decorum of handselling the nuptial sheets, when a man perceives himself full of agitation and trembling, and to wait for another opportunity at a better and more private juncture, when his fancy shall be better composed, than to make himself perpetually miserable, for having misbehaved himself, and been baffled at the first assault. Till possession be taken, a man that knows himself subject to this infirmity, should leisurely and at intervals make several little trials and light offers, without obstinately attempting at once to force an absolute conquest over his own mutinous and indisposed faculties. Such as know their members to be naturally obedient to their desires, need to take no other care but only to counterplot their fancy.

The indocility of this member is sufficiently remarkable; importunate, unruly, and impatient, at such times as we have nothing for it to do, and unseasonably stupid and disobedient when we stand most in need of his vigour, so imperiously contesting the authority of the will, and with so much obstinacy denying all solicitation both of hand and fancy. And yet, though his rebellion is so universally complained of, and that proofs are not wanting to condemn him, if he had nevertheless fee'd me to plead his cause, I should peradventure bring the rest of his fellow members into suspicion of complotting this mischief against him, out of pure envy at the importance and pleasure particular to his employment, so as to have, by this confederacy of theirs, armed the whole world against him, by malevolently charging him alone with their common offence. For let any one consider whether there is any one part of our bodies that does not often refuse to perform its office at the precept of the will, and that does not often exercise its function in defiance of her command. They have every one of them proper passions of their own, that rouse and awake, stupify and benumb them, without our leave or consent. How often do the involuntary motions of the countenance discover our inward thoughts, and betray our most private secrets to the knowledge of the standers-by? The same cause that animates this member, does also, without our knowledge, animate the lungs, the pulse, the heart; the sight of a pleasing object imperceptibly diffusing a flame through all our parts with a feverish motion. Is there nothing but these veins and muscles that swell and flag without the consent, not only of the will, but even of our knowledge also? We do not command our hairs to stand on end, nor our skin to shiver either with fear or desire. The hands often convey themselves to parts to which we do not direct them. The tongue will be interdict, and the voice as it were suffocated, without the intervention of the will. When we have nothing to eat, and would willingly forbid it, the appetite of eating and drinking does not for all that forbear to stir up the parts that are subjected to it, no more nor less than the other appetite we were speaking of, and in like manner does as unseasonably leave us. The vessels that serve to discharge the belly have their proper dilatations and compressions, without and beyond our intelligence, as well as those which are destined to purge the reins. And that which, to justify the prerogative of the will, St. Augustine urges, of having seen a man who could command his back trumpet to sound as often as he pleased, and which Vives, his commentator, fortifies with another example in his time of one that could do this in tune,[2] does not any the more attribute pure obedience to that part; for is any thing commonly more tumultuary or indiscreet? To which let me add that I myself knew one so rude and ungoverned as for forty years kept its master at work with one continued and unintermitted hurricane, and 'tis like will do so till he expire that way. And I could heartily wish that I only knew, by reading, how oft a man's belly, by the denial of one single puff, brings him to the very door of an exceeding painful death; and that the emperor, who gave liberty to let fly in all places, had at the same time given us power to do so.[3] But for our will, in whose behalf we have preferred this accusation, with how much greater similitude of truth may we reproach even her herself with mutiny and sedition for her irregularity and disobedience? Does she always will what we would have her to do? Does she not often will what we forbid her to will, and that to our manifest prejudice? Does she suffer herself, any more than any of the others, to be governed and directed by the results of our reason? To conclude, I should

All our members are occasionally disobedient.

[1] Montaigne here speaks of Theano, the famous Pythagorean woman, who was the wife, and not the daughter-in-law, of Pythagoras. See Diogenes Laertius in the Life of Pythagoras, viii. 42. It is M. Menage who has taken notice of this small mistake of Montaigne.

urge in the behalf of the gentleman, my client, it might be considered that in this matter his cause being inseparably conjoined with an accessary, whose share is not distinctly marked, yet he only is called in question, and that by arguments and accusations, that cannot be charged nor reflect upon his said accomplice, for the latter, though he sometimes inopportunely invites, never refuses, and allures after a tacit and clandestine manner: and herein, therefore, is the malice and injustice of his accusers most manifestly apparent. But, be it as it may, let the advocates and judges pass what sentence they please, nature will, in the mean time, proceed after her own way; who had done but well, if she had endowed this member with some particular privilege; the author, as he is, of the sole immortal work of mortals, a divine work according to Socrates; of love, desire of immortality; and himself an immortal Dæmon.

Confidence in one's physician a great step towards one's cure.

One person, perhaps, by such an effect of imagination, may have had the good luck to leave that disease behind him here in France which his companion carries back with him into Spain. And that you may see why men in such cases require a mind prepared for the thing they are to do, why do the physicians tamper with, and prepossess before hand their patients' credulity with so many false promises of cure, if not to the end, that the effect of imagination may supply the defect of their decoctions? They know, very well, that a great master of their trade has given it under his hand, that he has known some with whom the very sight of a potion would do the work. And this conceit comes now into my head, by the remembrance of a story was told me by an apothecary of my late father's, a blunt honest Swiss (a nation not much addicted to vanity or lying), of a merchant he had long known at Thoulouse, who being a valetudinarian, and much afflicted with fits of the stone, had often occasion to take clysters, of which he caused several sorts to be prescribed him by the physicians, according to the circumstances of his attack: one of which being one time brought in, and none of the usual forms, as feeling if it were not too hot, and the like, being omitted, he was laid down on his bed, the syringe applied, and all ceremonies performed, injection excepted; after which, the apothecary being gone, and the patient accommodated as if he had really received a clyster, he found the same operation and effect that those do who have taken one indeed; and if at any time the physician did not find the operation sufficient, he would usually give him two or three more after the same manner. And the fellow moreover swore to me that, to save charges (for he paid as if he had really taken them), this sick man's wife having sometimes made trial of warm water only, the effect discovered the cheat; and finding these would not do, she was fain to return to the old way. A woman fancying she had swallowed a pin in a piece of bread, complained of an intolerable pain in her throat, where she thought she felt it stick; but an ingenious fellow that was brought to her, seeing no outward tumour nor alteration, supposing it only to be a fancy taken at some crust of bread that had pricked her as it went down, caused her to vomit, and unseen threw a crooked pin into the bason, which the woman no sooner saw, but, believing she had cast it up, she presently found herself eased of her pain. I myself knew of a gentleman, who having treated a great deal of good company at his house, three or four days after said, in jest (for there was no such thing), that he had made them eat of a cat-pie; at which, a young gentlewoman, who had been at the feast, took such a horror that, falling into a violent vomiting and a fever, there was no possible means to save her. Even brute beasts are also subject to the force of imagination as well as we; as is observed in dogs who die of grief for the loss of their masters, and are seen to bark, tremble, and start, as horses will kick and neigh in their sleep.

A distemper contracted by mere power of imagination.

Animals subject to the effects of imagination.

Now all this may be attributed to the affinity and relation betwixt the souls and the bodies of brutes, mutually communicating their feelings; but 'tis quite another thing when the imagination works upon the souls of rational men, and not only to the prejudice of their own particular bodies, but of others also. And as an infected body communicates its malady to those that approach or live near it, as we see in the plague, the small-pox, and sore eyes, that run through whole families and cities:

Dum spectant oculi læsos, læduntur et ipsi;
Multaque corporibus transitione nocent.[1]

"Viewing sore eyes, eyes to be sore are brought,
And many ills are by transition caught."

so the imagination, being vehemently agitated, darts out infection capable of hurting a foreign object. The ancients had an opinion of certain women of Scythia, that, being animated and enraged against any one, they killed them only with a look. Tortoises and ostriches hatch their eggs with only looking on them, which infers that their eyes have in them some ejaculative virtue. And the eyes of witches are said to be dangerous and hurtful;

Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos.[2]

"Some eye unknown hath witched my tender lambs."

though magicians are no very good authority with me. We see, however, by constant experience, that women impart the marks of their fancy to the unborn children within them:

[1] Ovid. Remed. Amor. 615.

[2] Virg. Eclog. iii. 103.

witness her that was brought to bed of a moor. And there was presented to Charles, King of Bohemia and Emperor, a girl from about Pisa, all over rough and covered with hair, whom her mother said had been conceived by reason of a picture of St. John the Baptist, that hung in her bed.

Its effect on women with child;

It is the same with beasts, witness Jacob's sheep, and the hares and partridges that the snow turns white upon the mountains. There was at my house a little while ago a cat seen watching a bird upon the top of a tree, who for some time mutually fixing their eyes upon one another, the bird at last let herself fall as dead into the cat's claws, either dazzled and astonished by the force of her own imagination, or drawn by some attractive power in the cat. Such as are addicted to hawking have heard the story of the falconer, who having earnestly fixed his eyes upon a kite in the air, laid a wager that he would bring her down with the sole power of his gaze, and did so, as it was said; for the tales I borrow I charge upon the consciences of those from whom I have them. The arguments are my own, and found themselves upon the proofs of reason, not of experience, to which every one has liberty to add his own examples; and he who has none (the numbers and varieties of accident considered), let him not forbear to believe that these I set down are enough; and if I do not apply them well, let some other do it for me. So in the subjects of which I treat, our manners and motions, the testimonies and instances I produce, how fabulous soever, provided they are possible, serve as well as true ones; whether it has really happened or no, at Rome, or at Paris, to Peter or John, 'tis still within the verge of possibility and human capacity, which serves me to good use in the things I write. I see and make my advantage of it as well in shadow as in substance; and amongst the various examples I everywhere meet with in history, I cull out the most rare and memorable to fit my own turn. There are some authors whose only end and design it is to give an account of things that have happened; mine, if I could arrive unto it, should be to talk of what may come to pass. There is a just liberty allowed in the schools, of supposing and contriving similes, when they are at a loss for them in their own reading; I do not, however, make any use of that privilege, and in this respect in superstitious religion surpass all historical authority. In the examples which I here bring in of what I have heard, read, done, or said, I have forbid myself to dare to alter even the most light and indifferent circumstances; my conscience does not falsify one tittle, what my ignorance may do I cannot say.

Montaigne's use of illustrations.

And this it is that makes me sometimes doubt whether a divine or a philosopher, men of so exquisite and exact wisdom and conscience, ought to write history; for how can they stake their reputation upon a popular belief? how be responsible for the opinions of men they do not know? or with what assurance deliver their conjectures as ready money? Of actions performed before their own eyes, wherein several persons were actors, they would be unwilling to give evidence upon oath before a judge; nor is there any man with whose heart they are so familiarly and thoroughly acquainted that they would become absolute surety for his intentions. For my part, I think it less hazardous to write things past than present, by how much the writer is only to give an account of things every one knows he must of necessity borrow upon trust.

A doubt whether either divines or philosophers should write history.

I am solicited to write the affairs of my own time, by some who fancy I look upon them with an eye less blinded with prejudice or partiality than another, and have a clearer insight into them, by reason of the free access fortune has given me to the heads of both factions; but they do not consider that to purchase the glory of Sallust I would not give myself the trouble, sworn enemy as I am to all obligation, assiduity, and perseverance: besides that, there is nothing so contrary to my style as a continued and extended narrative, I so often interrupt and cut myself short in my writing, only for want of breath. I am good at neither composition nor comment, and am ignorant beyond a child of the phrases, and even the very words, proper to express the most common things; and for that reason it is that I have undertaken to say only what I can say, and have accommodated my subjects to my force. Should I take one to be my guide, peradventure I should not be able to keep pace with him, and in the precipitancy of my career might deliver judgments which, even in my own thought, and according to reason, would be criminal in the highest degree.

Montaigne solicited to write the history of his time; and why he would not.

Plutarch would readily tell us of what he has delivered to the light, that it is the work of others; that his examples are all and everywhere true; that they are useful to posterity, and are presented with a lustre that will light us the way to virtue, which was his design. But it matters not, as in a medicinal drug, whether an old story ran so or so.

CHAPTER XXI.[1]

THAT THE PROFIT OF ONE MAN IS THE INCONVENIENCE OF ANOTHER.

DEMADES the Athenian condemned one of his city, whose trade it was to sell the necessaries for funeral ceremonies, upon pretence that he demanded unreasonable profit, and that this profit could not accrue to him but by the death of a great number of people. A judgment that appears to be ill grounded, forasmuch as no profit whatever can be made but at the expense of another, and that by the same rule he should condemn all manner of gain of what kind soever. The tradesman thrives and grows rich by the pride and wastefulness of youth; the husbandman by the dearness of grain; the architect by the ruin of buildings; the lawyers and officers of justice by suits and contentions of men; nay, even the honour and office of divines are derived from our death and vices. A physician takes no pleasure in the health even of his friends, says the ancient comedian; nor a soldier in the peace of his country; and so of the rest.[2] And, which is yet worse, let every one but dive into his own bosom, and he will find his private wishes spring, and his secret hopes grow up, at another's expense. Upon which consideration it comes into my head that Nature does not in this swerve from her general polity; for physicians hold that the birth, nourishment, and increase, of everything, is the dissolution and corruption of another.

> Nam quodcunque suis mutatum finibus exit,
> Continuò hoc mors est illius quod fuit ante.[3]
>
> "For what from its own confines chang'd doth pass,
> Is straight the death of what before it was."

CHAPTER XXII.

OF CUSTOM, AND THAT WE SHOULD NOT EASILY CHANGE A LAW RECEIVED.

The force of custom.

HE seems to me to have had a right and true apprehension of the power of custom who first invented the story of a country-woman, who having accustomed herself to play with, and carry from the hour of its birth, a calf in her arms, and daily continuing to do so as it grew up, obtained this by custom, that when grown to be a great ox, she was still able to bear it.[4] For, in truth, custom is a violent and treacherous school-mistress. She, by little and little, slily and unperceived, slips in the foot of her authority, but having by this gentle and humble beginning, with the aid of time, fixed and established it, she then unmasks a furious and tyrannic countenance, against which we have no more the courage nor the power so much as to lift up our eyes. We see it at every turn forcing and violating the rules of nature: usus efficacissimus rerum omnium magister,[5] "Custom is the greatest master of all things." I believe in Plato's cave in his Republic,[6] and the physicians, who so often submit the reasons of their art to the authority of habit: as also the story of that king who by custom brought his stomach to that pass as to live on poison; and the girl that Albertus reports to have lived upon spiders; and in that new world of the Indies, there were found great nations, and in very different climates, who lived upon the same diet, made provision of them, and fed them for their tables; as well as grasshoppers, mice, bats, and lizards: and in a time of a scarcity, a toad was sold for six crowns; all which they cook, and dish up with several sauces. There were also others found to whom our food and the flesh we eat were venomous and mortal. Consuetudinis magna vis est: pernoctant venatores in nive; in montibus uri se patiuntur: pugiles cæstibus contusi, ne ingeniscunt quidem.[7] "The power of custom is very great: huntsmen will one while lie out all night in the snow, and another suffer themselves to be parched with heat on the mountains; and prize-fighters, though beaten almost to a jelly with the cæstus, utter not a groan." These examples will not appear so strange, if we consider what we have ordinary experience of, how much custom dulls our senses. We need not go to be satisfied of this to what is reported of the cataracts of the Nile; and to what philosophers believe of the music of the spheres, that the bodies of those circles being solid and smooth, and coming to touch, and rub upon one another, cannot fail of creating a wonderful harmony, the changes and cadences of which cause the revolutions and dances of the stars; but that the hearing sense of all creatures here below, being universally, like that of the Egyptians, deafened and stupified with the continual noise, cannot distinguish it, how great soever it be.

Smiths, millers, and armourers, could never be able to live in the perpetual noise of their own trades did it strike their ears as it does ours.

My perfumed doublet gratifies my own nose at first, as well as that of others, but after I have worn it three or four days together, I myself no more perceive it; but it is yet more strange that custom, notwithstanding long intermissions and intervals, should yet have the power to unite, and establish the effect of its impressions upon our senses, as is manifest to such as live near belfries. I myself lie at home in a tower, where every morning and evening a very great bell rings out the Ave Maria, the noise of which shakes my very tower, and at first seemed insupportable to me; but in a little while I got so used to it that I hear it without any manner of offence, and often without awaking at it.

Plato reprehending a boy for playing at some childish game—"Thou reprovest me," said the boy, "for a very little thing." "Custom," replied Plato, "is no little thing."[1] Our greatest vices derive their first propension from our most tender infancy; our principal education depends upon the nurse. Mothers are mightily amused to see a child twist off the neck of a chicken, or divert itself with hurting a dog or a cat; and such wise fathers there are in the world who look upon it as a notable presage of a martial spirit when he hears his son miscall or domineer over a poor peasant or lacquey, that dares not reply or turn again; and a great sign of wit when he sees him cheat and overreach his play-fellow by some sly trick; yet these are the true seeds and roots of cruelty, tyranny, and treason. They bud and put out there, and afterwards shoot up vigorously in the hands of custom: and it is a very dangerous mistake to excuse these vile inclinations upon account of the tenderness of their age, and the trivialty of the subject; first, it is nature that speaks, whose voice is then more sincere, and whose inward thoughts are more undisguised, as it is younger and more shrill; secondly, the deformity of cozenage does not consist in, nor depend upon, the difference betwixt crowns and pins; but merely upon itself, for a cheat is a cheat, be it more or less; which makes me think it more just to conclude thus, "why should he not cozen in crowns since he does it in pins?" than as they do, who say, "they only play for pins, he would not do it if it were for crowns." Children should carefully be instructed to abhor vices for themselves, and the natural deformity of those vices ought so to be represented to them that they may not only avoid them in their actions, but so abominate them in their hearts that the very thought should be hateful to them, with what mask soever they may be palliated or disguised.

Vices take root in the most tender years, and ought therefore to be corrected instantly.

Children should be taught to abhor vice for itself.

I know very well, for what concerns myself, that from having been brought up in my childhood to a plain and sincere way of dealing, and from then having had an aversion to all manner of juggling and tricking in my childish sports and recreations (and indeed it is to be noted that the play of children is not really play, but must be judged of as their most serious actions,) there is no game so small, wherein from my own bosom naturally, and without study or endeavour, I have not an extreme aversion for deceit. I shuffle and cut, and make as much ado with the cards, and keep as strict account for farthings, as if it were for doubloons; when winning or losing against my wife and daughter, it is indifferent to me, as when I play in good earnest with others for round sums. At all times, and in all things, my own eyes are sufficient to look to my fingers; I am not so narrowly watched by any other, neither is there any I more fear to be discovered by, or to offend, than myself.

I saw the other day at my own house, a little fellow, a native of Nantes, born without arms, who has so well taught his feet to perform the services his hands should have done him that indeed they have half forgot their natural office, and the use for which they were designed; the fellow, indeed, calls them his hands, and we may allow him so to do, for with them he cuts any thing, charges and discharges a pistol, threads a needle, sows, writes, and puts off his hat, combs his head, plays at cards and dice, and all this with the utmost dexterity; and the money I gave him (for he gets his living by exhibiting himself,) he carried away in his foot, as we do in our hand. I have seen another who, though a mere boy, flourished a two-handed sword, and (if I may so say) handled a halbert with the mere motions and writhing of his neck and shoulders for want of hands, tost them into the air, and caught them again, darted a dagger, and cracked a whip as well as any carter in France.

Curious instance of the feet, and neck, doing the office of the hands.

But the effects of custom are much more manifest in the strange impressions she makes in our minds, where she meets with less resistance. What has she not the power to impose upon our judgments and belief? Is there any so fantastic opinion (omitting the gross impostures in religion, with which we see so many populous nations and so many understanding men so strangely besotted; for this being beyond the reach of human reason, any error is the more excusable in such as, through the divine bounty, are not endued with an extraordinary illumination from above), but in other matters, are there any so senseless and extravagant that she has not planted and established for laws in those parts of the world upon which she has been pleased to exercise her power? And therefore that ancient exclamation was exceeding just—Non pudet physicum, id est, speculatorem venatoremque naturæ, ab animis consuetudine imbutis quærere testimonium veritatis?[1] "Is it not a shame for a natural philosopher, that is, for an observer and hunter of nature, to seek testimony from minds prepossessed with custom?" I do believe that no so absurd or ridiculous fancy can enter into human imagination that does not meet with some example of public practice, and that, consequently, our reason does not ground and support itself upon. There are people amongst whom it is the fashion to turn their backs upon him they salute, and never look upon the man they wish to honour. There is a court where, whenever the king spits, the favourite lady puts out her hand to receive it; and another nation where the most eminent persons about him stoop to take up his ordure in a linen cloth. Let us here steal room to insert a story.

A French gentleman of my acquaintance, who was always wont to blow his nose with his fingers—a thing very much against our fashion—would justify himself for so doing, and was a man very famous for pleasant repartees, as thus:—Upon such an occasion he asked me what privilege this filthy excrement had, that we must carry about with us a fine handkerchief to receive it, and, which was more, afterwards to lap it carefully up, and carry it all day about in our pockets, which, he said, could not be much more nauseous and offensive than to see it thrown away, as we did all other evacuations. It seemed to me that what he said was not altogether without reason, and, being frequently in his company, that slovenly action of his at last grew familiar to me; which, nevertheless, we make a face at when we hear it reported of another country.

Miracles appear to be so, according to our ignorance of nature, and not according to the essence of nature. The continually being accustomed to any thing blinds the eye of our judgment. Barbarians are no more a wonder to us than we are to them; nor with any more reason, as every one would confess if, after having considered those remote examples, men would reflect upon their own, and rightly compare them together. Human reason is a tincture pretty equally infused into all our opinions and manners, of what form soever they are; infinite in matter, infinite in diversity. But I return to my subject.

The odd customs of divers nations.

There are people where, his wife and children excepted, no one speaks to the king but through a trumpet. In one and the same nation the virgins discover those parts that modesty should persuade them to hide, and the married women carefully cover and conceal them. To which this custom, in another place, has some relation, where chastity, except in marriage, is of no esteem, for unmarried women may prostitute themselves to as many as they please, and, being with child, may lawfully take physic, in the sight of every one, to procure abortion. And, in another place, when a tradesman marries, all of the same condition who are invited to the wedding, lie with the bride before him; and the greater number of them there is, the greater is her honour, and the opinion of her ability and strength; if an officer marry, 'tis the same, the same with a nobleman, and so of the rest; except it be a labourer, or one of mean condition, for then it belongs to the lord of the place to perform that office; and yet a strict fidelity during marriage is afterward enjoined. There is a place where brothels of young men are kept for the pleasure of women, as with us there are of women for men: where the wives go to war as well as their husbands, and not only share in the dangers of battle, but, moreover, in the honours of command. Others where they wear rings not only through their noses, lips, cheeks, and on their toes, but also heavy wedges of gold thrust through their breasts and buttocks: where, in eating, they wipe their fingers upon their thighs, genitories, and the soles of their feet: where children are excluded, and brothers and nephews only inherit; and, elsewhere, nephews only, saving in the succession of the crown: where, for the regulation of community in goods and estates observed in the country, certain sovereign magistrates have committed to them the universal charge of cultivating the lands, and distributing the produce according to the necessity of every one: where they lament the death of children, and feast at the decease of old men:[2] where they lie ten or twelve in a bed, men and their wives together: where women whose husbands come to violent ends may marry again, and others not: where women are looked upon with such contempt that they kill all the native females, and buy wives of their neighbours to supply their use: where husbands may repudiate their wives without shewing any cause, but wives cannot part from their husbands for what cause soever: where husbands may sell their wives in case of sterility: where they boil the bodies of their dead, and afterwards pound them to a pulp, which they mix with their wine, and drink it: where the favourite mode of burial is to be eaten by dogs;[3] and elsewhere, by birds: where they believe the souls of the happy live in all manner of liberty, in delightful fields, furnished with all sorts of delicacies, and that it is those souls repeating the words we utter, which we call echo: where they fight in the water, and shoot their arrows with the most mortal aim, swimming: where, for a sign of subjection, they lift up their shoulders and hang down their heads, and put off their shoes, when they enter the king's palace: where the eunuchs who have charge of the religious women have, moreover, their lips and noses cut off, that they may not be loved; and the priests put out their own eyes to get acquainted with their demons and receive their oracles: where every one creates to himself a deity of what he likes best, according to his own fancy— the hunter, of a lion or a fox; the fisher, of some fish, and idols of every human action or passion; where the sun, the moon, and the earth, are the principal deities, and the form of taking an oath is to touch the earth, looking up to heaven, and where both flesh and fish are eaten raw: where the greatest oath they take is to swear by the name of some dead person of reputation, laying their hand upon his tomb:[1] where the new-year's gift the king sends every year to the princes, his subjects, is fire, which, being brought, all the old fire is put out, and the neighbouring people are bound to fetch of the new, every one for themselves, upon pain of treason: where, when the king, to betake himself wholly to devotion, retires from his administration (which often falls out), his next successor is obliged to do the same; by which means the crown devolves to the third in succession: where they vary the form of government according to the seeming necessity of affairs; depose the king when they think good, substituting ancient men to govern in his stead, and sometimes transferring it into the hands of the common people: where men and women are both circumcised and baptized: where the soldier who, in one or several engagements, has been so fortunate as to present seven of the enemies' heads to the king, is made noble: where they live in that singular and unsociable opinion of the mortality of the soul: where the women are delivered without pain or fear: where the women wear copper boots upon both their legs, and, if a louse bites them, are bound, in magnanimity, to bite it again, and dare not marry until first they have made their king a tender of their virginity: where the ordinary mode of salutation is by putting a finger down to the earth, and then pointing up towards heaven: where men carry burthens upon their heads, and women on their shoulders: where the women make water standing, and the men squatting down: where they send some of their blood in token of friendship, and offer incense to the men they would honour, like gods: where not only to the fourth, but to more remote degrees, kindred are not permitted to marry: where the children are four years at nurse, and often twelve; and where it is accounted mortal to give the child suck the first day after it is born: where the correction of the male children is assigned to the fathers, and that of the females to the mothers; the punishment being to hang them by the heels in the smoke: where they eat all sorts of herbs, excepting only those that have an ill smell: where all things are open, the finest furnished houses being without doors, windows, or chests to lock, a thief being there punished double to what they are in other places: where they crack lice with their teeth, like monkies, and abhor to see them killed with one's nails: where in all their lives they neither cut their hair nor pare their nails; and in another place pare those of the right hand only, letting the left grow for ornament: where they suffer the hair on the right side to grow as long as it will, and shave the other; and in the neighbouring provinces some let their hair grow long before and some behind, shaving close the rest:[2] where parents let out their children, and husbands their wives, to their guests to hire: where a man may get his own mother with child, and fathers make use of their own daughters, or their sons, without scandal or offence: where, at their solemn feasts, they lend their children to one another, without any consideration of nearness of blood. In one place men feed upon human flesh, in another 'tis reputed a pious office for a man to kill his father at a certain age;[3] and elsewhere the fathers dispose of their children whilst yet unborn,—some to be preserved and carefully brought up, and others to be made away with. Elsewhere the old husbands lend their wives to young men, and in another place they are in common without offence; nay, in one place the women wear, as marks of honour, as many gay fringed tassels at the bottom of their petticoats as they have lain with men.[4] Moreover, has not custom made a republic of women separate by themselves? Has it not put arms into their hands, made them to raise armies, and fight battles? And does she not by mere precept instruct the most ignorant vulgar, and make them perfect in things which all the philosophy in the world could never beat into the heads of the wisest men? For we know entire nations, where death was not only despised, but entertained with the greatest triumph; where children of seven years old suffered themselves to be whipped to death without changing their countenance;[5] where riches were in such contempt that the poorest citizen would not have deigned to stoop to take up a purse of crowns; and we know regions, very fruitful in all manner of provisions, where, notwithstanding, the most ordinary diet, and that they are most pleased with, is only bread, cresses, and water.[6] Did not custom moreover work that miracle in Chios, that in seven hundred years it was never known that ever maid or wife committed any act to the prejudice of her honour?[1]

In short, there is nothing, in my opinion, that she does not or may not do; and therefore with very good reason it is that Pindar, as I am told, calls her "the queen and empress of the world."[2] He that was seen to beat his father, and reproved for so doing, made answer, That it was the custom of their family; that in like manner his father had beaten his grandfather, his grandfather his great-grandfather. "And this," says he, pointing to his son, "when he comes to my age, will beat me." And the father, whose son was dragging and hauling him along the streets, commanded him to stop at a certain door; for he himself, he said, had dragged his father no further, that being the utmost limit of the hereditary insolence the sons used to practise upon the fathers in their family. "It is as much by custom as disorder," says Aristotle, "that women tear their hair, bite their nails, and eat charcoal and earth, and more by custom than nature that men abuse themselves with one another."

Custom the parent of the laws of conscience.

The laws of conscience, which we pretend to be derived from nature, proceed from custom; every one having an inward veneration for the opinions and manners approved and received amongst his own people, cannot without very great reluctance depart from them, nor apply himself to them without applause. In times past, when those of Crete would curse any one, they prayed the gods to engage them in some ill custom.[3] But the principal effect of the power of custom is so to seize and ensnare us that it is hardly in our power to disengage ourselves from its gripe; or so to come to ourselves as to consider of and weigh the things it enjoins. To say the truth, by reason that we suck it in with our mother's milk, and that the face of the world presents itself in this posture to our first sight, it seems as if we were born upon condition to pursue this practice; and the common fancies that we find in repute everywhere about us, and infused into our minds with the seed of our fathers, appear to be universal and genuine. From whence it comes to pass that whatever is off the hinges of custom is believed to be also off the hinges of reason; though how unreasonably for the most part, God knows.

If, as we who study ourselves have learned to do, every one who hears a good sentence would immediately consider how it does any way touch his own private concerns, every one would find that it was not so much a good saying as a sound lash to the ordinary stupidity of his own judgment. But men receive the precepts and admonitions of truth as directed to the common sort only, and not to themselves; and instead of applying them to their own manners, do only very ignorantly and unprofitably commit them to memory, without suffering themselves to be at all instructed or converted by them. But let us return to the empire of custom.

Nations attached to the form of government which they have been used to.

Such people as have been bred up to liberty, and subject to none but themselves, look upon all other forms of government as monstrous and contrary to nature. Those who are used to monarchy do the same; and what opportunity soever fortune presents them with to change, even then, when with the greatest difficulties they have disengaged themselves from one master, that was troublesome and grievous to them, they presently run with the same difficulties to create another; not being able, how roughly dealt with soever, to hate the government they were born under, and the obedience they have so long been accustomed to. 'Tis by the mediation and persuasion of custom that every one is content with the place where he is planted by nature; and the highlanders of Scotland no more pant after the air of Touraine, than the Scythians after the fields of Thessaly. Darius asking certain Greeks what they would take to assume the custom of the Indians, of eating the dead bodies of their fathers (for that was their practice, believing they could not give them a better or more noble sepulchre than to bury them in their own bodies), they made answer, That nothing in the world should hire them to do it; but having also tried to persuade the Indians to leave their barbarous custom, and, after the Greek manner, to burn the bodies of their fathers, they conceived a still greater horror at the proposition; and 'tis the same with us all, forasmuch as use veils from us the true aspect of things.

Taking upon me once to justify something in use amongst us, and that was received with absolute authority for a great many leagues round about us, and not content to establish it, as men commonly are, only by force of law and example, but by enquiring into its original, I found the foundation so weak that I, who had made it my business to confirm others, was very near being dissatisfied myself. 'Tis by this recipe that Plato undertakes to cure the unnatural and preposterous amours of his time—the recipe which he esteems of sovereign virtue; namely, that the public opinion condemns them; that the poets, and all other writers, relate horrible stories of them. A recipe by virtue of which the most beautiful daughters do not allure their fathers' lust, nor brothers of the finest shape and beauty their sisters' desire. The very fables of Thyestes, Œdipus, and Macareus, having, with the harmony of their song, infused this wholesome opinion and belief into the tender brains of infants.[1] Chastity is, in truth, a great and shining virtue, and of which the utility is sufficiently known; but to govern, and prevail with it according to nature, is as hard as 'tis easy to do it according to custom and the laws and precepts of sober practice. The original and universal reasons are of very difficult search, and our masters either lightly pass them over, or, not daring so much as to touch them, precipitate themselves at once into the liberty of custom, in which they pride themselves, and triumph as much as you please. Such as will not suffer themselves to be withdrawn from this original source do yet commit a greater error, and submit themselves to wild opinions. Witness Chrysippus,[2] who, in so many of his writings, has shewn the little account he made of incestuous conjunction committed with how near relations soever.

Custom the only foundation of many things authorised in the world.

Whoever would disengage himself from this violent prejudice of custom would find several things received with absolute and undoubting opinion that have no other support than the hoary beard and wrinkled face of ancient use; but this mask torn away, and things being referred to the decision of truth and reason, he will find his judgment convinced and overthrown, and yet restored to a much more sure state. For example, I will ask him what can be more strange than to see a people obliged to obey and pay a reverence to laws they never heard of, and to be bound in all their affairs, both private and public, as marriages, donations, wills, sales, and purchases, to rules they cannot possibly know, being neither writ nor published in their own language, and of which they have, of necessity, to purchase both the interpretation and the use? Not according to the ingenious opinion of Isocrates, who counselled his king to make the traffics and negociations of his subjects free, open, and of profit to them, and their quarrels and disputes burdensome, and laden with heavy penalties; but, by a monstrous notion, to make sale of reason itself, and to allow the law to be made a matter of traffic. I think myself obliged to fortune that, as our historians report, it was a Gascon gentleman, a countryman of mine, who first opposed Charlemagne when he attempted to impose upon us Latin and imperial laws.

The office of Judge a matter of purchase.

What can be more outrageous than to see a nation where, by lawful custom, the office of a Judge is to be bought and sold, where judgments are paid for with ready money, and where justice may legally be denied to him that has not wherewithal to pay;[3] where this merchandize is in so great repute, as in our government, to furnish a fourth estate of wrangling lawyers, to add to the three ancient ones of the church, nobility, and people; which fourth estate, having the laws in their hands, and sovereign power over men's lives and fortunes, make a body separate from the nobility. From whence it comes to pass that there are double laws, those of honour, and those of justice, in many things positively opposite to one another; the nobles as rigorously condemning a lie taken, as the others do a lie revenged. By the law of arms he shall be degraded from all nobility and honour who puts up with an affront; and, by the civil law, he who vindicates his reputation incurs a capital punishment; he who applies himself to the law for reparation of an offence done to his honour is disgraced; and he who does not is punished by the law. Yet, of these two so different parties, both of them referring to one head, the one has the charge of peace, the other of war; those have the profit, these the honour; those the wisdom, these the virtue; those the word, these the action; those justice, these valour; those reason, these force; those the long robe, these the short, divided betwixt them.

For what concerns indifferent things, as clothes, who is there that would think of bringing them back to their true and real use, the body's service and convenience, and upon which their original grace and decency depend; yet what more fantastic than our fashions? I will instance, amongst others, our square caps, that long tail of velvet that hangs down from our women's heads with its whimsical trinkets, and that idle and absurd model of a member we cannot, in modesty, so much as name, which, nevertheless, we make a parade of in public. These considerations, notwithstanding, will not prevail upon any understanding man to decline the common mode; but, on the contrary, methinks all singular and particular fashions are rather marks of folly and vain affectation than of sound reason; and a wise man ought within to withdraw and retire his soul from the crowd, and there keep it at liberty, and in power to judge freely of things; but, as to this outward garb and appearance, absolutely follow and conform himself to the fashion of the time. Public society has nothing to do with our thoughts, but for the rest, as our actions, our labours, our fortunes, and our lives, we should lend and abandon them to the common opinion and public service, as did that good and great Socrates, who refused to preserve his life by a disobedience to the magistrate, though a very wicked and unjust one: for it is the rule of rules, and the general law of laws, that every one observe those of the place wherein he lives.

Νόμους ἔπεσθαι τοῖσιν ἐγχωρίοις καλόν.[1]

"The country's custom to observe,
Is proper, and doth praise deserve."

Whether the actual inconvenience of changing received laws is not greater than the possible advantage.

Let us take another view of the subject: it is a very great doubt whether any so manifest an advantage can accrue from the alteration of a law or custom received, let it be what it will, as there is danger and inconvenience in doing it; forasmuch as government is a structure composed of several parts and members joined and united together, with so strict affinity and union that it is impossible to stir so much as one brick or stone but the whole body will be sensible of it. The legislator of the Thurians[2] ordained that whosoever proposed either to abolish old laws, or to establish new, should present himself, with a halter about his neck, to the people; to the end that, if the innovation he would introduce should not be approved by every one, he might immediately be hanged; and that of the Lacedemonians[3] made it the business of his whole life to obtain from his citizens a faithful promise that none of his laws should be violated. The Ephorus, who so rudely cut the two strings that Phrynis had added to music,[4] never stood to examine whether that addition made better harmony, or that by that means the instrument was more full and complete; it was enough for him to condemn the invention, that it was a novelty, and an alteration of the old fashion. Which also is the meaning of the old rusty sword carried before the magistracy of Marseilles.

For my own part I have myself a very great aversion for novelty, what face, or what pretence soever it may carry along with it, and have reason, having been an eye-witness of the great mischiefs produced. One cannot, I confess, exactly say that the miseries which, for so many years,[5] have lain so heavy upon the kingdom of France, are wholly occasioned by it; but one may say, and with colour enough, that it has accidentally produced and begot the mischief and ruin that have since continued both without and against it, and it is principally what we have to accuse for these disorders.

Heu patior telis vulnera facta meis.[6]

"Alas! the wounds I now endure
Which my own weapons did procure."

They who give the first shock to a state are voluntarily the first overwhelmed in its ruin; the fruits of public commotion are seldom enjoyed by him who was the first mover, as only beats the water for another's net. The unity and contexture of this monarchy, this great structure, having been, in her old age, broken and torn by this thing, called innovation, has laid open a breach, and given sufficient admittance to the like injuries in these latter times. The regal majesty falls less easily from the summit to the middle, than from the middle to the base. But, if the inventors did the greater mischief, the imitators are more vicious, to follow examples of which they have felt and punished both the horror and the offence. And if there can be any degree of horror in ill-doing, these last are indebted to the other for the glory of contriving, and the courage of making the first attempt. All sorts of new disorders easily draw, from this primitive and overflowing fountain, examples and precedents to trouble and discompose our government. We read in our very laws, made for the remedy of this first evil, the beginning and pretences of all sorts of bad enterprises; and what Thucydides says[7] of the civil wars of his time is applicable to us, that, to smooth over public vices, we give them new and more plausible names, sweetening and disguising their true titles: all that is done is done, forsooth, to reform and improve our faith! Honesta oratio est,[8] but the best pretence for innovation is of very dangerous consequence; Adeò nihil motum ex antiquo probabile est.[9] And, freely to speak my thoughts, it argues, methinks, a strange self-love and great presumption in a man to set so much value on his own opinions that public peace must be overthrown to establish them, and so many inevitable mischiefs introduced into his own country, and so dreadful a corruption of manners, as a civil war, and the mutations of state consequent to it, always brings in its train. Can there be worse management than to set up so many certain and palpable vices, against errors that are only contested, and disputable, whether they be such or no? And are there any worse sort of vices than those which shock a man's own conscience, and the natural light of his own reason? The senate, upon the dispute betwixt it and the people about the administration of their religion, was bold enough to return this evasion for current pay: Ad Deos id magis quàm ad se, pertinere; ipsos visuros, ne sacra sua polluantur.[10] "That it more belonged to the gods to determine than to them; let them, therefore, have a care their sacred mysteries were not profaned." As the oracle answered those of Delphos, who, fearing to be invaded by the Persians, in the Median war, enquired of Apollo how they should dispose of the holy treasure of his temple, whether they should hide, or remove it to some other place? He returned them answer, that they should stir nothing thence, but only take care of themselves, for he himself was sufficient to look to what belonged to him.[1] The Christian religion has all the marks of the utmost utility and justice: but none more manifest than the severe injunction it lays indifferently upon all to yield absolute obedience to the civil magistrate, and to maintain and defend the laws: of which what a wonderful example has the divine wisdom left us, who, to work and establish the salvation of mankind, and to conduct his glorious victory over death and sin, would do it after no other way but at the mercy of our ordinary forms of justice, submitting the progress and issue of so high and so salutiferous an effect to the blindness and injustice of our customs and observances, suffering the innocent blood of so many of his elect, and so long a loss of years to the maturing of this inestimable fruit! There is a vast difference betwixt the case of one that follows the forms and laws of his country, and another that will undertake to regulate and change them; the first pleads simplicity, obedience, and precedent, for his excuse; whatever he may do cannot be imputed to malice, 'tis at the worst but misfortune. Quis est enim, quem non moveat clarissimis monumentis testata, consignataque antiquitas?[2] "For who is it that antiquity, sealed and attested with so many glorious monuments, cannot move?" Besides what Isocrates says, that defect is nearer allied to moderation than excess. The other is a much more ruffling gamester:[3] for whosoever shall take upon him to choose and alter, usurps the authority of judging, and ought to look well about him, and make it his business to discover the defect of what he would abolish, and the virtue of what he is about to introduce.

This vulgar consideration is that which settled me in my station, and kept even my most ungoverned youth under the rein, so as not to burthen my shoulders with so great a weight as to render myself responsible for a science of that importance; or in this to dare, what in my better and more mature judgment I durst not do in the most easy and indifferent things I had learned, and wherein temerity of judging is of no consequence; it seeming to me very wrong to wish to subject public and established customs and institutions to the weakness and instability of a private and particular fancy (for private reason is but a private jurisdiction,) and to attempt that upon the divine, which no government will endure a man should do upon the civil, laws. With which, though human reason has much more commerce than with the other, yet are they sovereignly judged by their own proper judges, and the utmost sufficiency serves only to expound and set forth the law and custom received, but neither to divest it, nor to introduce any thing of innovation. And if sometimes the divine providence has gone beyond the rules to which it has necessarily bound and obliged us, it is not to give us any dispensation to do the same; those are only master-strokes of the divine hand, which we are not to imitate, but only admire; and extraordinary examples purposed, and particular testimonies of the nature of miracles, presented before us for manifestations of its almighty power, equally above both our rules and our strength, which it would be folly and impiety to attempt to represent and imitate; and which we ought not to follow, but to contemplate with the greatest reverence and astonishment, as arts peculiar to his person and not to us. Cotta very opportunely declares, Quàm de religione agitur, Ti. Coruncanium, P. Scipionem, P. Scævolam, pontifices maximos, non Zenonem, aut Cleanthem, aut Chrysippum sequor.[4] "When matters of religion are in question, I will be governed by T. Coruncanus, P. Scipio, P. Scævola, the High-Priests, and not by Zeno, Cleanthes, or Chrysippus." God knows, in our present quarrel, where there are a hundred articles to dash out and put in, and those of great consideration, too, how many there are who can truly boast they have exactly and perfectly weighed and understood the grounds and reasons of the one and the other party. 'Tis a number, if it make any number, that would give us very little disturbance; but what becomes of all the rest? Under what ensigns do they march? In what quarter do they lie? Theirs have the same effect with other weak and ill-applied medicines, they have only set the humours they would purge more violently working, stirred and exasperated them by the conflict, and left them still behind. The decoction was too weak to purge, but strong enough to weaken us; so that it does not leave us, but we keep it still in our bodies, and reap nothing from the operation but intestine gripes and long enduring pain. Yet fortune still reserving her authority above and beyond our reason, does sometimes present us with a necessity so urgent that 'tis requisite the laws should a little yield and give way; and when one opposes the encrease of an innovation that thus intrudes itself by violence, to keep a man's self in so doing in all places, and in all things, within bounds and rules, against those who have the power, and to whom all things are lawful that may any way serve to advance their design, who have no other law nor rule but what serves best to their own purpose, is a dangerous obligation, and an intolerable inequality.

Old laws, however, must in some cases yield to new.

The ordinary discipline of a healthful state does not provide against these extraordinary accidents, pre-supposing a body that supports itself in its principal members and offices, and a common consent to its obedience and observation. To act in conformity with the laws is a cold, heavy, and constrained affair, and not fit to make way against a headstrong and unbridled will. 'Tis to this day a reproach against those two great men, Octavius and Cato, in the two civil wars of Sylla and Cæsar, that they would rather suffer their country to undergo the last extremities than to relieve their fellow citizens at the expense of its laws, or to be guilty of any innovation; for, in truth, in these last necessities, where there is no other remedy, it would peradventure be more discreet to stoop, and yield a little before the blow, than by mere wilful opposition, without possibility of doing any good, to give occasion to violence to trample all under foot; 'tis better to make the laws do what they can, when they cannot do what they would. After this manner did he who suspended them for four and twenty hours,[2] and he who for once shifted a day in the calendar, and that other who of the month of June made a second May.[3] The Lacedæmonians, themselves, who were such religious observers of the laws of their country, being straitened by one of their own edicts, by which it was expressly forbidden to choose the same man to be admiral twice; and on the other hand, their affairs necessarily requiring that Lysander should again take upon him that command, they made one Aracus admiral, 'tis true, but Lysander superintendant of the navy.[4] And, by the same subtilty and equivocation, one of their ambassadors being sent to the Athenians to obtain the revocation of some decree, and Pericles remonstrating to him that it was forbidden to take away the tablet wherein a law had once been engrossed, he advised him to turn it, that not being prohibited;[5] and Plutarch[6] commends Philopœmon, that, being born to command, he knew how to do it, not only according to the laws, but also to over-rule even the laws themselves, when the public necessity so required.

CHAPTER XXIII.

VARIOUS EVENTS FROM THE SAME COUNSEL.

JAQUES AMIOT,[7] Grand Almoner of France, one day related to me this story, much to the honour of a prince of ours (and ours he was upon several very good accounts, though originally of foreign extraction,[8] that in the time of our first commotions, at the siege of Rouen,[9] this prince, having been advertised by the queen-mother of a conspiracy against his life, and in her letters particular information being given him of the person who was to execute the business, who was a gentleman of Anjou, or of Mayne, and who for this purpose frequented this prince's house, discovered not the least syllable of this intelligence to any one whatever, but going the next day to St. Katherine's Mount, from whence our battery played against the town (for it was during the siege) and having in company with him the said Lord Grand Almoner, and another bishop, he was presently aware of this gentleman, who had been denoted to him, and presently caused him to be called into his presence; to whom, being come before him, seeing him pale, and trembling with the conscience of his guilt, he thus said: "Monsieur such a one, you already guess what I have to say to you; your countenance discovers it; you have nothing hidden from me; I am so well informed of your business that it will but make worse for you to attempt to deny it; you know very well such and such things (the most secret circumstances of his conspiracy), and therefore be sure, as you value your life, to confess to me the whole of your design." The poor man, seeing himself thus detected (for the whole business had been discovered to the queen by one of the accomplices), was in so great a confusion he knew not what to do; but joining his hands to beg for mercy, he was about to throw himself at the prince's feet, but he, taking him up, proceeded to say: "Come, sir, tell me, have I at any time heretofore done you any injury? or have I, through any private difference, offended any kinsman or friend of yours? It is not above three weeks that I have known you; what then could move you to attempt my death?" To which the gentleman, with a trembling voice, replied, "that it was no particular grudge he had to his person, but the general interest and concern of his party, and that he had been put upon it by some who had persuaded him it would be a meritorious act, by any means to extirpate so great and so powerful an enemy of their religion." "Well," said the prince, "I will now let you see how much more charitable the religion is that I hold, than that which you profess; yours has counselled you to kill me, without a hearing, and without my ever having given you any cause of offence; and mine commands me to forgive you, convicted, as you are, by your own confession, of a design to murder me without reason. Get you gone, and let me see you no more; and if you are wise, choose henceforward honest men for your counsellors in your designs."[1]

The clemency of Augustus.

The Emperor Augustus, being in Gaul, had certain information of a conspiracy L. Cinna was contriving against him, and thereupon resolved to make him an example; to that end he sent to summon his friends to meet the next morning in council; but the night between he passed in great disquiet of mind, considering that he was going to put to death a young man, of an illustrious family, and nephew to the great Pompey, which made him break out into various ejaculations: "What then," said he, "shall I live in perpetual anxiety and alarm, and suffer my assassin in the mean time to walk abroad at his ease? Shall he go unpunished, after having conspired against my life, a life I have hitherto preserved in so many civil wars, and so many battles, both by land and sea? And after I have settled the universal peace of the world, shall this man be pardoned, who has conspired not only to murder, but to sacrifice me?" For the conspiracy was to kill him at sacrifice. After which, remaining for some time silent, he began again louder, and exclaiming against himself, said, "Why livest thou, if it be for the good of many that thou shouldst die? Must there be no end of thy revenge and cruelty? Is thy life of so great value that so many mischiefs must be done to preserve it?" His wife Livia, seeing him in this perplexity, "Will you take a woman's counsel?" said she. "Do as the physicians do, who, when the ordinary recipes will do no good, make trial of the contrary. By severity you have hitherto prevailed nothing; Lepidus has followed Salvidienus; Murena, Lepidus; Cæpio, Murena; and Egnatius, Cæpio. Begin now and try how gentleness and clemency will succeed. Cinna is guilty, forgive him; he will never henceforth have the heart to hurt thee, and it will add to thy glory." Augustus was glad that he had met with an advocate of his own humour; wherefore having thanked his wife, and in the morning countermanded the friends he had summoned to council, he commanded Cinna all alone to be brought to him; who, being come, and a chair by his appointment set him,[2] and having commanded every one else out of the room, he spoke to him after this manner: "In the first place, Cinna, I demand of thee patient audience; do not interrupt me in what I am about to say, and I will afterwards give thee full time and leisure to answer. Thou knowest, Cinna, that having taken thee prisoner in the enemy's camp, and though then wert thyself mine enemy, and born so, I gave thee thy life, restored thee thy estate, and by degrees put thee in so good a position that the victorious envied the conquered. The sacerdotal office, which thou madest suit to me for, I conferred upon thee, after having denied it to others, whose fathers have ever borne arms in my service. Having done all this for thee, thou hast undertaken to kill me." At which Cinna crying out that he was far from entertaining so wicked a thought: "Thou dost not keep thy promise, Cinna," continued Augustus, "that thou wouldst not interrupt me. Yes, thou hast undertaken to murder me in such a place, such a day, in such and such company, and in such a manner." At which words seeing Cinna astonished and silent, not upon the account of his promise so to be, but interdict with the conscience of his crime: "Why," proceeded Augustus, "to what end wouldst thou do it? Is it to be emperor? Believe me the republic is in a very bad condition, if I am the only man betwixt thee and the empire. Thou art not able so much as to defend thy own house, and but the other day wast baffled in a suit by the opposed interest of a manumitted slave. What, hast thou neither means nor power in any other thing, but only to attempt against Cæsar? I will resign the empire, if there is no other but I to obstruct thy hopes: but can'st thou believe that Paulus, that Fabius, that the Cassii and the Servilii, and so many noble Romans, not only so in title, but who by their virtue honour their nobility, would endure thee?" After this, and a great deal more that he said to him (for he was more than two hours speaking), "Go, Cinna, go thy way," said he, "I again give thee that life as a traitor and a parricide which I once before gave thee as an enemy. Let friendship from this time forward begin betwixt us, and let us try to make it appear whether I have given, or thou hast received, thy life with the better faith;" and so departed from him. Some time after he raised him to the consular dignity, complaining that he had not had the confidence to demand it; had him ever after for his very great friend, and was at last made by him sole heir to his estates.[3] Now from the time of this affair, which befel Augustus in the fortieth year of his age, he never had any conspiracy or attempt against him, and therein reaped the due reward of this his exemplary clemency. But it did not so well succeed with our prince;[4] his lenity did not secure him from afterwards falling into the toils of the like treason: so vain and frivolous a thing is human prudence; and, in spite of all our projects, counsels, and precautions, fortune will still be mistress of events. We repute physicians fortunate when they hit upon a lucky cure, as if there was no other art but theirs that could not stand upon its own legs, and whose foundations are too weak to support itself upon its basis, and as if no other art stood in need of fortune's hand to assist in its operations. For my part, I think of physic as much good or ill as any one would have me: for, thanks be to God, we have no traffic together. I am of a quite contrary humour to other men, for I always despise it; and when I am sick, instead of recanting, or entering into composition with it, I begin yet more to hate and fear it, telling those who importune me to take physic that they must at least give me time to recover my strength and health, that I may be the better able to support and encounter the violence and danger of the potion. I let nature work, supposing her to be sufficiently armed with teeth and claws to defend herself when attacked, and to uphold that contexture, the dissolution of which she flies and abhors. For I am afraid lest, instead of assisting her when grappled and struggling with the disease, I should assist her adversary, and give her more work to do.

[1] Dampmartin, La Fortune de la Cour, ii.

[2] This circumstance, expressly noted by Seneca, is not immaterial, because it shews us the manners of that age; and therefore I think that the celebrated Corneille did well to make use of it in his tragedy of Cinna. A king who should think it derogatory to his royalty ever to see his subjects sitting in his presence would have but a very diminutive idea of grandeur, which does not depend on distinctions of this kind. A king, truly respectable, may freely dispense with this liberty, without risking the loss of any thing, any more than Augustus, Trajan, or Marcus Aurelius. Coste.

Montaigne's opinion of physic.

Now, I say, that not in physic only, but in several other more certain arts, fortune has a great share. The poetic sallies that ravish and transport the author out of himself, why should we not attribute them to his good fortune, since the poet himself confesses they exceed his capacity, and acknowledges them to proceed from something else than himself, and that he has them no more in his power than the orators say they have those extraordinary motions and agitations that sometimes push them beyond their design. It is the same in painting, where touches shall sometimes slip from the hand of the painter, so surpassing both his fancy and his art as to beget his own admiration and astonishment. Fortune does yet more clearly manifest the share she has in all things of this kind, in the graces and elegances which are found in them, not only beyond the intention, but even without the knowledge of the artist. An intelligent reader does often find out in other men's writings other perfections, and invest them with a better sense and higher construction, and more quaint expression, than the author himself either intended or perceived.

Fortune, or chance, has sometimes much to do in successful sallies of poetry; and of painting.

And, as to military enterprizes, every one sees how great a hand fortune has in them all. Even in our counsels and deliberations there must certainly be something of chance and good luck mixed with human prudence, for all that our wisdom can do alone is no great matter; the more piercing, quick, and apprehensive it is, the weaker it finds itself, and is by so much more apt to mistrust its own virtue. I am of Sylla's opinion,[1] and when I more strictly and nearer hand examine the most glorious exploits of war, I perceive, methinks, that those who carry them on make use of counsel and debate only for custom's sake, and leave the best part of the enterprize to fortune; and, relying upon her favour and assistance, transgress at every turn the bounds of military conduct, and the rules of war. There happen sometimes accidental alacrities and strange furies in their deliberations, that for the most part prompt them to follow the worst and worst grounded counsels, and that swell their courage beyond the limits of reason: whence it has fallen out that many great captains of antiquity, to justify their rash determinations, have been forced to tell their soldiers that they were by some inspiration and good omen encouraged and invited to such attempts.[2]

Wherefore, in this doubt and uncertainty that the short-sightedness of human wisdom to see and chuse the best (by reason of the difficulties that the various accidents and circumstances of things bring along with them), does perplex us withal, the surest way, in my opinion, even did no other consideration invite us to it, were to pitch upon that course wherein is the greatest appearance of honesty and justice, and, not being certain which is the shortest, to go the straightest and most direct way; as in the two examples I have just mentioned, there is no question but that it was more noble and generous in him who had received the offence to pardon it than to do otherwise; and if the former miscarried in it, it was not the fault of his good intention: neither does any one know if he had proceeded otherwise, whether by that means he had avoided the end his destiny had appointed for him; and he had only lost the glory of so generous an act.

The course which must be taken in cases the event of which is uncertain.

You will find in history many who have been under this fear, and who for the most part have taken the course to meet and prevent conspiracies by punishment and vengeance: but I find very few who have reaped any advantage by this proceeding; witness so many Roman emperors. Whoever finds himself in this danger, need not expect much, either from his vigilance or his power; for how hard a thing is it for a man to secure himself from an enemy who lies concealed under the countenance of the most officious friend we have, and to discover the secret designs and inward thoughts of those who are continually doing us service? It is to no purpose to have a guard of foreigners about a man's person, or to be always fenced about with a pale of armed men; whosoever despises his own life is always master of that of another man.[3] And, moreover, this continual suspicion, that makes a prince jealous of every body, must, of necessity, be a marvellous torment to him. And, therefore, it was that Dion, being advertised that Callippus watched an opportunity to take away his life, had never the heart to enquire more particularly into it, saying that he had rather die than live in that misery that he must continually stand upon his guard, not only against his enemies but his friends also;[1] which Alexander much more spiritedly and effectively manifested when, having notice by a letter from Parmenio, that Philip, his most beloved physician, was, by Darius's money, corrupted to poison him, at the same time that he gave the letter to Philip to read, drank off the potion he had brought him.[2] Was not this resolution to express that if his friends had a mind to dispatch him out of the world he was willing to give them opportunity to do it? This prince is indeed the sovereign precedent of all daring actions; but I do not know whether there is another passage in his life wherein there is so much firmness as in this, nor so illustrious an image of greatness of mind.

Mistrust a sad condition.

Those who preach to princes so circumspect and vigilant a jealousy and distrust, under colour of security, preach to them ruin and dishonour. Nothing noble can ever be effected without danger. I know a person, naturally of great daring and courage, whose good fortune is continually marred by such persuasions as these, "that he must keep close amongst his own people, and keep those he knows are his friends continually about him; that he must not hearken to any reconciliation with his old enemies, that he must stand clear off, and not trust his person in hands stronger than his own, what promises or offers soever they make him, or what advantages soever he may see before him." And I know another who has unexpectedly secured his fortune by following quite the contrary advice.

Courage, the reputation and glory of which men seek with so greedy an appetite, represents and sets itself out, when need requires, as magnificently in a doublet as in a coat of mail; in a closet as well as in a camp; with the arm pendent as with the arm upraised: this over-circumspect and wary prudence is a mortal enemy to all high and generous exploits. Scipio, to sound the intentions of Syphax, leaving his army and abandoning Spain, not yet secure nor well settled in his new conquest, passed over into Africa, in two small vessels, to commit himself, in an enemy's country, to the power of a Barbarian King, to a faith untried and unknown, without obligation, without hostage, under the sole security of the greatness of his courage, his good fortune, and the promise of his high hopes.[3] Habita fides ipsam plerumque fidem obligat.[4] "Confidence generally inspires confidence."

Instances of the good effects of shewing confidence in disaffected troops.

In a life of ambition and eclât 'tis necessary to keep suspicion in check. Fear and diffidence invite and attract injury and offence. The most mistrustful of all our kings[5] established his affairs principally by voluntarily trusting his life and liberty into his enemy's hands, seeming to have an absolute confidence in them, to the end they might repose as great an assurance in him. Cæsar only opposed the authority of his countenance and the sharpness of his rebukes to his mutinous legions, armed against him, having that implicit confidence in himself and his fortune, that he feared not to commit and abandon himself to a seditious and rebellious army.

Stetit aggere fultus
Cespitis, intrepidus vultu; meruitque timeri,
Nil metuens.[6]

"Upon a parapet of turf he stood;
His manly face with resolution shone;
And froze the mutineers' rebellious blood,
Challenging fear from all, by fearing none."

But it is true, withal, that this undaunted assurance is not to be represented in its perfect and genuine form but by those whom the imagination of death, and the worst that can happen, does not affright; for to present it a pretended resolution, with a pale and doubtful countenance, doubting, uncertain, and trembling, for the service of an important reconciliation, will effect nothing to the purpose. 'Tis an excellent way to gain the heart and good-will of another to intrust one's self frankly to him, provided it be done without the constraint of necessity, and in such a way that one manifestly does it out of a pure and entire confidence in the party, at least, with a countenance clear from any cloud of suspicion. When I was a boy I saw a gentleman, who was governor of a great town, upon occasion of a popular commotion, not knowing what other course to take, go out of a place of very great strength and security, and commit himself to the mercy of a seditious rabble, in hopes, by that means, to appease the tumult before it grew to a head: but it was ill for him that he did so, for he was there miserably slain. But, nevertheless, I am not of opinion that he committed so great an error in going out as men commonly reproach his memory with, as he did in choosing a gentle and submissive way for effecting his purpose, and in endeavouring to quiet the storm, rather by obeying than commanding, and by entreaty rather than remonstrance. I am rather inclined to believe that a gracious severity, with a soldier-like way of commanding, full of security, and confidence suitable to the quality of his person and the dignity of his charge, would have succeeded better with him; at least, he had perished with greater decency and reputation. There is nothing so little to be hoped for from that many-headed monster, the mob, when stirred up, as humanity and good nature; it is much more capable of reverence and fear. I should also reproach him that, having taken a resolution which, in my judgment, was rather brave than rash, to expose himself, weak and defenceless, in this tempestuous sea of men; he ought to have carried out bolder, what he had begun, to the last; whereas, coming to discover his danger nearer hand, and his nose happening to bleed, the submissive and fawning countenance he had at first put on changed into another of fear and amazement, and shewing, both by his voice and eyes, his alarm and agitation, and endeavouring to withdraw and secure his person, this deportment more enflamed their fury, and soon brought the effects of it upon him.

Upon a certain occasion, I remember, it was determined there should be a general muster of several bodies of troops in arms (a very proper scene of secret revenge, for there is no place where such can be executed with greater safety), and there were public and manifest appearances that there was no safe coming for some, whose principal and necessary office it was to review the troops. Whereupon a consultation was called, and several counsels were proposed, as in a case that was not very nice and of important consequence. Mine was that they should, by all means, avoid giving any sign of suspicion, but that the officers who were most in danger should boldly go, and, with open and erect countenances, ride boldly and confidently through the files and divisions, and that instead of sparing fire (which the advice of the major part tended to), they should desire the captains to command the soldiers to give round and full volleys in honour of the spectators and not to save their powder. Which was accordingly done, and had so good an effect as to please and gratify the suspected troops, and thenceforth to beget a mutual and salutary confidence and intelligence amongst them.

I look upon Julius Cæsar's way of gaining men's affections to him as the best that can possibly be put in practice. First, he tried by clemency to make himself beloved even by his enemies, contenting himself, in detected conspiracies, only publicly to declare that he was acquainted with them; which being done, he took a noble resolution to await, without solicitude or fear, whatever might be the event, wholly resigning himself up to the protection of the gods and fortune; and, questionless, this was the state he was in at the time when he was killed.

Advice to a tyrant how to proceed against plots.

A stranger having publicly said that he could teach Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, an infallible way to find out and discover all the conspiracies his subjects should contrive against him, if he would give him a good sum of money for his pains; Dionysius, hearing of it, caused the man to be brought to him that he might learn an art so necessary to his preservation; and, having asked him by what art he might make such discoveries, the fellow made answer that all the art he knew was that he should give him a talent, and afterwards boast that he had obtained a singular secret from him. Dionysius liked the idea, and accordingly caused six hundred crowns to be counted out to him.[1] It was not likely he should give so great a sum to a person unknown, but as a reward for some extraordinary and very useful discovery, and the belief of this served to keep his enemies in awe. Princes, however, do very wisely to publish the informations they receive of all the practices against their lives, to possess men with an opinion that they have such good intelligence, and so many spies abroad, that nothing can be plotted against them but they have immediate notice of it. The Duke of Athens did a great many ridiculous things in establishing his new tyranny over Florence; but this, especially, was remarkable, that, having received the first intimation of the conspiracies the people were hatching against him, from Matteo di Moroso, one of the conspirators, he presently put him to death to stifle that rumour, that it might not be thought any of the city disliked his government.

I remember to have read a story of some Roman, of great quality, who, flying the tyranny of the triumvirate, had a thousand times, by the subtilty of as many inventions, escaped from falling into the hands of those that pursued him. It happened one day that a troop of horse, which was sent out to take him, passed close by a brake where he lay hid, and missed very narrowly of spying him; but he considering, upon the instant, the pains and difficulties wherein he had so long continued, to evade the strict and continual searches which were every day made for him, the little pleasure he could hope for in such a kind of life, and how much better it was for him to die once for all, than to be perpetually at this pass, he himself called them back, shewed them his hiding place, and voluntarily delivered himself up to their cruelty, in order to free both himself and them from farther trouble.[2] To invite a man's enemies to come and cut his throat was a resolution that appears a little extravagant and odd; and yet I think he did better to take that course than to live in a constant fever and apprehension of that for which there was no cure. But seeing all the precautions a man can take full of unquietness and uncertainty, 'tis better with a manly courage to prepare one's self for the worst that can happen, and to extract some consolation from this, that we are not certain the thing we fear will ever come to pass.

CHAPTER XXIV.

OF PEDANTRY.

Pedants obnoxious to men of mind.

I WAS often, when a boy, wonderfully concerned to see in the Italian farces, a pedant always brought in for the fool of the play, and that the title of Magister was in no greater reverence amongst us; for, being delivered up to their tuition, what could I do less than to be jealous of their honour and reputation? I sought, I confess, to excuse them by the natural incompatibility betwixt the vulgar sort and men of a finer thread, both in judgment and knowledge, forasmuch as they go quite a contrary way to one another: but in this the thing I most stumbled at was that the bravest men were those who most despised them; witness our famous Du Bellay,

Mais je hay par sur tout un sçavoir pedantesque.[1]

And they used to do so in former times; for Plutarch says that Græcian and Scholar were names of reproach and contempt among the Romans.[2] And since, with the better experience of age, I find they were much in the right on't, and that magis magnos clericos non sunt magis magnos sapientes.[3] "The greatest clerks are not the wisest men." But whence it should come to pass that a mind enriched with the knowledge of so many things should not become more quick and sprightly, and that a gross and vulgar understanding should yet inhabit there without correcting and improving itself, where all the reasoning and judgments of the greatest minds the world ever had are collected and stored up, I am yet to seek. To admit into one's own brain such large portions of the brains of others, such great and high fancies (a young lady, one of our greatest princesses, said once to me, speaking of a certain person), one's own must necessarily be crowded and squeezed together into a less compass to make room for the others. I should be apt to conclude that as plants are suffocated and drowned with too much moisture, and lamps with too much oil, so is the active part of the understanding with too much study and matter, which, being embarrassed and confounded with the diversity of things, is deprived of the force and power to disengage itself; and by the pressure of this weight is bowed, subjected, and rendered of no use. But it is quite otherwise, for a soul stretches and dilates itself the more it fills. And thus, in the examples of elder times, we see men excellent at public business, great captains, and great statesmen, very learned withal; whereas the mere philosophers, a sort of men retired from all public affairs, have been often laughed at by the comic writers of their own times; their opinions and singularity of manners making them appear, to men of another method of living, ridiculous and absurd.

Mere philosophers ridiculed by the comic writers.

And, in truth, would you make them judges of a law-suit, or of the actions of a man, they are ready to take it upon them; and straight begin to examine if he has life, if he has motion, if man be any other than an ox: what it is to do and to suffer, and what animals law and justice are? Do they speak of the magistrate or to him? 'Tis with a rude, irreverent, and indecent liberty. Do they hear a prince or a king commended for his virtue? They make no more of him than of a shepherd or neatherd, a lazy Corydon, that busies himself only about milking and shearing his herds and flocks; and this after a ruder manner than even the shepherd himself would. Do you repute any man the greater for being lord of two thousand acres of land? They laugh at such a pitiful pittance, laying claim themselves to the whole world for their possession. Do you boast of your nobility and blood, being descended from seven rich successive ancestors? They will look upon you with an eye of contempt, as men who have not a right idea of the universal image of Nature, and that do not consider how many predecessors every one of us has had, rich, poor, kings, slaves, Greeks, and barbarians. And though you were the fiftieth descent from Hercules, they look upon it as a great vanity so highly to value this, which is only a gift of fortune. And therefore did the vulgar sort nauseate them, as men ignorant of first principles, as presumptuous and insolent.[4]

But this Platonic picture is far different from that these pedants are presented by: for those were envied for raising themselves above the common sort of men, for despising the ordinary actions and offices of life, for having assumed a particular and inimitable way of living, and for using a certain bombast and obsolete language quite different from the ordinary way of speaking. But these are contemned for being as much below the usual form, as incapable of public employment; for leading the life, and conforming themselves to the mean and vile manners, of the vulgar. Odi homines ignava opera, philosophica sententia.[5] "I hate men who talk like philosophers, but do nothing."

[4] Plato, Theætetes. Montaigne, however, has greatly mistaken Plato's sentiment, who says here no more than this: that the philosopher is so ignorant of what his neighbour does that he scarce knows whether he is a man or some other animal: τὸν τοιοῦτον ὁ μὲν πλησίον καὶ ὁ γείτων λέληθεν, ἡμιόνου ὅτι πεύσεται, ἀλλὰ λίγου καὶ εἰ ἀνθρώπος ἐστιν, ἢ τι ἄλλο θρέμμα.

science, were yet much greater in action. And, as it is said of the geometrician of Syracuse,[1] who having been disturbed from his contemplation, to put some of his skill in practice for the defence of his country, that he suddenly set on foot dreadful and prodigious engines, that wrought effects beyond all human expectation; himself notwithstanding disdained all this mechanical work, thinking in this he had violated the dignity of his art, of which these performances of his he accounted but trivial experiments;—so they, whenever they have been put upon the proof of action, have been seen to fly to so high a pitch as made it very well appear their souls were strangely elevated and enriched with the knowledge of things. But some of them, seeing the reins of government in the hands of ignorant and unskilful men, have avoided all places and interest in the management of affairs; and he who demanded of Crates, how long it was necessary to philosophise, received this answer: "Till our armies are no more commanded by fools."[2] Heraclitus resigned the royalty[3] to his brother; and to the Ephesians, who reproached him that he spent his time in playing with children before the temple: "Is it not better," said he, "to do so than to sit at the helm of affairs in your company?" Others, having their imagination advanced above the thoughts of the world and fortune, have looked upon the tribunals of justice, and even the thrones of kings, with an eye of contempt and scorn; insomuch that Empedocles refused the royalty that the Agrigentines offered him.[4] Thales, once inveighing against the pains men put themselves to to become rich, was answered by one in the company that he did like the fox, who found fault with what he could not obtain. Whereupon he had a mind, for the jest's sake, to shew them the contrary; and having, upon this occasion, for once made a muster of all his learning and capacity, wholly to employ them in the service of profit, he set a traffic on foot which in one year brought him as great riches as the most experienced in that trade could, with all their industry, have raked together in the whole course of their lives.[5] That which Aristotle reports of some who said of him, of Anaxagoras, and others of their profession, that they were wise, but not prudent, in not applying their study to more profitable things, besides that I do not well digest this nice distinction, will not serve to excuse my pedants; for to see the low and necessitous fortune wherewith they are content, we have rather reason to pronounce that they are neither wise nor prudent.

But, letting this first reason alone, I think it better to say that this inconvenience proceeds from their applying themselves the wrong way to the study of sciences; and that, after the manner we are instructed, it is no wonder if neither the scholars nor the masters become, though more learned, ever the wiser or more fit for business. In plain truth, the cares and expense our parents are at in our education point at nothing but to furnish our heads with knowledge; but not a word of judgment and virtue. Cry out to the people of one that passes by, "O! what a learned!" and of another, "O! what a good man goes there," they will not fail to turn their eyes, and address their respect to the former.[6] There should then be a third crier, "O the blockheads!" Men are apt to enquire, "Does such a one understand Greek and Latin? Is he a poet? or does he write prose?" But whether he be better or more discreet, which ought to be the main point, is enquired into last; we should rather examine who is better learned, than who is more learned.

A pedantic mode of learning objected to.

We only toil and labour to stuff the memory, and in the mean time leave the conscience and the understanding unfurnished and void. And, like birds who fly abroad to forage for grain, and bring it home in their beak, without tasting it themselves, to feed their young; so our pedants go picking knowledge here and there out of several authors, and hold it at the tongue's end, only to distribute it amongst their pupils. And here I cannot but smile to think how I have paid off myself in showing the foppery of this kind of learning, who myself am so manifest an example; for do I not the same thing throughout almost this whole book? I go here and there, culling out of several books the sentences that best please me, not to keep them (for I have no memory to retain them in), but to transplant them into this; where, to say the truth, they are no more mine than in their first places. We are, I conceive, knowing only in present knowledge, and not at all in what is past, no more than in that which is to come. But the worst of it is, their scholars and pupils are no better nourished by it than themselves: it makes no deeper impression upon them than on the other, but passes from hand to hand, only to make a show, to be tolerable company, and to tell pretty stories; like a counterfeit coin, of no other use or value but as counters to reckon with, or set up at cards. Apud alios loqui didicerunt, non ipsi aliorum.[1] "They have learned to speak from others, not with themselves." Non est loquendum, sed gubernandum.[2] "The thing is not to talk, but to govern." Nature, to shew that there is nothing barbarous where she has the sole command, does oftentimes, in nations where art has the least to do, cause productions of wit, such as may rival the greatest effects of art whatever. In relation to what I am now speaking of, the Gascon proverb, derived from a reed-pipe, is very quaint and subtle: Bouha prou bouha, mas à remuda lous dits qu'em. "You may blow till your eyes start out; but if once you offer to stir your fingers, you will be at the end of your lesson." We can say, Cicero says thus; These were the manners of Plato; These are the very words of Aristotle. But what do we say ourselves that is our own? What do we do?—what do we judge? A parrot could say as much as that.

Pedants only aim at making a vain display of their learning.

The stupidity of a Roman, who fancied himself a man of learning, because he had learned men in his pay.

This kind of talking puts me in mind of that rich gentleman of Rome, who had been solicitous, with very great expense, to procure men that were excellent in all sorts of science, whom he had always attending his person, to the end that when, amongst his friends, any occasion fell out of speaking on any subject whatsoever, they might supply his place, and be ready to prompt him, one with a sentence of Seneca, another with a verse of Homer, and so forth, every one according to his talent; and he fancied this knowledge to be his own, because 'twas in the heads of those who lived upon his bounty.[3] As they also do whose learning consists in having noble libraries. I know one who, when I question him about his learning, he presently calls for a book to shew me, and would not venture to tell me so much as that he had the piles in his posteriors, till first he had consulted his dictionary what piles and posteriors are.

No learning of use but that which we make our own.

We take other men's knowledge and opinions upon truth, and that's all, wherein we should make them our own. We are in this very like him who, having need of fire, went to a neighbour's house to fetch it; and, finding a very good one there, sat down to warm himself, without remembering to carry any with him home.[4] What good does it do us to have the stomach full of meat, if it does not digest and be incorporated with us; if it does not nourish and support us? Can we imagine that Lucullus, whom letters, without any experience,[5] made so great a leader, learned to be so after this perfunctory manner? We suffer ourselves to lean and rely so very strongly upon the arm of another, that we prejudice our own strength and vigour. Would I fortify myself against the fear of death? It must be at the expense of Seneca. Would I extract consolation for myself or my friend? I borrow it from Cicero; whereas I might have found it in myself, had I been trained up to make use of my own reason. I have no taste for this relative and mendicant understanding; for though we could become learned by other men's reading, a man can never be wise but by his own wisdom.

Μισῶ σοφιστὴν ὅστις οὐχ αὑτῷ σοφός.[6]

"Who in his own concern's not wise,
I that man's wisdom do despise."

From whence Ennius, Nequidquam sapere sapientem, qui ipse sibi prodesse non quiret.[7] "That wise man knows nothing who cannot profit himself by his wisdom." Non enim paranda nobis solum, sed fruenda sapientia est.[8] "For wisdom is not only to be acquired, but to be made use of."

Si cupidus, si
Vanus, et luganca quantumvis mollior agna.[9]
"If he be greedy, lying, or effeminate."

Dionysius laughed at the grammarians, who cudgelled their brains to enquire into the miseries of Ulysses, and were ignorant of their own; at musicians, who were so exact in tuning their instruments, and never tuned their manners; and at orators, who studied to declare what was justice, but never took care to do it.[10] If the mind be not better disposed, if the judgment be no better settled, I had much rather my scholar had spent his time at tennis, for at least his body would by that means be in better exercise and breath. Do but observe him when he comes back from school, after fifteen or sixteen years that he has been there: there is nothing so awkward and maladroit, so unfit for company or employment; and all that you shall find he has got is that his Latin and Greek have only made him a greater and more conceited blockhead than when he went from home. He should bring back his mind replete with sound literature, and he brings it only swelled and puffed up with vain and empty shreds and snatches of learning, and really nothing more in him than he had before.

His memory was so bad that he every now and then forgot the names of Ulysses, Achilles, and Priam, though he had known them as well as we knew our pedagogues; yet he had a mind to be thought learned, and invented this compendious method, viz. he bought slaves at a great price, one who was master of Homer, another of Hesiod, and nine of lyric poetry, to whom he every now and then had recourse for verses, which in rehearsing he often stopped in the middle of a verse, yet he thought he knew as much as any one in the house did.—Seneca, Epis. 27.

[10] In all the editions of Montaigne, except that of Coste, Dionysius is mentioned; yet the wise reflections which Montaigne here ascribes to Dionysius were made by Diogenes the Cynic, as may be seen in that philosopher's life, written by Diogenes Laertius.

The character of pretenders to learning.

These pedants of ours, as Plato says of the Sophists, their cousin-germans, are, of all men living they who most pretend to be useful to mankind, and who alone of all men not only do not better and improve what is committed to them, as a carpenter or a mason would do, but make them much worse, and make them pay for being made so, to boot. If the rule which Protagoras proposed to his pupils were followed, either that they should give him his own demand, or declare upon oath in the temple how much they valued the profit they had received under his tuition, and satisfy him accordingly;[1] our pedagogues would find themselves sadly gravelled, especially if they were to be judged by the testimony of my experience. Our vulgar Perigordian patois does pleasantly call these pretenders to learning "lettre-ferits," letter-marked, men on whom letters have stamped and stunned by the blow of a mallet, as 'twere; and, in truth, for the most part they appear to have a soft place in their sculls, and to be deprived even of common sense. For you see the husbandman and the cobler go simply and plainly about their business, speaking only of what they know and understand; whereas these fellows, in seeking to make a parade and a flourish with this ridiculous knowledge of theirs, that swims and floats in the superficies of the brain, are perpetually perplexing and entangling themselves in their own nonsense. They speak fine words sometimes, 'tis true, but leave somebody that is wiser to apply them. They are wonderfully well acquainted with Galen, but not at all with the disease of the patient: they stun you with a long ribble-row of laws, but understand nothing of the case in hand; they have the theories of all things, but 'tis some one else must put them in practice.

I have sat by when a friend of mine, in my own house, for sport's sake, has with one of these fellows run on a heap of nonsensical galimatias, patched up of all sorts of disjointed pieces, without head or tail, saving that he now and then interlarded here and there some terms that had relation to their dispute, and held the blockhead in play a whole afternoon together, who all the while thought he had answered pertinently and learnedly to all his objections. And yet this was a man of letters and reputation, and nothing less than one of the long robe.

Vos O patricius sanguis, quos vivere fas est
Occipiti cæco, posticæ occurrite sannæ.[2]

"But you, patrician youths! whose sculls are blind, Watch well your jeering friends, and look behind."

Whosoever shall narrowly pry into and thoroughly sift this sort of people wherewith the world is so pestered, will, as I have done, find that, for the most part, they neither understand others nor themselves; and that their memories are full enough 'tis true, but the judgment totally void and empty; some excepted, whose own nature has of itself formed them into better fashion. As I have observed, for example, in Adrian Turnebus, who having never made other profession than that of mere learning only, in which he was, in my opinion, the greatest man that has been these thousand years, had nothing at all in him of the pedant, but the wearing of his gown, and a little exterior behaviour, that could not be civilised to the garb, which are nothing; and I hate our people, who can worse endure an ill-cut robe than an ill-fashioned mind, and by the bow a man makes, by his behaviour, and even by the shape of his boots, will pretend to tell what sort of man he is. For within all this there was not a more refined and polished soul living upon earth. I have often purposely put him upon arguments quite wide of his profession, wherein I found he had so clear an insight, so quick an apprehension, and so solid a judgment, that a man would have thought he had never practised any other thing but arms, or been all his life employed in affairs of state. 'Tis these are great and vigorous natures; that can keep themselves upright in spite of a pedantic education. But it is not enough that our education does not spoil us; it should alter us for the better.

Testimony of Adrianus Turnebus.

Some of our parliaments when they are to admit officers, examine them only as to their learning, to which some others also add a trial of their understanding, by asking their judgment of some case in law, of which the latter, methinks, proceeds with the better method: for although both are necessary, and that it is very requisite the men should be defective in neither; yet, in truth, knowledge is not so absolutely necessary as judgment, and the last may make shift without the other, but the other never without this. For as the Greek verse says,

Knowledge of no avail without judgment.

Ὡς οὐδὲν ἡ μάθησις ἦν μὴ νοῦς παρῇ.[4]

"To what use serves learning, if the understanding be away?" Would to God that, for the sake of justice, our courts of judicature were as well furnished with understanding and conscience as they are with knowledge. Non vitæ, sed scholæ discimus.[5] "We do not study how to live, but how to dispute." Whereas we are not to tie learning to the soul, but to work and incorporate them together; not to tincture it therewith only, but to give it a thorough and perfect dye; and if it will not take colour, and meliorate its imperfect state, it were, without doubt, much better to let it alone. It is a dangerous weapon, and very likely to wound its master, if put into an awkward and unskilful hand. Ut fuerit melius non didicisse.[1] "So that it were better never to have learned at all."

And this, perhaps, is the reason why neither we, nor indeed the christian religion, require much learning in women; and that Francis, Duke of Brittany, son of John the Fifth, to one that was talking with him about his marriage with Isabella, the daughter of Scotland, and added that she was homely bred, and without any manner of learning, made answer, "That he liked her the better, and that a woman was wise enough if she could distinguish between her husband's shirt and his doublet."

Whether learning be absolutely necessary.

So that it is no so great a wonder, as they make of it, that our ancestors had letters in no greater esteem, and that even to this day they are but rarely met with in the privy-councils of our princes: and if this end and design of acquiring riches, which is the only thing we propose to ourselves, by the means of law, physic, pedantry, and even divinity itself, did not uphold and keep them in credit, you would, without doubt, see them as poor and unregarded as ever. And what loss either, if they neither instruct us to think well, nor to do well! Postquam docti prodierunt, boni desunt.[2] "After once they become learned, they cease to be good." All other knowledge is hurtful to him who has not the science of honesty and goodness.

Letters in France but little studied, except by those who sought to live by them.

But the reason I glanced upon but now, may it not also proceed hence, that our studies in France having almost no other aim but profit, few of those who by nature would seem born to offices and employments, rather of glory than gain, addicting themselves to letters; or for so little a while, being taken from their studies before they can come to have any taste of them, to a profession that has nothing to do with books, that there commonly remain no other to apply themselves wholly to learning but people of mean condition, who seek a livelihood thereby; and by such people whose souls are, both by nature and education, and domestic example, of the basest metal, the fruits of knowledge are immaturely gathered, and ill digested. For it is not the proper business of knowledge to enlighten a soul that is dark of itself; nor to make a blind man to see. Her business is not to find a man eyes, but to guide, govern, and direct his steps, provided he has sound feet and straight legs to go upon. Knowledge is an excellent drug, but no drug has virtue enough to preserve itself from corruption and decay, if the vessel be tainted and impure wherein it is put to keep. Such a one may have a sight clear and good enough, who yet looks asquint, and consequently sees what is good, but does not follow it, and sees knowledge, but makes no use of it. Plato's principal institution, in his Republic, is to fit his citizens with employments suitable to their nature. Nature can do all, and does all. Cripples are very unfit for exercises of the body, and lame souls for exercises of the mind. Degenerate and vulgar souls are unworthy of philosophy. If we see a shoemaker with his shoes out at the toes, we say, "It is no wonder; for, commonly, none go worse shod than they." In like manner, experience doth often present us a physician worse physicked, a divine worse reformed, and most frequently a scholar of less sufficiency, than another.

Aristo of Chios had reason to say that philosophers did their auditors harm, forasmuch as most of those that heard them were not capable of making any benefit of their instructions, and if they did not apply them to good, would certainly apply them to ill: ἀσώτους ex Aristippi, acerbos ex Zenonis schola exire.[3] "They proceeded debauchees from the school of Aristippus, and sour churls from that of Zeno."

Education of the Persians;

In that excellent institution that Xenophon attributes to the Persians, we find that they taught their children virtue, as other nations do letters. Plato tells us[4] that the eldest son in their royal succession was thus brought up; as soon as he was born he was delivered, not to women, but to eunuchs of the greatest authority about their kings for their virtue, whose charge it was to keep his body healthful and in good plight; and after he came to seven years of age, to teach him to ride, and to go a hunting; when he arrived at fourteen, he was transferred into the hands of four men, the most noted in the kingdom for wisdom, justice, temperance, and valour; of whom the first was to instruct him in religion, the second to be always upright and sincere, the third to subdue his appetites and desires, and the fourth to despise all danger. It is a thing worthy of very great consideration that, in that excellent, and, in truth, for its perfection, prodigious form of civil government set down by Lycurgus, though solicitous of the education of children, as a thing of the greatest concern, and even in the very seat of the Muses, he should make so little mention of learning; as if their generous youths disdaining all other subjection, but that of virtue only, ought to be supplied, instead of tutors to read to them arts and sciences, with such masters only as should instruct them in valour, prudence, and justice; an example that Plato has followed in his laws. The manner of their discipline was to propound to them questions upon their judgment of men, and of their actions; and if they commended or condemned this or that person, or fact, they were to give a reason for so doing. By which means they at once sharpened their understanding, and learned what was right and lawful. Astyages, in Xenophon, asking her son Cyrus to give her an account of his last lesson, he made answer thus: "A great boy in the school, having a short cassock, by force took a longer from another that was not so tall as he, and gave him his own in exchange; whereupon I being appointed judge of the controversy, gave judgment that I thought it best each should keep the coat he had, for that they were both better fitted now than they were before. Upon which my master told me I had done ill, in that I had only considered the fitness of the garments, whereas I ought to have considered the justice of the thing, which required that no one should have any thing forcibly taken from him that is his own."[1] And Cyrus added that he was whipped for his pains, as we are in our villages for forgetting the first Aorist of τυπτω. My pedant must make me a very learned oration, indeed, in genere demonstrativo, before he can persuade me that his school is as good as that. They knew how to go the readiest way to work: and seeing that the sciences, when most rightly applied and best understood, can but teach us prudence, moral honesty, and resolution, they thought fit to initiate their children at once with the knowledge of effects, and to instruct them, not by hear-say and by rote, but by the experiment of action, in forming and moulding them; not only by words and precepts, but chiefly by works and examples; to the end it might not be a knowledge of the mind only, but a complexion and a habit; not an acquisition, but a natural possession. One asking, to this purpose, Agesilaus, what he thought most proper for boys to learn? "What they ought to do when they come to be men," said he.[2] It is no wonder if such an institution produced such admirable effects.

The difference betwixt the instruction given to the children of Sparta, and to those of Athens.

They used to go, it is said, to the other cities of Greece for rhetoricians, painters, and music-masters; but to Lacedæmon for legislators, magistrates, and generals of armies. At Athens they learned to speak well, and here to do well; there to disengage themselves from a sophistical argument, and to unravel ensnaring syllogisms; here to evade the baits and allurements of pleasure, and with a noble courage and resolution to confute and conquer the menaces of fortune and death; those cudgelled their brains about words, these made it their business to enquire into things; there was an eternal babble of the tongue, here a continual exercise of the soul. And therefore it is nothing strange if, when Antipater demanded of them fifty children for hostages, they made answer, quite contrary to what we should do, that they would rather give him twice as many full grown men, so much did they value the loss of their country's education.[3] When Agesilaus invited Xenophon to send his children to Sparta to be bred, "It is not," said he, "there to learn logic or rhetoric, but to be instructed in the noblest of all sciences, namely, the science to obey and to command."[4] It is very pleasant to see Socrates, after his manner, rallying Hippias, who recounts to him what a world of money he had got, especially in certain little villages of Sicily, by teaching school, while he got never a penny at Sparta: "What a sottish and stupid people," says Socrates, "are they, without sense or understanding, who know neither mensuration nor numeration, and make no account either of grammar or poetry, and only busy themselves in studying the genealogies and successions of their kings, the foundation, rise, and declension of states, and such old wives' tales."[5] After which, having made Hippias acknowledge the excellency of their form of public administration, and the felicity and virtue of their private life, he leaves him to guess at the conclusion he makes of the inutility of his pedantic arts.

How Socrates bantered a sophist who had got nothing at Sparta.

Examples have demonstrated unto us that, both in that military government, and all others of the like nature, the study of the sciences does more soften and enervate the courage of men than fortify and incite it. The most potent empire that at this day appears to be in the whole world, is that of the Turks, a people equally remarkable for their estimation of arms, and the contempt of letters. Rome was more valiant before she grew so learned; and the most warlike nations of our time are the most ignorant; of which the Scythians, Parthians, and the great Tamerlane may serve for sufficient proof. When the Goths over-ran Greece, the only thing that preserved all the libraries from the fire was that some one possessed them with an opinion that they should do well to leave this kind of furniture entire to the enemy, as being most proper to divert them from the exercise of arms, and to fix them to a lazy and sedentary life.[6] When our King Charles the Eighth, almost without striking a blow, saw himself possessed of the kingdom of Naples, and a considerable part of Tuscany, the nobility about him attributed this unexpected facility of conquest to this, that the princes and nobles of Italy more studied to render themselves ingenious and learned, than vigorous and warlike.

The study of the sciences enervates courage.

CHAPTER XXV.

OF THE EDUCATION OF CHILDREN.

To Madame Diana de Foix, Countess of Gurson.

Montaigne's account of what he knew.

I NEVER yet saw that father who, let his son be never so decrepid or scald-pated, would not own him: not but that, unless he were totally besotted and blinded with his paternal affection, he does not well enough discern his defects; but because, notwithstanding all faults, he is still his. Just so it is with me. I see better than any other that these things I write are but the idle whimsies of a man that has only nibbled upon the outward crust of learning in his nonage, and only retained a general and formless image of it, a little snatch of every thing, and nothing of the whole à la Françoise; for I know, in general, that there is a science of physic, a science of law, four parts in mathematics, and I have a general notion what all these aim at; and, peradventure, I know too what the sciences in general pretend unto, in order to the service of human life; but to dive farther than that, and to have cudgelled my brains in the study of Aristotle, the monarch of all our modern learning, or particularly addicted myself to any one science, I have never done it: neither is there any one art of which I am able to draw the first lineaments; insomuch that there is not a boy of the lowest form in a school that may not pretend to be wiser than I, who am not able to pose him in his first lesson, which, if I am at any time forced upon, I am necessitated in my own defence to ask him some universal questions, such as may serve to try his natural understanding; a lesson as strange and unknown to him as his is to me.

Plutarch and Seneca the favourite books of Montaigne.

I never seriously settled myself to the reading of any book of solid learning, but Plutarch and Seneca; and there, like the Danaides, I eternally fill, and it as constantly runs out; something of which drops upon this paper, but very little or nothing stays behind with me. History is my delight, as to reading, or else poetry, for which I have, I confess, a particular kindness and esteem: for, as Cleanthes said, as the voice, forced through the narrow passage of a trumpet, comes out more forceable and shrill; so, methinks, a sentence couched in the harmony of verse, darts more briskly upon the understanding, and strikes[1] both my ear and apprehension with a smarter and more pleasing power. As to the natural parts I have, of which this is the specimen, I find them to bow under the burthen; my fancy and judgment do but grope in the dark, tripping and stumbling in their way, and when I have gone as far as I can, I am in no degree satisfied, for I discover still a new and greater extent of land before me, but with troubled and imperfect sight, and wrapt up in clouds that I am not able to penetrate. And taking upon me to write indifferently of whatever comes into my head, and therein making use of nothing but my own proper and natural means, if I happened, as I often do, accidentally to meet in any good author the same heads and common places upon which I have attempted to write, (as I did but lately in Plutarch's Discourse of the Force of the Imagination), to see myself so weak and miserable, so heavy and sleepy, in comparison with those better writers, I at once pity and despise myself. Yet do I flatter and please myself with this, that my opinions have often the honour and good fortune to tally with theirs, and that I follow in the same paths, though at a very great distance, saying, they are quite right; I am farther satisfied to find that I have a quality, which every one is not blest withal, which is to discern the vast difference betwixt them and me; and notwithstanding all that, suffer my own ideas, poor as they are, to run on in their career, without mending or plaistering up the defects that this comparison has laid open to my own view. And in truth a man had need of a good strong back to keep pace with these people. The indiscreet scribblers of our times, who, amongst their laborious nothings, insert whole sections, paragraphs, and pages, out of ancient authors, with a design by that means to do honour to their own writings, do quite contrary; for the infinite dissimilitude of ornaments renders the complexions of their own compositions so pale, sallow, and deformed, that they lose much more than they get.

Modern writers discover the poverty of their genius, by pilfering the ancients.

The philosophers, Chrysippus and Epicurus, were, in this, of two quite contrary humours; for the first did not only in his books mix the passages and sayings of other authors, but entire pieces, and in one, the whole Medea of Euripides; which gave Apollodorus occasion to say "that should a man pick out of his writings all that was none of his, he would leave nothing but blank paper:"[2] whereas, Epicurus, quite contrary, in three hundred volumes that he left behind him, has not so much as one quotation.[3]

A case in point occurred the other day: I was reading a French book, where, after I had a long time been dragging over a great many words, so dull, so insipid, so void of all wit or common sense that, indeed, they were only words, after a long and tedious travel I came, at last, to meet with a piece that was lofty, rich, and elevated to the very clouds. Now had I found either the declivity easy, or the ascent more sloping, there had been some excuse; but it was so perpendicular a precipice, and so wholly cut off from the rest of the work, that by the first words I found myself flying into the other world, and thence discovered the vale whence I came, so deep and low that I had never since the heart to descend into it any more. If I should set out my discourses with such rich spoils as these, the plagiarism would too manifestly discover the imperfection of my own writing. To reprehend the fault in others that I am guilty of myself appears to me no more unreasonable than to condemn, as I often do, those of others in myself. They are to be every where reproved, and ought to have no sanctuary allowed them. I know very well how impudently I myself, at every turn, attempt to equal myself to my thefts, and go hand in hand with them, not without a daring hope of deceiving the eyes of my reader from discerning the difference; but, withal, it is as much by the benefit of my application that I hope to do it as by that of my invention, or any force of my own. Besides, I do not offer to contend with the whole body of these old champions, nor hand to hand with any one of them; 'tis only by flights and little light skirmishes that I engage them; I do not grapple with them, but try their strength only, and never engage so far as I make a shew to do. If I could hold them in play I were a brave fellow; for I never attack them but where they are strongest. To cover a man's self, as I have seen some do, with another man's armour, so as not to discover so much as their fingers' ends; to carry on his design, as it is not hard for a man that has any thing of a scholar in him, in an ordinary subject, to do, under old inventions, patched up here and there; and then to endeavour to conceal the theft, and to make it pass for his own is, first, injustice and meanness of spirit in whoever does it; who, having nothing in them of their own fit to procure them a reputation, endeavour to do it by attempting to impose things upon the world in their own name, which they have really no manner of title to; and then a ridiculous folly to content themselves with acquiring the ignorant approbation of the vulgar by such a pitiful cheat, at the price, at the same time, of discovering their insufficiency to men of understanding, the only persons whose praise is worth any thing, who will soon smell out and trace them under their borrowed crust. For my own part there is nothing I would not sooner do than that; I quote others only in order the better to express myself. In this I do not, in the least, glance at the composers of centos, who declare themselves for such; of which sort of writers I have, in my time, seen many very ingenious, particularly one, under the name of Capilupus,[1] besides the ancients.[2] These are really men of wit, and that make it appear they are so, both by that and other ways of writing; as for example, Lipsius, in that learned and laborious contexture of his politics.

[1] Montaigne's expression is, me fiert, and Rousseau, among his other obligations to our author in this and the preceding chapter, owes to the occurrence of this word—from the Latin ferit—his discovery of the meaning of the motto of the Solar Family; tel fiert que ne tue pas. See the Confessions, part i. book 3

[2] Laertius, Life of Chrysippus.

[3] Id. Life of Epicurus.

But be this how it will, and how inconsiderable soever these essays of mine may be, I will ingenuously confess I never intended to conceal them, any more than my old, bald, grizzled portrait before them, where the painter has presented you not with a perfect face, but with the resemblance of mine. For these are my own particular opinions and fancies, and I deliver them for no other but only what I myself believe, and not what others are to believe, neither have I any other end in this writing but only to discover myself, who shall, peradventure, be another thing to-morrow, if I chance to meet any book or friend to convince me in the mean time. I have no authority to be believed, neither do I desire it, being too conscious of my own inerudition to be able to instruct others.

Montaigne's opinion as to his Essays.

A friend of mine then, having read the preceding chapter, the other day, told me that I should have enlarged a little more upon the education of children. Now, madam, were my abilities equal to the subject, I could not possibly employ them better than in presenting them to the little gentleman that threatens you shortly with a happy birth, and your friends are in daily hopes of (you are too generous to begin otherwise than with a male); for having had so great a hand in your marriage, I have a sort of right and interest in the greatness and prosperity of all that shall proceed from it; besides, as you have been so long in possession of a title to the best of my services, I am obliged to desire the honour and advantage of every thing that concerns you. But, in truth, all I understand, as to this particular, is only this, that the greatest and most important difficulty of human science is the nurture and education of children. For, as in agriculture, all that precedes planting, as also planting itself, is certain, plain, and easy; but, after that which is planted takes life and shoots up, there is a great deal more to be done, and much more difficulty to be got over to cultivate and bring it to perfection; so it is with men; it is no hard matter to plant them, but after they are born then begins the trouble, solicitude, and care, to train and bring them up.[1] The symptoms of their inclinations at that tender age are so slight and obscure, and the promises so uncertain and fallacious, that it is very hard to establish any solid judgment or conjecture upon them. Look at Cimon, for example, and Themistocles, and a thousand others, whose manhood has given the lie to the ill-promise of their early youth. Bears' cubs and puppies discover their natural inclination; but men, so soon as they are grown up, immediately applying themselves to certain habits, engaging themselves in certain opinions, and conforming themselves to particular laws and customs, do easily change, or, at least, disguise, their true and real disposition. And yet it is hard to force the propensity of nature; whence it comes to pass that, for not having chosen the right course, a man throws away very great pains, and consumes great part of his time in training up children to things for which, by their natural aversion, they are totally unfit. In this difficulty, nevertheless, I am clearly of opinion that they ought to be elemented in the best and most advantageous studies, without taking too much notice of, or being too superstitious in, those light prognostics we too often conceive of them in their tender years; to which Plato, in his republic, gives, methinks, too much authority.

Montaigne's opinion concerning education.

[1] Lelius Capilupus, a native of Mantua, who flourished in the sixteenth century, was famous for compositions of this kind, as may be seen under his name in Bayle's Dictionary, who says that the Cento, which he wrote against the monks, is inimitable; it is to be found at the end of the Regnum Papisticum of Neogeorgas. He wrote one also against the women, which Mr. Bayle also mentions as a very ingenious piece, but too satirical. It was inserted in a collection, entitled Basdii Amores, printed at Leyden, in 1638. This Lelius had a nephew, named Julius Capilupus, who signalized himself by Centos, and even had a talent for it superior to his uncle, if we may believe Possevin. Poet. Select. Lib. xvii. 24.

But, madam, learning is doubtless a very great ornament, and a thing of marvellous use, especially to persons raised to that degree of fortune in which you are placed; and, in truth, in persons of mean and low condition, it cannot perform its true and genuine office, being naturally more prompt to assist in the conduct of war, in the government of a people, and in negociating leagues with princes and foreign nations, than in forming a syllogism in logic, in pleading a process in law, or in prescribing a dose of pills in physic. Wherefore, madam, believing you will not omit this so necessary embellishment in the training of your posterity, yourself having tasted the delights of it, and being of a learned extraction (for we yet have the writings of the ancient Counts of Foix, from whom my lord, your husband, and yourself are both descended, and Monsieur Francis de Candale, your uncle, does, every day, oblige the world with others, which will extend the knowledge of this quality in your family to many succeeding ages), I will, upon this occasion, presume to acquaint you with one particular fancy of my own, contrary to the common method, which is all I am able to contribute to your service in this matter.

The great utility of sound learning.

The charge of the tutor you shall provide for your son, upon the choice of whom depends the whole success of his education, has several other great branches which, however, I shall not touch upon, as being unable to add anything of moment to the common rules; and also in this, wherein I take upon me to advise, he may follow it so far only as it shall appear rational and conducing to the end in view. For a boy of quality then, who pretends to letters, not upon the account of profit (for so mean an object as that is unworthy of the grace and favour of the muses; and, moreover, has reference to others), nor so much for outward ornament, as for his own proper and peculiar use, and to furnish and enrich himself within, having rather a desire to come out an accomplished gentleman than a mere learned man; for such a one, I say, I would have his friends solicitous to find him out a tutor who has rather an elegant than a learned head, though both, if such a person can be found; but, however, to prefer manners and judgment before reading, and that this man should pursue the exercise of his charge after a new method.

How much depends on the choice of a tutor.

'Tis the custom of schoolmasters to be eternally thundering in their pupils' ears, as they were pouring into a funnel, whilst the business of these is only to repeat what the others have said before. Now I would have a tutor to correct this error; and that, at the very first outset, he should, according to the capacity he has to deal with, put it to the test, permitting his pupil himself to taste and relish things, and of himself to choose and discern them, sometimes opening the way to him, and sometimes making him break the ice himself; that is, I would not have him alone to invent and speak, but that he should also hear his pupil speak in turn. Socrates, and, since him, Arcesilaus, made first their scholars speak, and then spoke to them.[2] Obest plerumque iis qui discere volunt auctoritas eorum qui docent.[3] "The authority of those who teach is very often an impediment to those who desire to learn." The tutor should make his pupil, like a young horse, trot before him, that he may judge of his going, and how much he is to abate of his own speed to accommodate himself to the vigour and capacity of the other. For want of which due proportion we spoil all; yet to know how to adjust it, and to keep within an exact and due measure, is one of the hardest things I know, and 'tis the effect of a strong and well-tempered mind to know how to condescend to his puerile motions and to govern and direct them. I walk firmer and more secure up hill than down.

The tutor of a lad ought to make him speak, sometimes before, and sometimes after, him.

[1] This sentiment is taken from one of Plato's Dialogues, entitled Theages, where a father applying, with his son, to Socrates, to consult him to whom he should put his son for education, made the very same remark as Montaigne has in this place.

[2] Laertius, in vitâ.

[3] Cicero, de Nat. Deor. i. 5.

Such as, according to our common way of teaching, undertake, with one and the same lesson, and the same measure of direction, to instruct several boys of so differing and unequal capacities, need not wonder if, in a multitude of scholars, there are not found above two or three who bring away any good account of their time and discipline. Let the master not only examine him about the bare words of his lesson, but also as to the sense and meaning of them, and let him judge of the profit he has made, not by the testimony of his memory, but by that of his understanding. Let him make him put what he hath learned into a hundred several forms, and accommodate it to so many several subjects, to see if he yet rightly comprehend it, and has made it his own; taking instruction by his progress from the institutions of Plato. 'Tis a sign of crudity and indigestion to throw up what we have eaten in the same condition it was swallowed down; the stomach has not performed its office unless it hath altered the form and condition of what was committed to it to concoct. Our minds work only upon trust, being bound and compelled to follow the appetite of another's fancy; enslaved and captive under the authority of another's instruction, we have been so subjected to the trammels that we have no free nor natural pace of our own, our own vigour and liberty is extinct and gone. Nunquam tutelæ suæ sunt.[1] "They are never out of wardship."

I was privately at Pisa carried to see a very honest man, but so great an Aristotelian that his invariable dogma was "That the touchstone and square of all solid imagination and all truth was an absolute conformity to Aristotle's doctrine, and that all besides was nothing but inanity and chimera; for that he had seen all and said all." A position that having been a little too broadly and maliciously interpreted, brought him into and long kept him in great trouble in the inquisition at Rome.

Let the tutor make his pupil examine and thoroughly sift every thing he reads, and lodge nothing in his head upon simple authority and upon trust. Let Aristotle's Principles be no more principles to him than those of Epicurus and the Stoics: let the diversity of opinions be propounded to, and laid before, him, he will himself choose, if he be able; if not, he will remain in doubt.

Che non men che saper, dubbiar m' aggrada.[2]

"I love sometimes to doubt as well as know."

For if he embrace the opinions of Xenophon and Plato, by the exercise of his reason they will no more be theirs, but become his own. Who follows another, follows nothing, finds nothing, nay, seeks nothing. Non sumus sub rege, sibi quisque se vindicet.[3] "We are not under a king; let every one dispose of himself." Let him, at least, know that he does know.

'Tis for him to imbibe their knowledge, but not to adopt their dogmas; and no matter if he forgets where he had his learning, provided he knows how to apply it to his own use: truth and reason are common to every one, and are no more his who spoke them first than his who spake them after. 'Tis no more according to Plato than according to me, since both he and I equally see and understand in the same manner. Bees cull their several sweets from this flower and that blossom, here and there where they find them, but themselves after make the honey, which is all and purely their own, and no longer thyme and marjoram: so the several fragments the pupil borrows from others he will transform and blend together to compile a work that shall be absolutely his own; that is to say, his judgment, which his instruction, labour, and study should alone tend to form. He is not obliged to discover whence he had his materials, but only to produce what he has done with them. Men that live upon rapine and borrowing readily parade their purchases and buildings to every one, but do not proclaim how they came by the money. We do not see the fees and perquisites of a gentleman of the long robe; but we see the noble alliances wherewith he fortifies himself and his family, and the titles and honours he has obtained for him and his. No man accounts to the public for his revenue; but every one makes a show of his purchases, and is content the world should know his good condition.

What the advantages of study are.

The advantages of our study are to become better and wiser. 'Tis, says Epicharmus, the understanding that sees and hears, the understanding that improves everything, that orders everything, and that acts, rules, and reigns.[4] All other faculties are blind and deaf, and without soul; and certainly we render it timorous and servile in not allowing it the liberty and privilege to do anything of itself. Who ever asked his pupil what he thought of grammar and rhetoric, or of such and such a sentence of Cicero? Our pedagogues stick them full feathered in our memories, and there establish them like oracles, of which the very letters and syllables are the substance of the thing. To know by rote is no knowledge, 'tis no more than only to retain what one has intrusted to his memory. That which a man rightly knows and understands he is the free disposer of at his own full liberty, without any regard to the author from whom he had it, or fumbling over the leaves of his book. A mere bookish learning is a poor stock to go upon: though it may serve for some kind of ornament, there is yet no foundation for any superstructure to be built upon it, according to the opinion of Plato, who says that constancy, faith, and sincerity, are the true philosophy; and the other sciences, that are directed to other ends, are but cozenage. I could wish to know whether Le Paluel or Pompey, famous dancing-masters of my time, could have taught us to cut capers by only seeing them do it, without stirring from our places, as these men pretend to inform our understandings, without ever setting them to work; or whether we could learn to ride, handle a pike, touch a lute, or sing, without practice, as these attempt to make us judge and speak well, without exercising us in judging and speaking. Now while we are in our apprenticeship to learning, whatsoever presents itself before us is a book worth attending to. An arch trick of a page, a blunder of a servant, or a jest at table, are so many new subjects.

And for this very reason acquaintance with the world is of very great use, and travel into foreign countries of singular advantage; not to bring back (as most of our young Monsieurs do) an account only of how many paces Santa Rotonda[1] is in circuit; or of the richness of Signiora Livia's attire; or, as some others, how much Nero's face, in a statue in such an old ruin, is longer and broader than that made for him in such an old medal; but to be able to give an account of the humours, manners, customs, and laws of those nations where he has been. And, that we may whet and sharpen our wits, by rubbing them upon those of others, I would that a boy should be sent abroad very young and, in order to kill two birds with one stone, into those neighbouring nations whose language differs most from our own, and to which, if it be not formed betimes, the tongue will be grown too stiff to bend.

The utility of travelling young.

'Tis the general opinion of all, that children should not be brought up in their parents' lap. Their natural affection is apt to make the most discreet of them all so over-fond that they can neither find in their hearts to give them due correction for the faults they commit, nor suffer them to be brought up in those hardships and hazards they ought to be. They would not endure to see them return all dust and sweat from their exercise, to drink cold water when they are hot, or see them mount an unruly horse, or take a foil in hand against a rough fencer, or so much as to discharge a carbine. And yet there is no remedy; whoever will have a boy to be good for any thing when he comes to be a man, must by no means spare him when young, and must very often transgress the rules of physic:—

Fondness of parents pernicious to education.

> Vitamque sub dio, et trepidis agat
> In rebus.[2]
>
> "He must sharp cold and scorching heat despise,
> And most tempt danger where most danger lies."

It is not enough to fortify his soul, you are also to make his sinews strong; for the soul will be oppressed, if not assisted by the body, and would have too hard a task to discharge two offices alone. I know very well how much mine groans under the disadvantage of a body so tender and delicate that eternally leans and presses upon her; and often in my reading perceive that our masters, in their writings, make examples pass for magnanimity and fortitude of mind, which really have more to do with toughness of skin and hardness of bones.

I have seen men, women, and children, born of so hard and insensible a constitution of body that a sound cudgelling has been less to them than a flirt with a finger would have been to me, and that would neither cry out, nor wince at a good swinging beating; when wrestlers counterfeit the philosophers in patience, it is rather strength of nerves than stoutness of heart. Now to be inured to labour is to be able to endure pain. Labor callum obducit dolori.[3] "Labour supplies pain with a certain callosity that hardens it to the blow." A boy must be broken in by the pain and hardship of severe exercise, to inure him to the pain and hardship of dislocations, colics, cauteries, and even of imprisonment and the rack itself, for he may come, by misfortune, to be reduced to the worst of these, which (as this world goes) sometimes befal the good as well as the bad. As for proof, in our present civil war, whoever draws his sword against the laws threatens all honest men with the whip and the halter.

And, moreover, by living at home, the authority of this tutor, which ought to be sovereign over the boy he has received into his charge, is often checked, interrupted, and hindered by the presence of parents; to which may also be added, that the respect the whole family pay him, as their master's son, and the knowledge he has of the estate and greatness he is heir to, are, in my opinion, no small inconveniences at these tender years.

In one's converse with the world, I have often observed this vice, that instead of gathering observations from others, we make it our whole business to give them our own, and are more concerned how to expose and set out our own commodities than how to acquire new. Silence and modesty are very advantageous qualities in conversation, and one should therefore train up the boy to be sparing, and a good husband of what he knows, when once acquired; and to forbear taking exceptions at, or reproving every idle saying or ridiculous story, spoken or told in his presence; for it is a great rudeness to controvert every thing that is not agreeable to our own palate. Let him be satisfied with correcting himself, and not seem to condemn every thing in another he would not do himself, nor dispute against common customs. Licet sapere sine pompâ, sine invidiâ.[4] "Let him be wise without assumption, without envy." Let him avoid this pedagoguish and uncivil fashion, this childish ambition of coveting to appear something better and greater than other people, proving himself in reality something less; and as though finding fault were a proof of genius, seeking to found a special reputation thereon. For, as it becomes none but great poets to make use of the poetic license, so it is intolerable that any but men of great and illustrious souls should be privileged above the authority of custom. Si quid Socrates et Aristippus contra morem et consuetudinem fecerunt; idem sibi ne arbitretur licere: magnis enim illi et divinis bonis hanc licentiam assequebantur.[1] "If Socrates and Aristippus have transgressed the rules of custom, let him not imagine that he is licensed to do the same; for it was by great and sovereign virtues that they obtained this privilege." Let him be instructed not to engage in discourse, or dispute but with a champion worthy of him, and even there, not to make use of all the little subtleties that may serve his purpose; but only such as may best serve him upon that occasion. Let him be taught to be nice in the choice of his reasons, to see they are pertinent, and to affect brevity; above all, let him be lessoned to acquiesce and submit to truth as soon as ever he shall discover it, whether in his opponent's argument, or upon better consideration of his own; for he should never be preferred to the chair for a mere clatter of words and syllogisms, nor be engaged to any argument whatever, than as he shall in his own judgment approve it; nor be bound to that trade, where the liberty of recantation, and getting off upon better thoughts, are to be sold for ready money. Neque, ut omnia quæ præscripta & imperata sint, defendat, necessitate ullâ cogitur.[2] "Neither is there any necessity or obligation upon him at all, that he should defend all things that are recommended to and enjoined him."

If his tutor be of my humour, he will form his will to be a very good and loyal subject to his prince, very affectionate to his person, and very stout in his quarrel; but withal, he will cool in him the desire of having any other tie to his service than public duty; because, besides several other inconveniences, that are inconsistent with the liberty every honest man ought to have, a man's judgment being bribed and pre-possessed by these particular obligations and favours, is either blinded and less free to exercise its function, or shall be blemished either with ingratitude or indiscretion.

Dependance upon princes.

A man that is purely a courtier can neither have power nor wit to speak or think otherwise than favourably of a master, who, amongst so many thousands of other subjects, has picked out him with his own hand, to nourish and advance him. This favour, and the profit flowing from it, must needs, and not without some shew of reason, corrupt his freedom of speaking, and dazzle him. And we commonly see these people speak in another kind of phrase than is ordinarily spoken by the rest of the nation, and are not much to be believed in such matters.

Let conscience and virtue be eminently manifest in his speech, and have only reason for their guide. Make him understand that to acknowledge the error he shall discover in his own argument, though only found out by himself, is an effect of judgment and sincerity, which are the principal things he is to seek after. That obstinacy and contention are common qualities, most appearing in and best becoming a mean soul. That to recollect and correct himself, and to forsake a bad argument in the height and heat of dispute, are great and rare philosophical qualities. Let him be directed, being in company, to have his eye and ear in every corner of the room; for I find that the places of greatest honour are commonly possessed by men that have least in them, and that the greatest fortunes are not always accompanied with the ablest parts. I have been present, when, whilst they at the upper end of the table have been only commending the beauty of the Arras, or the flavour of the wine, many fine things have been lost or thrown away at the lower end of the table. Let him examine every man's talent; a peasant, a bricklayer, or any casual passenger, a man may learn something from every one of these in their several capacities, and something will be picked out of their discourse, whereof some use may be made at one time or another; nay, even the folly and weakness of others will contribute to his instruction. By observing the graces and manners of all he sees, he will create to himself an emulation of the good, and a contempt of the bad.

Sincerity to be cultivated.

He must be admonished when in company, to be attentive to every thing said or done.

Let an honest curiosity be planted in him to enquire after every thing, and whatever there is of singular and rare near the place where he shall reside, let him go and see it; a fine house, a fountain, an eminent man, the place where a battle was anciently fought, the passage of Cæsar or of Charlemaigne,

> Quæ Tellus sit lenta gelu, quæ putris ab æstu,
> Ventus in Italiam quis bene vela ferat.[3]
>
> "What lands are frozen, what are parched, explore,
> And what wind bears us to the Italian shore."

Let him enquire into the manners, revenues, and alliances of princes, things in themselves very pleasant to learn and very useful to know. In thus conversing with men, I mean, and principally, those who only live in the records of history; let him, by reading those books, converse with the great and heroic souls of better ages. It is an idle study, I confess, to those who choose to make it so, by doing it after a negligent manner; but to those also who choose to make it so, by care and observation, it is a study of inestimable fruit and value; and the only one, as Plato reports, the Lacedæmonians reserved to themselves.[1] What profit shall he not reap, as to the business of men, by reading the lives of Plutarch? But, withal, let my tutor remember to what end his instructions are principally directed, and that he do not so much imprint in his pupil's memory the date of the ruin of Carthage, as the manners of Hannibal and Scipio; nor so much where Marcellus died as why it was unworthy of his duty that he died there. Let him read history, not as an amusing narrative, but as a discipline of the judgment. 'Tis this study to which, in my opinion, of all others we apply ourselves with the most differing and uncertain measures. I have read an hundred things in Livy, that another has not, or not taken notice of, at least; and Plutarch has read a hundred more than ever I could find, or than peradventure the author ever writ. To some it is merely a grammar-study; to others, the very anatomy of philosophy, by which the most secret and abstruse parts of our human nature are penetrated into. There are in Plutarch many long discourses very worthy to be carefully read and observed, for he is, in my opinion, of all other, the greatest master in that kind of writing; but withal, there are a thousand others which he has only touched and glanced upon, where he only points with his finger to direct us which way we may go if we will, and contents himself sometimes with only giving one brisk hit in the nicest article of the question, whence we are to grope out the rest; as for example, where he says, "That the inhabitants of Asia came to be vassals to one only, for not having been able to pronounce one syllable, which is no."[2] Which saying of his gave perhaps matter and occasion to Boetius to write his "Voluntary Servitude."[3] Even this, but to see him pick out a light action in a man's life, or a word that does not seem to be of any such importance, is itself a whole discourse. It is a pity that men of understanding should so immoderately affect brevity; no doubt but their reputation is the better for it: but in the mean time we are the worse. Plutarch had rather we should applaud his judgment than commend his knowledge, and had rather leave us with an appetite to read more, than glutted with that we have already read. He knew very well that a man may say too much even upon the best subjects, and that Alexandrides did justly reproach him who made very elegant, but too long, speeches to the Ephori, when he said, "O stranger! thou speakest the things thou oughtest to speak, but not after the manner thou shouldest speak them."[4] Such as have lean and spare bodies stuff themselves out with clothes; so they who are defective in matter endeavour to make amends with words.

History a profitable study.

Human understanding is marvellously enlightened by daily conversation with men, for we are otherwise in ourselves stupid and dull, and have our sight limited to the length of our own noses. One asking Socrates of what country he was, he did not make answer, "Of Athens," but, "Of the world;"[5] having an imagination rich and expansive, he embraced the whole world for his country, and extended his society, his friendship, and his knowledge, to all mankind; not as we do, who look no farther than our feet. When the vines of our village are nipped with the frost, the parish-priest presently concludes that the indignation of God is gone out against all the human race, and that the cannibals have already got the pip. Who is it that, seeing these civil wars of ours, does not cry out, That the machine of the whole world is upsetting, and that the day of judgment is at hand! without considering that many worse things have been seen, and that, in the mean time, people are very merry in ten thousand other parts of the earth, notwithstanding. For my part, considering the licence and impunity that always attend such commotions, I wonder they are so moderate, and that there is no more mischief done. To him that feels the hail-stones patter about his ears, the whole hemisphere appears to be in storm and tempest; like the ridiculous Savoyard, who said very gravely, "That if that simple king of France had managed well he might in time have come to be steward of the household to the duke his master." The fellow could not, in his shallow imagination, conceive that there could be any thing greater than a Duke of Savoy. And, in truth, we are all of us insensibly in this error, an error of very pernicious consequence. But whoever shall represent to his fancy, as in a picture, that great image of our mother nature, pourtrayed in her full majesty and lustre; whoever in her face shall read so general and so constant a variety, whoever shall observe himself in that figure, and not himself but a whole kingdom, no bigger than the least touch of a pencil, in comparison of the whole, that man Conversation with the world greatly assists the understanding.

[3] This was Montaigne's friend, of whom I shall have occasion to say more elsewhere. His name was Stephen Boetius, and he composed that book of Voluntary Servitude, which is here mentioned by Montaigne, and of which we shall find him discoursing more particularly in the 27th chap. of this book, under the article of Friendship. One thing very surprising is that, in almost all the editions which I have consulted, instead of Boetius we read Bœotia, a country of Greece, and that in those which have short marginal lemmas of what is contained in the pages, we are told, upon account of this passage in Plutarch, that this country of Greece voluntarily submitted to slavery; a fatal accident, which care has been taken to point out in the margin, by these words, which are by no means equivocal. "The voluntary slavery of the Bœotians." Thus a very material confusion has arisen from a small error in typography.

alone is able to value things according to their true estimate and grandeur.

The world a mirror in which all should look.

This great world, which some do yet multiply as several species under one genus, is the mirror wherein we are to behold ourselves, to be able to know ourselves as we ought to do. In short, I would have this to be the book my young gentleman should study with the most attention; for so many humours, so many sects, so many judgments, opinions, laws, and customs, teach us to judge aright of our own, and inform our understanding to discover its imperfection and natural infirmity, which is no trivial lesson. So many mutations of states and kingdoms, and so many turns and revolutions of public fortune, will make us wise enough to make no great wonder of our own. So many great names, so many famous victories and conquests drowned and swallowed in oblivion, render our hopes ridiculous of eternizing our names by the taking of half a score light horse, or a paltry turret, which only derives its memory from its ruin. The pride and arrogance of so many foreign pomps and ceremonies, the inflated majesty of so many courts and grandeurs, accustom and fortify our sight, without winking, to behold and endure the lustre of our own. So many millions of men buried before us, encourage us not to fear to go seek such good company in the other world, and so of all the rest. Pythagoras was wont to say, that our life resembled the great and populous assembly of the Olympic Games: some exercise the body for glory, others carry merchandize to sell for profit; there are also some, and those none of the worst sort, who pursue no other advantage than only to look on, and to consider how and why every thing is done, and to be unactive spectators of the lives of other men, thereby the better to judge of and regulate their own.

As examples, all the instruction couched in philosophical discourses may be taken, to which all human actions, as to their best rule, ought to be especially directed: where a man shall be taught to know,

> Quid fas optare; quid asper
> Utile nummus habet; patriæ, carisque propinquis
> Quantum elargiri deceat; quem te Deus esse
> Jussit; et humanâ quâ parte locatus es in re.
> Quid sumus, aut quidnam victuri gignimur.[1]
>
> "Think what we are, and for what ends design'd;
> How we may best through life's long mazes wind;
> What we should wish for—how we may discern
> The bounds of wealth, and its true uses learn;
> How fix the portion which we ought to give
> To friends, relations, country—how to live
> As fits our station; and how best pursue
> What God has placed us in this world to do;"

what it is to know, and what to be ignorant, what ought to be the end and design of study; what valour, temperance, and justice are; the difference betwixt ambition and avarice, servitude and subjection; licentiousness and liberty; by what token a man may know true and solid content; how far death, pain, and disgrace are to be feared,

> Et quo quemque modo fugiatque feratque laborem.[2]
> "And what thou may'st avoid, and what must undergo."

By what secret springs we move, and the reason of our various irresolutions. For, methinks, the first doctrine with which one should season his understanding ought to be that which regulates his manners and his sense; that teaches him to know himself, and how both well to die and well to live. Amongst the liberal sciences, let us begin with that which makes us free;[4] not that they do not all serve, in some measure, to the instruction and use of life, as all other things, in some sort, also do; but let us make choice of that which directly and professedly serves to that end. If we were once able to restrain the offices of human life within their just and natural limits, we should find that most of the sciences in use are of no great use to us, and, even in those that are, that there are many very unnecessary cavities and dilatations which we had better let alone, and, following Socrates' direction, limit the course of our studies to those of real utility:[5]

> Sapere aude:
> Incipe. Vivendi recte qui prorogat horam,
> Rusticus expectat dum defluat amnis; at ille
> Labitur, et labetur in omne volubilis ævum.[6]
>
> "Dare to be wise; and now
> Begin: the man who has it in his power
> To practise virtue, and puts off the hour,
> Waits, like the clown, to see the brook run low
> Which onward flows, and will for ever flow."

'Tis a great foolery to teach our children

> Quid moveant Pisces, animosaque signa Leonis,
> Lotus, et Hesperiâ quid Capricornus aquâ.[7]
>
> "What influence Pisces and fierce Leo have,
> Or Capricornus in the Hesperian wave."

The knowledge of the stars and the motion of the eighth sphere before their own.

> Τί πλειάδεσσι κομοὶ
> Τί δ' ἀσρασιν βοώτεω.[8]
>
> "How swift the seven sisters' motions are,
> Or the dull churls how slow, what need I care."

Anaximenes, writing to Pythagoras, "To what purpose," said he, "should I trouble myself in searching out the secrets of the stars, having death or slavery continually before my eyes?" (For the kings of Persia were at that time preparing to invade his country.) Every one ought to say the same; "Being assailed, as I am, by ambition, avarice, temerity, and superstition, and having within so many other enemies of life, shall I go cudgel my brains about the world's revolutions?"[9]

In what way the sciences should be taught.

make him more wise and good, you may then shew him the elements of logic, physic, geometry, and rhetoric; and the science which he shall then himself most incline to, his judgment being, beforehand, formed and fit to choose, he will quickly make his own. The way of instructing him ought to be, sometimes by discourse, and sometimes by reading; sometimes his governor shall put the author himself, which he shall think most proper for him, into his hands, and sometimes only the marrow and substance of it; and if the governor himself be not conversant enough in books to turn to all the fine discourses the book contains, there may some man of letters be joined to him, that, upon every occasion shall supply him with what he desires and stands in need of, to recommend to his pupil. And who can doubt but that this way of teaching is much more easy and natural than that of Gaza?[1] In which the precepts are so intricate, and so harsh, and the words so vain, empty, and insignificant, that there is no hold on them; nothing that quickens and elevates the wit and fancy; whereas, here the mind has what to feed upon and to digest. This fruit, therefore, is not only, without comparison, much finer, but will also be much more early ripe.

'Tis a thousand pities that matters should be at such a pass, in this age of ours, that philosophy, even with men of understanding, should be looked upon as a vain and fantastic name, a thing of no use, no value, either in opinion or effect; and I think 'tis these miserable ergotisms, by taking possession of the avenues unto it, are the cause. People are much to blame to represent it to children as a thing of so difficult access, and with such a frowning, grim, and formidable aspect. Who is it has disguised it thus with this false, pale, and hideous countenance? There is nothing more airy, more gay, more frolic, I had like to have said, more wanton. She preaches nothing but feasting and jollity; a melancholy, thoughtful, look shews that she does not inhabit there. Demetrius, the grammarian, finding in the Temple of Delphos, a knot of philosophers set chattering together, said to them, "Either I am much deceived, or, by your cheerful and pleasant countenance, you are engaged in no very deep discourse." To which one of them, Heracleon, the Megarean, replied, "'Tis for such as puzzle their brains about enquiring whether the future tense of the verb Βάλλω be spelt with a double λ, or that hunt after the derivation of the comparatives χείριον, βέλτιον, and the superlatives Χείριστον, Βέλτιστον, to knit their brows whilst discoursing of their science; but as to philosophical discourses they always amuse and cheer up those that treat of them, and never deject them, or make them sad."[2]

> Deprendas animi formenta latentis in ægro
> Corpore, deprendas et gaudia; sumit utrumque
> Inde habitum facies.[3]
>
> ——— "For still we find
> The face the unerring index of the mind,
> And as this feels or fancies joys or woes,
> That pales with anguish, or with rapture glows."

Philosophy soothes the body as well as the mind.

The soul that entertains philosophy ought, by its necessarily healthy condition, to render the body healthful too; she ought to make her tranquillity and satisfaction shine, so as to appear without, and her contentment ought to fashion the outward behaviour to her own mould, and consequently to fortify it with a graceful confidence, an active and joyous carriage, and a serene and contented countenance. The most certain sign of wisdom is a continual cheerfulness; her state is like that of things in the regions above the moon, always clear and serene. 'Tis Cheerfulness a sign of wisdom.

Baroco and Baralipton[4] that render their disciples so dirty and ill-favoured, and not she; they do not so much as know her but by hearsay. 'Tis she that calms and appeases the storms and tempests of the soul, and who teaches famine and fevers to laugh and sing; and this not by certain imaginary epicycles, but by natural and manifest reasons. She has virtue for her end; which is not, as the schoolmen say, situate upon the summit of a steep, rugged, and inaccessible precipice. Such as have approached her find it, quite the contrary, to be seated in a fair, fruitful, and flourishing plain, whence she easily discovers all things below her; but to which any one may arrive if he know the way, through shady, green, and sweet-scented walks and avenues, by a pleasant, easy, and smooth descent, like that of the celestial arches. 'Tis for not having frequented this supreme, this beautiful, triumphant, and amiable, this equally delicious and courageous virtue, this so professed and implacable enemy to anxiety, sorrow, fear, and constraint, who, having nature for her guide, has fortune and pleasure for her companions, that they have gone according to their own weak imagination, and created this ridiculous, this sorrowful, querulous, despiteful, threatening, terrible image of it, and placed it upon a solitary rock amongst thorns and brambles, and made of it a hobgoblin to frighten people from daring to approach it.

[4] Two of the terms of ancient scholastic logic. The whole of the nineteen fictitious words which expressed the nineteen forms of syllogism were these:

> Barbara, celarent, darii, ferio, baralipton,
> Celantes, dabitis, fapesmo, frisesomorum,
> Cesare, camestre, festino, baroco, darapti,
> Felapton, disamis, datisi, bocardo, ferison.

But the tutor that I would have, knowing it to be his duty to possess his pupil with as much or more affection, than reverence, to virtue, will be able to inform him that the poets[1] have evermore accommodated themselves to the public humour, and make him sensible that the gods have planted far more toil in the avenues of the cabinets of Venus, than in those of Minerva. And when he shall once find him begin to apprehend he shall represent to him a Bradamante or an Angelica for a mistress;[2] a natural, active, generous, not masculine, but manly beauty, in comparison of soft, delicate, artificial, simpering, and affected charms; the one in the habit of an heroic youth with a glittering helmet on her brow; the other tricked up in curls and ribbons, like a silly minx; he will then judge his love to be brave and manly, if he finds him choose quite contrary to that effeminate shepherd of Phrygia.

Virtue ought to be represented to youth as a thousand times more amiable than vice.

Such a tutor will make a pupil to digest this new lesson, that the height and value of true virtue consists in the facility, utility, and pleasure of its exercise; so far from difficulty that boys as well as men, and the innocent as well as the subtle, may make it their own; and 'tis by order and good conduct, not by force, that it is to be acquired. Socrates, her first favourite, is so averse to all manner of violence as totally to throw it aside, to slip into the more natural facility of her own progress. 'Tis the nursing-mother of all human pleasures, who, in rendering them just, renders them also pure and permanent; in moderating them, keeps them in breath and appetite; in interdicting those which she herself refuses, whets our desire to those which she allows; and, like a kind and liberal mother, abundantly allows all that nature requires, even to satiety, if not to lassitude; unless we choose to say that the regimen that stops the toper's hand before he has drunk himself drunk, the glutton's before he has eaten to a surfeit, and the wencher's career before he needs a surgeon, is an enemy to pleasure. If the ordinary fortune fail her, she does without her, or frames another, wholly her own, not so fickle and unsteady. She can be rich, potent, and wise, and knows how to lie upon a soft and perfumed couch. She loves life, beauty, glory, and health; but her proper and peculiar office is to know how regularly to make use of all these good things, and how to part with them without concern; an office much more noble than troublesome, and without which the whole course of life is unnatural, turbulent, and deformed; and there it is indeed that men may justly represent those monsters upon rocks and precipices. If this pupil shall happen to be of so cross and contrary a disposition that he had rather hear an idle tale than the true narrative of some noble expedition or some wise and learned discourse; who at the beat of a drum, that excites the youthful ardour of his companions, leaves that to follow another that calls to a morrice-dance or the bears; and who would not wish nor find it more delightful to return all over dust victorious from a battle than from tennis or a ball, with the prize of those exercises; I see no other remedy[3] but that he be bound apprentice in some good town to learn to make minced-pies, though he were the son of a duke; according to Plato's precept, "That children are to be placed out in life not according to the condition of the father, but according to their own capacities."

Since philosophy is that which instructs us to live, and that infancy has there its lessons as well as other ages, why is it not communciated to children betimes?

Philosophy ought to be taught to children.

Udum et molle lutum est; nunc, nunc properandus, et acri
Fingendus sine fine rota.[4]

"The clay is moist and soft; now, now make haste,
And form the vessel, for the wheel turns fast."

They begin to teach us to live when we have almost done living A hundred students have got the pox before they have come to read Aristotle's Lecture on Temperance. Cicero said that, though he should live two men's ages, he should never find leisure to study the lyric poets; and I find the Sophists yet more deplorably unprofitable. The boy we would train has a great deal less time to spare; he owes but the first fifteen or sixteen years of his life to his tutor, the remainder is due to action: therefore let us employ that short time in necessary instruction. Away with your crabbed logical subtleties; they are abuses, things by which our lives can never be amended. Take me the plain discourses of philosophy, learn first how rightly to choose, and then rightly to apply them; they are more easy to be understood than one of Boccacio's novels; a child from nurse is much more capable of them than of learning to read or to write. Philosophy has discourses equally proper for childhood as for old age.

I am of Plutarch's mind, that Aristotle did not so much trouble his great disciple with the knack of forming syllogisms, or with the elements of geometry, as with infusing into him good precepts concerning valour, prowess, magnanimity, temperance, and the contempt of fear; and with this ammunition sent him, whilst yet a boy, with no more than 30,000 foot,

The remedy pointed out by this philosopher is one of those acts of rigour which the public interest or reasons of state sometimes command, and always justify." If this passage does not appear in any of the editions of Montaigne, it is doubtless because his enlightened mind recognised, upon reflection, the horrible abuses to which the introduction of such a remedy would lead.

4,000 horse, and but 42,000 crowns, to subjugate the empire of the whole earth. As for the other arts and sciences, Alexander, he says, highly indeed commended their excellence, and had them in very great honour and esteem, but was not ravished with them to that degree as to be tempted to affect the practice of them in his own person.

> —— Petite hinc, juvenesque senesque,
> Finem animo certum, miserisque viatica canis.[1]
>
> "Seek then, both old and young, from truths like these,
> That certain aim which life's last cares may ease."

Epicurus, in the beginning of his letter to Meniceus, says that neither the youngest should refuse to philosophise, nor the eldest grow weary of it.[2] And who does otherwise seems tacitly to imply that either the time of living happily is not yet come, or that it is already past. Yet, for all that, I would not have this pupil of ours imprisoned and made a slave to his book; nor would I have him given up to the morose and melancholic humour of a sour, ill-natured pedant. I would not have his spirit cowed and subdued by applying him to the rack and tormenting him, as some do, fourteen or fifteen hours a-day, and so make a pack-horse of him. Neither should I think it good when, by reason of a solitary and melancholy complexion, he is discovered to be too much addicted to his book, to nourish that humour in him, for that renders him unfit for civil conversation, and diverts him from better employments. And how many have I seen in my time totally brutified by an immoderate thirst after knowledge! Carneades was so besotted with it that he would not find time so much as to comb his head or pare his nails.[3] Neither would I have his generous temper spoiled and corrupted by the incivility and barbarity of that of another. French wisdom was anciently turned into a proverb, "Early, but of no continuance;" and in truth we yet see that nothing can be more ingenuous and pretty than the children of France; but they ordinarily deceive the hope and expectation that have been conceived of them, and, grown up to be men, have nothing extraordinary or worth taking notice of. I have heard men of good understanding say these colleges of ours, to which we send our young people (and of which we have but too many), make them such animals as they are.

But to our young friend, a closet, a garden, the table, his bed, solitude and company, morning and evening, all hours shall be the same, and all places to him a study; for philosophy, who, as the formatrix of judgment and manners, shall be his principal lesson, has that privilege to have a hand in everything. The orator Isocrates being at a feast intreated to speak of his art, all the company were satisfied with and commended his answer. "It is not now a time," said he, "to do what I can do; and that which it is now time to do I cannot do."[4] For to make orations and rhetorical disputes in a company met together to laugh and make good cheer had been very unseasonable and improper, and as much might be said of all the other sciences. But as to philosophy, that part of it at least that treats of man, and of his offices and duties, it has been the joint opinion of all wise men that, out of respect to the sweetness of her conversation, she is ever to be admitted in all sports and entertainments.[5] And Plato having invited her to his feast, we see after how gentle and obliging a manner, accommodated both to time and place, she entertained the company, though in a discourse of the sublimest and most salutary nature.

Philosophy, the formatrix of manners, is no where inactive.

> Æquè pauperibus prodest, locupletibus æquè,
> Et, neglecta, æquè pueris senibusque nocebit.[6]
>
> "It profits poor and rich alike; and when > Neglected, t' old and young is hurtful then."

By which method of instruction, my young pupil will be much more and better employed than those of the college are. But as the steps we take in walking to and fro in a gallery, though three times as many, do not tire a man so much as those we employ in a formal journey; so our lesson, occurring as it were accidentally, without any set obligation of time or place, and falling naturally in with every action, will insinuate insensibly itself. Our very exercises and recreations, running, wrestling, music, dancing, hunting, riding, and fencing, will prove to be a good part of our study. I would have his outward behaviour and mien, and the disposition of his limbs, formed at the same time with his mind. It is not a soul, it is not a body, that we are training up; it is a man, and we ought not to divide him into two parts; and, as Plato says, we are not to fashion one without the other, but make them draw together like two horses harnessed to a coach.[7] By which saying of his, does he not seem to allow more time for, and to take more care of, exercises for the body, and to believe that the mind in a good proportion does her business at the same time too?

Severity an enemy to education.

As to the rest, this method of education ought to be carried on with a firm gentleness, quite contrary to the practice of our pedants, who, instead of tempting and alluring children to letters, present nothing before them but rods and ferules, horror and cruelty. Away with this violence! away with this compulsion! than which, I certainly believe nothing more dulls and degenerates a well-born nature. If you would have him fear shame and chastisement, do not harden him to them. Inure him to heat and cold, to wind and sun, and to dangers that he ought to despise. Wean him from all effeminacy in clothes and lodging, eating and drinking; accustom him to every thing, that he may not be a Sir Paris, a carpet-knight, but a sinewy, hardy, and vigorous young man. I have ever, from a child to the age wherein I now am, been of this opinion, and am still constant to it. But, amongst other things, the strict government of most of our colleges has always displeased me, and peradventure they might have erred less perniciously on the indulgent side. They are mere gaols, where imprisoned youths are taught to be debauched, by being punished for it before they are so. Do but come in when they are about their lesson, and you shall hear nothing but the outcries of boys under execution, and the thundering of pedagogues, drunk with fury. A very pretty way this to tempt these tender and timorous souls to love their book! leading them on with a furious countenance, and a rod in hand! a wretched and pernicious way! besides what Quintilian has very well observed, that this insolent authority is often attended by very dangerous consequences, and particularly our way of chastising.[1] How much more decent would it be to see their classes strewed with leaves and flowers, than with bloody stumps of birch! Were it left to my ordering, I should paint the school with pictures of joy and gladness, Flora and the graces, as the philosopher Speusippus did his;[2] that where their profit is they might there have their pleasure too. Such viands as are proper and wholesome for children should be seasoned with sugar, and such as are dangerous to them with gall. It is admirable to see how solicitous Plato is in his laws for the gaity and diversion of the youth of his city, and how he enlarges upon their races, sports, songs, leaps, and dances: of which he says that antiquity has given the ordering and patronage to the gods themselves, to Apollo, Minerva, and the Muses. He insists upon a thousand precepts for exercise; but as to the lettered sciences says very little, and only seems particularly to recommend poetry upon the account of music.

Singularity of manners to be avoided.

All singularity in our manners and condition should be avoided, as obnoxious to society. Who is not astonished at so strange a constitution as that of Demophoon, steward to Alexander the Great, who sweated in the shade, and shivered in the sun?[3] I have seen those who have run from the smell of an apple with greater precipitation than from a harquebuse shot; others are afraid of a mouse; others vomit at the sight of cream; others at seeing a bed shaken; and there was Germanicus, who could neither endure the sight nor the crowing of a cock.[4] There may, peradventure, be some occult cause for these aversions in these cases; but certainly, in my opinion, a man might conquer them, if he took them in time. Precept has in this wrought so effectually upon me, though not without some endeavour on my part, I confess, that, beer excepted, my appetite accommodates itself indifferently to all sorts of diet.

Young men should be habituated to all customs, so as to be able to comply with them to excess, if need be.

Young bodies are supple; one should therefore in that age bend and ply them to all fashions and customs: and, provided a man can restrain the appetite and the will within limits, let a young man be rendered fit for all nations and all companies, even to debauchery and excess, if occasion be; that is, where he shall do it out of complaisance to the customs of a place. Let him be able to do every thing, but love to do nothing but what is good. The philosophers themselves do not justify Calisthenes for forfeiting the favour of his master, Alexander the Great, by refusing to pledge him a cup of wine. Let him laugh, carouse, and debauch with his prince: nay, I would have him, even in his debauches, excel his companions in ability and vigour, so that he may not give over doing it either through defect of power or knowledge how to do it, but for want of will. Multum interest, utrum peccare aliquis nolit, aut nesciat.[5] "There is a vast difference betwixt forbearing to sin, and not knowing how to sin." I thought I passed a compliment upon a Lord, as free from these excesses as any man in France, by asking him, before a great deal of good company, how many times in his life he had got drunk in Germany, in the time of his being there about his majesty's affairs; which he also took as it was intended, and made answer, three times; and withal, told us the whole story of his bouts. I know some who, for want of this faculty, have been put to great inconvenience in negotiating with that nation. I have often with great admiration reflected upon the wonderful constitution of Alcibiades, who so easily could transform himself to so various fashions, without any prejudice to his health;[6] one while out-doing the Persian pomp and luxury, and another the Lacedæmonian austerity and frugality; as temperate in Sparta, as voluptuous in Ionia.

— Quem duplici panno patientia velat,
Mirabor, vitæ via si conversa decebit,
Personamque feret non inconcinnus utramque.[1]

"But that a man whom patience taught to wear
A coat that's patched, should ever learn to bear
A changed life with decency and grace,
May justly, I confess, our wonder raise."

These are my lessons, and he who puts them in practice shall reap more advantage than he who has had them read to him only, and only knows them. If you see him, you hear him; if you hear him, you see him. "The gods forbid," says one in Plato, "that to philosophise should be only to read a great many books, and to learn the arts."[2] Hanc amplissimam omnium artium bene vivendi disciplinam, vita magis quam literis persequuti sunt.[3] "They have more illustrated and improved this discipline of living well, which of all arts is the greatest, by their lives, than by their reading." Leo, prince of the Phliasians, asking Heraclides Ponticus of what art or science he made profession; "I know," said he, "neither art nor science, but I am a philosopher."[4] One reproaching Diogenes that, being ignorant, he should pretend to philosophy; "I, therefore," answered he, "pretend to it with so much the more reason."[5] Hegesias intreated that he would read a certain book to him. "You are an amusing person," said he, "you who choose those figs that are true and natural, and not those that are painted, why do you not also choose exercises which are natural and true, rather than those written?"[6]

The progress a young man makes ought to be judged of by his actions.

A man should not so much repeat his lesson as practise it: let him repeat it in his actions. We shall discover if there be in him prudence, by his undertakings; if goodness and justice, by his deportment; if grace and judgment, by his speaking; if firmness, by his sickness; if modesty, by his recreations; temperance, by his pleasures; order, by the management of his affairs; and indifference, by his palate, whether what he eats or drinks be flesh or fish, wine or water. Qui disciplinam suam non ostentationem scientiæ, sed legem vitæ putet, quique obtemperet ipse sibi et decretis pareat.[7] "Who considers his own discipline, not as a vain ostentation of science, but as a law and rule of life; and who obeys his own decrees, and observes that regimen he has prescribed to himself." The conduct of our lives is the true mirror of our doctrine. Zeuxidamus, to one who asked him why the Lacedæmonians did not commit their constitutions of chivalry to writing, and deliver them to their young men to read, made answer that it was because they would inure them to action and not to words.[8] With such a one compare, after fifteen or sixteen years' study, one of our college Latinists, who has thrown away so much time in nothing but learning to speak. The world is nothing but babble; and I never yet saw that man who did not rather prate too much than speak too little; and yet half of our lives is lost this way. We are kept four or five years to learn words only, and to tack them together into phrases; as many more to put larger masses of these into four or five parts; and other five years, at least, to learn succinctly to mix and interweave them after some subtle and intricate manner. Let us leave such work to those who make it their trade.

The story of two pedagogues going to Bourdeaux.

Going one day to Orleans, I met, in the plain, on this side Clery, two pedants travelling to Bourdeaux, about fifty paces distant from one another; and, a good way farther behind them, I saw a troop of horse with a gentleman at the head of them, the late Monsieur le Compte de la Rochefoucault. One of my people enquired of the foremost of these Domines who that gentleman was that came after him; he, not having seen the train that followed after, and thinking my man meant his companion, pleasantly answered, "He is not a gentleman; he is a grammarian, and I am a logician." Now we, on the contrary, who do not here seek to breed a grammarian or a logician, but a gentleman, let us leave them to their own fancy: our business lies elsewhere. Let but our pupil be well furnished with things, words will follow but too fast; he will pull them after him, if they do not come voluntarily. I have observed some to make excuses that they cannot express themselves, and pretend to have their fancies full of a great many very fine things, which yet, for want of eloquence, they cannot bring out; a mere shift and nothing else. Will you know what I think of it? I think they are nothing but shadows of some imperfect images and conceptions that they know not what to make of within, nor consequently how to bring out: they do not yet themselves understand what they would be at, and if you but observe how they haggle and stammer upon the point of parturition, you will soon conclude that their labour is not in delivery, but in conception, and that they are but licking their formless embryo. For my part I hold, and Socrates is positive in it, that whoever has in his mind a vivid and clear idea, will express it well enough in one way or other; and if he be dumb, by signs.

A youth of a good family ought to be more carefully instructed in the knowledge of things than of words.

Verbaque prævisam rem non invita sequentur.[1]

"When once a thing conceiv'd is in the wit, Words soon present themselves to utter it."

And as another, as poetically, says in prose, Cum res animum occupavere, verba ambiunt,[2] "When things are once formed in the fancy, words offer themselves." And this other, Ipsæ res verba rapiunt.[3] "The things themselves force words to express them." He knows nothing of ablative, conjunctive, substantive, or grammar, no more than his lacquey or a fish-wife of the Petit-Pont; and these yet will give you your fill of talk, if you will hear them, and, peradventure, shall trip as little in their language as the best masters of art in France. He knows no rhetoric, nor how, in a preface, to bribe the benevolence of the courteous reader; neither does he care, nor is it very necessary he should know it. Indeed all this fine sort of painting is easily obscured by the lustre of a simple truth; these fine ingenious flourishes serve only to amuse the vulgar, of themselves incapable of more solid and nutritive diet, as Aper does very evidently demonstrate in Tacitus.[4] The ambassadors of Samos, prepared with a long elegant oration, came to Cleomenes, King of Sparta, to incite him to the war against the tyrant Polycrates; he, after he had heard their harangue with great gravity and patience, gave them this short answer: "As to the exordium, I remember it not, nor consequently the middle of your speech, and as to your conclusion, I will not do what you desire."[5] A very pretty answer this, methinks, and a pack of learned orators no doubt finely gravelled! And what did this other say? The Athenians were to choose one of two architects for a great building they designed; the first, a pert affected fellow, offered his service in a long premeditated discourse upon the subject, and by his oratory inclined the voices of the people in his favour; but the other had his say in three words, "Lords of Athens, what this man hath said, I will do."[6] When Cicero was in the height and heat of his eloquence, many were struck with admiration; but Cato did only laugh at it, saying, "We have a pleasant Consul."[7] Let it go before, or come after, a good sentence, a thing well said is always in season; if it neither suit well with what went before, nor has any very close coherence with what follows after, it is good in itself. I am none of those who think that good rhyme makes a good poem. Let the writer make short long, and long short, if he will, 'tis no great matter; if there be invention, and that the wit and judgment have well performed their office, I will say, here's a good poet, but an ill rhymer.

Emunctæ naris, durus componere versus.[8]

"He rallied with a gay and easy air,
But rude his numbers, and his style severe."

Let a man, says Horace, divest his work of all measures:

Tempora certa modosque et quod prius ordine verbum est,
Posterius facias, præponens ultima primis * * *
Invenias etiam disjecti membra poetæ.[9]

"Let tense and mood, and words be all misplaced,
Those last that should be first, those first the last;
Though all things be thus shuffled out of frame,
You'll find the poet's fragments not to blame."

He will never the more forfeit his praise; the pieces will be fine by themselves. Menander's answer had this meaning, who, being reproved by a friend, the time drawing on at which he had promised a comedy, that he had not yet put his hand to it, "It is ready," said he, "all but the verses."[10] Having contrived the subject, and disposed the scenes in his head, he took little care for the rest. Since Ronsard and Du Bellay have given reputation to our French poetry, every little dabbler swells his words as high, and makes his cadences very near as harmonious, as they. Plus sonat, quam valet.[11] "More sound than sense." There were never so many poetasters as now; but though they find it no hard matter to rhyme nearly as well as their masters, they yet fall altogether short of the rich descriptions of the one, and the delicate invention of the other.

Invention the great test of true poetry.

But what will become of our young gentleman if he be attacked with the sophistic subtilty of some syllogism? "A Westphalia ham makes a man drink, drink quenches thirst, therefore a Westphalia ham quenches thirst." Why, let him laugh at it, and it will be more discretion to do so than to go about to answer it,[12] or let him borrow this pleasant evasion from Aristippus; why should I trouble myself to untie that which, bound as it is, gives me so much trouble? A person offering at this dialectic juggling against Cleanthes, Chrysippus took him short, saying, "Reserve these baubles to play with children, and do not by such fooleries divert the serious thoughts of a man of years."[13] If these ridiculous subtleties [7] Montaigne gives too general a latitude to Cato's reflections, though, perhaps, he did so for the purpose. Cato did not ridicule Cicero's eloquence in the general, but only his abuse of it while he was consul. When he was pleading one day for Murena against Cato, he fell to ridiculing the gravest principles of the stoic philosophy in too comic a manner, and, consequently, not becoming the august station he then was in. This is what drew Cato's answer above mentioned, which was more stinging than all the invectives which Cicero had so lately cast at this great man, who was much more a stoic by his manners than by his discourses. contorta et aculeata sophismata,[1] "Perplexed and crabbed sophisms," are designed to possess him with an untruth, they are then dangerous; but if they remain without effect and only make him laugh, I do not see why a man need to be fortified against them. There are some so ridiculous as to go a mile out of their way to hook in a fine word. Aut qui non verba rebus aptant, sed res extrinsecas arcessunt, quibus verba conveniant.[2] "Who do not fit words to the subject, but seek out things quite from the purpose to fit those words they are so enamoured of." And, as another says, Qui alicujus verbi decore placentis, vocentur ad id quod non proposuerant scribere.[3] "Who, by their fondness of some fine sounding word, are tempted to something they had no intention to treat of." I, for my part, rather bring in a fine sentence by head and shoulders to fit my purpose than divert my designs to hunt after a sentence. 'Tis for words to serve and to follow us; and let Gascon come in play where French will not do.[4] I would have things so possess the imagination of him that hears that he should have something else to do than to think of words. The way of speaking that I love is natural and plain, as well in writing as speaking, and a sinewy and significant way of expressing one's self, short and pithy, and not so elegant and artificial as prompt and vehement.

Hæc demum sapiet dictio, quæ feriet.[5]

"The language which strikes the mind will please it."

Rather hard than harsh, free from affectation; irregular, incontinuous, and bold, where every piece makes up an entire body: not like a pedant, a preacher, or a pleader, but rather a soldier-like style, as Suetonius calls that of Julius Cæsar; and yet I see no reason why he should call it so.[6]

I have been ready enough to imitate the negligent garb which is observable among the young men of our time, to wear my cloak on one shoulder, my bonnet on one side, and one stocking in something more disorder than the other, which seems to express a kind of manly disdain of those exotic ornaments, and a contempt of art; but I find that negligence of even greater use in the form of speaking. All affectation, particularly in the French gaiety and freedom, is ungraceful in a courtier, and in a monarchy every gentleman ought to be fashioned according to the court model; for which reason an easy and natural negligence does well. I like not a piece of stuff where the knots and seams are to be seen, and as little do I like, in a fine proportioned man, to be able to tell all the bones and veins. *Quæ veritati operam dat oratio, incomposita sit, et simplex. * * * Quis accuratè loquitur, nisi qui vult putidè loqui?* * * * "Let the language that is dedicated to truth be plain and unaffected. For who studies to speak quaintly and accurately that does not, at the same time, design to perplex his auditory?" That eloquence prejudices the subject it would advance which wholly attracts us to itself. And as, in our outward habit, 'tis a ridiculous effeminacy to distinguish ourselves by a particular and unpractised garb or fashion; so, in language, to study new phrases, and to affect words that are not of current use, proceeds from a childish and scholastic ambition. As for me, may I never use any other language than what is understood in the markets of Paris! Aristophanes, the grammarian, was quite out, when he reprehended Epicurus for this plain way of delivering himself, and that the end and design of his oratory was only perspicuity of speech.[8] The imitation of words, by its own facility, immediately disperses itself through a whole people. But the imitation of invention and judgment in applying those words is of a slower progress. The generality of readers, when they find a like robe, very mistakingly imagine they have the same body inside it, but force and sinews are not to be borrowed, though the attire may. Most of those I converse with speak the same language I here write; but whether they think the same thoughts I cannot say. The Athenians, says Plato, study length and elegance of speaking; the Lacedæmonians affect brevity; and those of Crete aim more at fecundity of conception than fertility of speech, and these are the best.[9] Zenon used to say that he had two sorts of disciples, one that he called φιλολόγους, curious to learn things, and these were his favourites; the other, λογοφίλους, that cared for nothing but words.[10] Not but that proper speaking is a very good and commendable quality; but 'tis not so excellent and so necessary as some would make it; and I am scandalized that our whole life should be spent in nothing else. I would first understand my own language and that of my neighbours, with whom most of my business and conversation lies.

Affectation unbecoming a courtier.

No doubt but Greek and Latin are very great ornaments and of great use, but we buy them too dear. I will here mention one way which also has been experimented in my own person, by which they are to be had cheaper than in the usual mode, and such may make use of it as will. My late father having made the most precise enquiry that any man can possibly make amongst men of the greatest learning and judgment, of an exact method of education, was by them cautioned of the inconvenience then in use, and informed that the tedious time we applied to the learning of the languages of those people who, themselves, had them for nothing, was the sole cause we could not arrive to the grandeur of soul and perfection of knowledge of the ancient Greeks and Romans: I do not, however, believe that to be the only cause; the expedient my father, however, found out for this was that, in my infancy, and before I began to speak, he committed me to the care of a German (who since died a famous physician in France), totally ignorant of our language, but very fluent and a great critic in Latin. This man, whom he had sent for out of his own country, and whom he entertained, at a very great salary, for this only end, had me continually with him. To whom there were also joined two others of the same nation, but of inferior learning, to attend me, and sometimes to relieve him; who all of them conversed with me in no other language but Latin. As to the rest of his family, it was an inviolable rule that neither himself, nor my mother, nor man, nor maid, should speak any thing, in my company, but such Latin words as every one had learnt to gabble with me. It is not to be imagined how great an advantage this proved to the whole family; my father and my mother, by this means, learning Latin enough to understand it perfectly well, and to speak it to such a degree as was sufficient for any necessary use; as also those of the servants did who were most frequently with me. To be short, we did Latin it at such a rate that it overflowed to all the neighbouring villages, where there yet remain, and have established themselves by custom, several Latin appellations of artizans and their tools. As for myself, I was above six years of age before I understood either French or Perigordin any more than Arabic, and without art, book, grammar, or precept, whipping, or the expense of a tear, had by that time learned to speak as pure Latin as my master himself. If, for example, they were to give me a theme after the College fashion, they gave it to others in French, but to me they gave it in the worst Latin, to turn it into that which was pure and good; and Nicholas Grouchy, who wrote a book de Comitiis Romanorum; William Guerente, who has written a Commentary upon Aristotle; George Buchanan, that great Scotch Poet, and Marc Antony Muret, whom both France and Italy have acknowledged for the best orator of his time, my domestic tutors, have all of them often told me that I had in my infancy that language so very fluent and ready that they were afraid to enter into discourse with me. Buchanan, whom I since saw attending the late Mareschal de Brissac, then told me that he was about to write a Treatise of Education, the example of which he intended to take from mine, for he was then tutor to that Count de Brissac, who afterwards proved so valiant and so brave a gentleman.

[4] Rousseau also says, somewhere. "Toutes les fois qu'à l'aide d'un solécisme je pourrai me faire mieux entendre, ne pensez pas que j'hesite" He made himself, however, very well understood without the help of any solecisms, and his declaration, therefore, seems unnecessary; but it shews, at least, that he was as little a slave to purism as our Gascon.

As to Greek, of which I have but little smattering, my father also designed to have taught it me by art, but in a new way, and as a sort of sport; tossing out declensions to and fro, after the manner of those who, by certain games, at tables and chess, learn geometry and arithmetic; for he, amongst other rules, had been advised to make me relish science and duty by an unforced will, and of my own voluntary motion, and to educate my soul in all liberty and delight, without any severity or constraint. Which he was an observer of to such a degree, even of superstition, that some being of opinion it troubles and disturbs the brains of children suddenly to wake them in the morning, and to snatch them violently and over-hastily from sleep (wherein they are much more profoundly involved than we), he only caused me to be waked by the sound of some musical instrument, and was never unprovided of a musician for that purpose. By which example you may judge of the rest, this alone being sufficient to recommend both the prudence and affection of so good a father; who, therefore, is not to be blamed if he did not reap the fruits answerable to so excellent a culture. Of which, two things were the cause: first, a sterile and improper soil; for though I was of a strong and healthful constitution, and of a disposition tolerably gentle and tractable, yet I was, withal, so heavy, idle, and sluggish, that they could not rouse me even to any exercise of recreation, nor get me out to play. What I saw, I saw clear enough, and under this lazy complexion, nourished a bold imagination, and opinions above my age. I had a slothful wit, that would go no faster than it was led, a slow understanding, a languishing invention, and, above all, an incredible defect of memory; so that it is no wonder if, from all these, nothing considerable could be extracted. Secondly, like those who, impatient of a long and steady cure, submit to all sorts of prescriptions and receipts, the good man being extremely timorous of any way failing in a thing he had so wholly set his heart upon, suffered himself, at last, to be over-ruled by the common opinion, which always follows the lead of what has gone on before, like cranes; and falling in with the method of the time, having no longer about him those persons he had brought out of Italy, and who had given him his first models of education about him, he sent me, at six years of age, to the College of Guienne, at that time the best and most flourishing in France. And there it was not possible to add anything to the care he had to provide me the most able tutors, with all other circumstances of education, reserving also several particular rules contrary to the College practice; but so it was that, with all these precautions, it was a College still. My Latin immediately grew corrupt, and, by discontinuance, I have since lost all manner of use of it; and so this new plan of education served me to no other end than only, at my first coming, to prefer me to the first forms: for at thirteen years old, that I left the College, I had gone through my whole course, as they call it, and, in truth, without any manner of improvement, that I can honestly brag of, in all this time.

Montaigne's first taste for reading.

The first thing that gave me any taste of books was the pleasure I took in reading the fables of Ovid's Metamorphoses; and with them I was so taken that, being but seven or eight years old, I would steal from all other diversions to read them, both by reason that this was my own natural language, the easiest book that I was acquainted with, and for the subject the most accommodated to the capacity of my age: for as for Lancelot du Lake, Amadis de Gaul, Huon of Bourdeaux, and such trumpery, which children are most delighted with, I had never so much as heard their names, no more than I yet know what they contain; so exact was the discipline wherein I was brought up. This made me think the less of the other lessons prescribed me; and here it was infinitely to my advantage to have to do with an understanding tutor, who was wise enough to connive at this and other truantries of the same nature; for by this means I ran through Virgil's Æneids, and then Terence, and then Plautus, and some Italian comedies, allured by the pleasure of the subject; whereas had he been so foolish as to have taken me off this diversion, I do really believe I had brought nothing away from the college but a hatred of books, as almost all our young gentlemen do. But he carried himself very discreetly in that business, seeming to take no notice, and heightened my appetite by allowing me only such time for this reading as I could steal from my regular studies. For the chief things my father expected from them to whom he had delivered me for education was affability of manners and good humour; and, to say the truth, my temper had no other vice but sloth and want of mettle. The fear was not that I should do ill, but that I should do nothing. Nobody suspected that I should be wicked, but most thought I should be useless; they foresaw idleness, but no malice in my nature; and I find it falls out accordingly. The complaints I hear of myself are these: "He is idle, cold in the offices of friendship and relationship, and remiss in those of the public: he is too particular, he is too proud." The most injurious do not say, "Why has he taken such a thing?—why has he not paid such a one?" But "Why does he part with nothing? Why does he not give?" And I should take it for a favour that men would expect from me no greater effects of supererogation than these. But they are unjust to exact from me what I do not owe far more rigorously than they exact from others that which they do owe; and in condemning me to it they efface the gratification of the act, and deprive me of the gratitude that would be due to me upon such a bounty; whereas the active benefit ought to be of so much the greater value from my hands, by how much I am not passive that way at all. I can the more freely dispose of my fortune the more it is mine, and of myself the more I am my own. Nevertheless if I were good at setting out my own actions, I could peradventure very well repel these reproaches, and could give some to understand that they are not so much offended that I do not enough, as that I am able to do a great deal more than I do.

Yet for all this heavy disposition of mine, my mind, when retired into itself, was not altogether idle nor wholly deprived of solid inquiry nor of certain and clear judgments about those objects it could comprehend, and could also without any helps digest them; but, amongst other things, I do really believe it had been totally impossible to have made it to submit by violence and force. Shall I here acquaint you with one faculty of my youth? I had great boldness and assurance of countenance, and to that a flexibility of voice and gesture to any part I undertook to act; for before

> "I had hardly entered on my twelfth year,"

I played the chief parts in the Latin tragedies of Buchanan, Guerente, and Muret, that were acted in our college of Guienne with very great form; wherein Andreas Goveanus, our principal, as in all other parts of his undertaking, was, without comparison, the best of that employment in France, and I was looked upon as one of his chief actors. 'Tis an exercise that I do not disapprove in young people of condition, and I have since seen our princes, after the example of the ancients, perform such parts in person well and commendably; and it was moreover allowed to persons of the greatest quality to profess and make a trade of it in Greece. Aristoni tragico actori rem aperet: huic et genus et fortuna honesta erant; nec ars, quia nihil tale apud Græcos pudori est, ea deformabat.[2] "He imparted this affair to Aristo the tragedian, a man of a good family and fortune, which nevertheless did neither of them receive any blemish by that profession, nothing of that kind being reputed a disparagement in Greece." I have always taxed those with impertinence who condemn these entertainments, and those, with injustice, who refuse to admit such comedians as are worth seeing into our towns, and grudge the people that public diversion. A sensible plan of government takes care to assemble its citizens not only to the solemn duties of devotion, but also to sports and spectacles. They find society and friendship augmented by it; and besides, can there possibly be afforded a more orderly diversion than what is performed in the sight of every one, and very often in the presence of the supreme magistrate himself? I, for my part, think it desirable that the prince should sometimes gratify his people at his own expense, with paternal kindness as it were, and that in great and popular cities there should be theatres erected for such entertainments, if but to divert them from worse and more private actions.

To return to my subject: there is nothing like alluring the appetite and affection, otherwise you make nothing but so many asses laden with books, and by virtue of the lash give them their pocket full of learning to keep; whereas, to do well, you should not only lodge it with them, but make them espouse it.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THAT IT IS FOLLY TO MEASURE TRUTH AND ERROR BY OUR OWN CAPACITY.

'Tis not perhaps without reason that we attribute facility of belief and easiness of persuasion to simplicity and ignorance, for I have heard belief compared to an impression stamped upon the soul, which, by how much softer and of less resistance it is, is the more easily imposed. Ut necesse est lancem in librâ, ponderibus impositis, deprimi, sic animum perspicuis cedere.[1] "As the scale of the balance must give way to the weight that presses it down, so the mind must of necessity yield to demonstration." By how much the soul is more empty and without counterpoise, with so much greater facility it yields under the weight of the first persuasion. This is the reason that children, the common people, women, and sick folks, are most apt to be led by the ears. But then, on the other hand, 'tis a very great presumption to slight and condemn all things for false that do not appear to us likely to be true; which is the ordinary vice of such as fancy themselves wiser than their neighbours. I was myself once one of these; and if I heard talk of dead folks walking, of prophecies, enchantments, witchcrafts, or any other story, I had no mind to believe,

> Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula sagas,
> Nocturnos lemures, portentaque Thessala.[2]
>
> "Can you in earnest laugh at all the schemes
> Of magic terrors, visionary dreams,
> Portentous prodigies, and imps of hell,
> The nightly goblins and enchanting spell?"

I presently pitied the poor people that were abused by these follies; whereas I now find that I myself was to be pitied as much at least as they; not that experience has taught me anything to supersede my former opinion, though my curiosity has endeavoured that way; but reason has instructed me that thus resolutely to condemn anything for false and impossible is to circumscribe and limit the will of God and the power of nature within the bounds of my own capacity, than which no folly can be greater. If we give the names of monster and miracle to everything our reason cannot comprehend, how many such are continually presented before our eyes! Let us but consider through what clouds, and as it were groping through what darkness, our teachers lead us to the knowledge of most of the things we apply our studies to, and we shall find that it is rather custom than knowledge that takes away the wonder, and renders them easy and familiar to us.

> —— Jam nemo, fessus saturusque videndi,
> Suspicere in cœli dignatur lucida templa.[3]
>
> "Already glutted with the sight, now none > Heaven's lucid temples deigns to look upon."

And that if those things were now newly presented to us we should think them as strange and incredible, if not more so, than any others.

> —— Si nunc primum mortalibus adsint
> Ex improviso, ceu sint objecta repentè,
> Nil magis his rebus poterat mirabile dici,
> Aut minus ante quod auderent fore credere gentes.[4]
>
> "Were those things suddenly and by surprise
> Just now presented, new to mortal eyes,
> At nothing could they be astonish'd more,
> Nor could have formed a thought of them before."

He that had never seen a river imagined the first he met with to be the sea; and the greatest things that have fallen within our knowledge we conclude the extremes that nature makes of the kind.

> Scilicet, et fluvius qui non est maximus, ei est
> Qui non ante aliquem majorem vidit; et ingens
> Arbor, homoque videtur; et omnia de genere omni
> Maxima quæ vidit quisque, hæc ingentia fingit.[5]
>
> "A little river unto him does seem,
> That bigger never saw, a mighty stream:
> A tree, a man, all things seem to his view
> O' th' kind the greatest that ne'er greater knew."

Consuetudine oculorum, assuescunt animi, neque admirantur, neque requirunt rationes earum rerum quas semper vident.[6] "Things grow familiar to men's minds by being often seen; so that they neither admire nor are inquisitive into things they daily see." The novelty, rather than the greatness, of things tempts us to inquire into their causes. But we are to judge with more reverence, and with greater acknowledgment of our own ignorance and infirmity, of the infinite power of nature. How many unlikely things are there testified by people of very good repute, which if we cannot persuade ourselves absolutely to believe, we ought at least to leave them in suspense! For to condemn them as impossible is by a temerarious presumption to pretend to know the utmost bounds of possibility. Did we rightly understand the difference betwixt the impossible and the unusual, and what is contrary to the order and course of nature and against the common opinion of men, in not believing rashly, and on the other hand in being not too incredulous, we should then observe the rule of Ne quid nimis, enjoined by Chilo.[1] When we find in Froissard that the Count de Foix knew in Bearn the defeat of John King of Castile at Juberoth the next day after, and the means by which he tells us he came to do so, we may be allowed to be a little merry at it, as also at what our annals report, that Pope Honorius, the same day that King Philip Augustus died at Mante, performed his public obsequies at Rome, and commanded the like throughout Italy; the testimony of these authors not being perhaps of authority enough to restrain us. But if Plutarch, besides several examples that he produces out of antiquity, tells us, of his certain knowledge, that in the time of Domitian the news of the battle lost by Antony in Germany was published at Rome many days' journey thence[2] and dispersed throughout the whole world the same day it was fought: and if Cæsar was of opinion that it has often happened that the report has preceded the event, shall we say that, forsooth, these simple people have suffered themselves to be deceived with the vulgar, not having been so clear-sighted as we? Is there anything more delicate, more clear, more sprightly than Pliny's judgment, when he is pleased to set it to work?—anything more remote from vanity? Setting aside his great learning, of which I make less account, in which of these two do any of us excel him? Yet there is no schoolboy that does not convict him of lying, and that pretends not to instruct him in the progress of the works of nature.

When we read in Bouchet the miracles of St. Hilary's relics, never heed them; his authority is not sufficient to take from us the liberty of contradicting him: but generally to condemn in a lump all such stories seems to me a singular impudence. The great St. Augustine tells us he himself saw a blind child recover sight upon the relic of St. Gervaise and St. Protasius at Milan;[3] a woman at Carthage cured of a cancer by the sign of the cross made upon her by a woman newly baptized; Hesperius, a familiar friend of his, to drive away the spirits that haunted his house with a little earth of the sepulchre of our Lord;[4] and this earth being transported thence into the church, a paralytic to have there been suddenly cured by it; a woman in a procession, having touched St. Stephen's shrine with a nosegay, and after rubbing her eyes with it to have recovered her sight lost many years before; with several other miracles, of which he professes himself to have been an eye-witness. Of what shall we accuse him and the two holy bishops Aurelius and Maximinus, both of whom he attests to the truth of these things? Shall it be of ignorance, simplicity, and facility, or of knavery or imposture? Is any man now living so impudent as to think himself comparable to them either in virtue, piety, learning, judgment, or capacity? Qui ut rationem nullam afferrent, ipsa auctoritate me frangerent?[5] "Who, though they should give me no reason for what they affirm, would yet convince me with their authority?" 'Tis a presumption of great danger and consequence, besides the absurd temerity it draws after it, to contemn what we do not comprehend. For after that, according to your fine understanding, you have established the limits of truth and error, and that afterwards there appears a necessity upon you of believing stranger things than those you have contradicted, you are already obliged to quit your hold and to acquiesce. That which seems to me so much to disorder our consciences, in the commotions we are now in concerning religion, is the Catholics dispensing so much with their belief. They fancy they appear moderate and wise when they give up to the Huguenots some of the articles in question; but besides that they do not discern what advantage it is to those with whom we contend for us to begin to give ground and to retire, and how much this animates the enemy to follow up his blow, the articles which they select as the most indifferent are sometimes of very great importance. We are either wholly and absolutely to submit ourselves to the authority of our ecclesiastical polity, or totally throw off all obedience to it; 'tis not for us to determine what and how much obedience we owe to it. And this I can say, having myself made trial of it, and having formerly taken the liberty of my own swing and fancy, and neglected certain of the observations of our church which seemed to me vain and unmeaning, that, coming afterwards to discourse the matter with learned men, I have found those very things to be built upon very good and solid foundation; and that

[1] Μηδὲν ἄγαν, Aristotle in his Rhetoric, and Pliny (Nat. Hist., vii. 32), ascribe this maxim to Chilo, as does Diogenes Laertius in the Life of Thales; but he afterwards ascribes it to Solon in his Life of Solon. It has been also attributed to others. See Menage's Observations on Diogenes Laertius in the Life of Thales.

[2] Above 840 leagues, says Plutarch, in his Life of Paulus Æmilius, but the real distance is only 250 leagues.

[3] De Civit. Dei, xxii. 8.

[4] St. Austin, however, does not ascribe this expulsion of the evil spirits to that small quantity of the earth of our Lord's sepulchre which Hesperius had in his house; for, according to St. Austin, one of his priests having, at the entreaty of Hesperius, repaired to his house and offered the sacrifice of the body of Christ, and having prayed earnestly to God to put a stop to this disturbance, God did so at the very instant. As to the earth taken from the holy sepulchre, Hesperius kept it suspended in his own bedchamber, to secure him from the insults of the devils, who had been very mischievous to his slaves and cattle; for though he was protected against the evil spirits of the earth, yet this influence did not extend to the rest of his family.

nothing but dulness and ignorance make us receive them with less reverence than the rest. Why do we not consider what contradictions we find in our own judgments, how many things were yesterday articles of our faith that to-day appear mere fables? Glory and curiosity are the scourges of the soul; of which the last prompts us to thrust our noses into everything, and the other forbids us to leave anything doubtful and undecided.

CHAPTER XXVII.

OF FRIENDSHIP.

HAVING observed the method of a painter I have, that serves me, I had a mind to imitate his way. He chooses the best place, the middle of a panel, wherein to draw a picture, which he finishes with his utmost care and art, and the empty space he fills with grotesque, odd, fantastic figures, without any grace but what they derive from their variety and the extravagance of their shapes. And, in truth, what are these things I scribble, other than grotesques, monstrous pieces of patchwork, without any certain figure, or any other than accidental order, coherence, or proportion?

Definit in piscem mulier formosa superne.[1]

"That a fair woman's face above doth show,
But in a fish's tail doth end below."

In this second part I go hand in hand with my painter, but fall very short of him in the first, and the better; my power of handling not being such that I dare to offer at a fine piece richly painted and set off according to art. I have therefore thought best to borrow one of Estienne de la Boetie,[2] and such a one as will honour and adorn all the rest of my work; namely, a discourse that he called Voluntary Servitude, which others have since further baptized Le Contre-Un,[3] a piece written in his younger years, by way of essay, in honour of liberty against tyrants, and which has since been in the hands of several men of great learning and judgment, not without singular and merited commendation, for it is finely written and as full as anything can possibly be. Yet I may confidently say it is far short of what he is able to do; and if in that more mature age wherein I knew him, he had taken a design like this of mine, to commit his thoughts to writing, we should have seen a great many rare things, and such as would have gone very near to have rivalled the best writings of antiquity: for in natural parts, especially, I know no man comparable to him. But he has left nothing behind him save this treatise only (and that too by chance, for I believe he never saw it after it first went out of his hands), and some observations upon that edict of January,[4] made famous by our civil wars, which also shall elsewhere, peradventure, find a place. These were all I could recover of his remains; I, to whom, with so affectionate a remembrance, upon his death-bed, he by his last will bequeathed his library and papers, the little book of his works only excepted, which I committed to the press.[5] And this particular obligation I have to this treatise of his, that it was the occasion of my first coming acquainted with him; for it was showed to me long before I saw him, and gave me the first knowledge of his name; proving so the first cause and foundation of a friendship which we afterwards improved and maintained so long as God was pleased to continue us together, so perfect, inviolate, and entire, that certainly the like is hardly to be found in story, and amongst the men of this age there is no sign nor trace of any such thing. So many concurrents are required to the building of such a one, that 'tis much if fortune bring it but once to pass in three ages.

There is nothing to which nature seems so much to have inclined us as to society; and Aristotle says[6] that good legislators had more respect to friendship than to justice. Now the most supreme point of its perfection is this: for generally all those that pleasure, profit, public or private interest, create and nourish, are so much the less noble and generous, and so much the less friendships, by how much they mix up another cause and design than friendship itself. Neither do the four ancient kinds, natural, sociable, hospitable, and venerean, either separately or jointly make up a true and perfect friendship.

Perfect friendship, what it is.

Friendship does not tally properly with the four sorts of connection distinguished by the ancients.

That of children to parents is rather respect: friendship being nourished by communication, which cannot, by reason of the great disparity, be betwixt them; but would rather perhaps violate the duties of nature; for neither are all the secret thoughts of fathers fit to be communicated to children, lest it beget an indecent familiarity betwixt them; nor can the advices

[2] Yet it is not here; and why Montaigne has not inserted it he tells us at the end of the chapter.

The parliament at first refused to register it, saying, "Nec possumus, nec debemus;" but they consented, after receiving two positive orders from the king on the subject. The edict contains a rule of conduct for the Protestants, which, among other things, directs that "they shall advance nothing against the Council of Nicea, against the symbol, or against the Old and New Testament."

and reproofs, which is one of the principal offices of friendship, be properly performed by the son to the father. There are some countries where 'tis the custom for children to kill their fathers; and others where the fathers kill their children, to prevent their being sometimes an impediment to one another in their designs; and moreover, the expectation of the one does naturally depend upon the ruin of the other. There have been great philosophers who have made nothing of this tie of nature; as Aristippus for one, who, being pressed home about the affection he owed to his children, as being come from him, presently fell to spit, saying that also came from him, and that we did also breed worms and lice;[1] and that other, that Plutarch endeavoured to reconcile to his brother, "I make never the more account of him," said he, "for coming out of the same place."[2] This name of brother does indeed carry with it an amiable and affectionate sound, and for that reason he and I called one another brothers.[3] But the complication of interests, the division of estates, the raising of the one at the undoing of the other, does strangely weaken and slacken the fraternal tie: and brothers pursuing their fortune and advancement by the same path, 'tis hardly possible but they must of necessity often jostle and hinder one another. Besides, why should the correspondence of manners, parts, and inclinations, which beget true and perfect friendships, always meet and concur in these relations? The father and the son may be of quite contrary humours, and brothers be without any manner of sympathy in their natures. He is my son, he is my father; but he is passionate, ill-natured, or a fool. And moreover, by how much these are friendships that the law and natural obligation impose upon us, so much less is there of our own choice and free will, which free will of ours has no creation properly its own than through affection and friendship. Not that I have not in my own person experienced all that can possibly be expected of that kind, having had the best and most indulgent father, even to an extreme old age, that ever was, and who was himself descended from a family for many generations famous and exemplary for brotherly concord:

> —— Et ipse
> Notus in fratres animi paterni.[4]
>
> "And he himself noted the rest above,
> Towards his brothers for paternal love."

We are not here to bring the love we bear to women, though it be an act of our own choice, into comparison; nor rank it with the others. Its fire, I confess,

> Neque enim est Dea nescia nostri
> Quæ dulcem curis miscet amaritiem;[5]
>
> "Nor is my goddess ign'rant what I am,
> Who pleasing sorrows mixes with my flame";

is more active, more eager, and more sharp; but, withal, 'tis more precipitous, fickle, moving, and inconstant: a fever subject to intermission and paroxysms, that has hold but on one part of us; whereas, in friendship, 'tis a general and universal fire, but temperate and equal, a constant and steady heat, all easy and smooth, without poignancy or roughness. Moreover, in love, 'tis no other than a frantic desire for that which flies from us:

> Come segue la lepre il cacciatore
> Al freddo, al caldo, alla montagna, al lito;
> Ne più la stima poi che presa vede;
> E sol dietro à chi fugge affretta il piede:[6]
>
> "Like hunters that the flying hare pursue
> O'er hill and dale, through heat and morning dew,
> Which being ta'en, the quarry they despise,
> Being only pleased in following that which flies."

So soon as ever it enters into the terms of friendship, that is to say, into a concurrence of desires, it vanishes and is gone, fruition destroys it, as having only a fleshly end, subject to satiety. Friendship, on the contrary, is enjoyed proportionably as it is desired, and only grows up, is nourished and improves by enjoyment, as being spiritual, and the soul growing still more perfect by use. Under this perfect friendship I cannot deny but that the other vain affections have, in my younger years, found some place in my thoughts, to say nothing of him, who himself confesses it but too much in his verses; so that I had both these passions, but always so that I could myself well enough distinguish them, and never in any degree of comparison with one another; the first maintaining its flight at so lofty a height as with disdain to look down and see the other flying at a far humbler pitch below.

As to marriage, besides that it is a covenant, the making of which is only free, but the continuance in it forced and compelled, having another dependance than that of our own free will, and a bargain, moreover, commonly contracted to other ends, there happen a thousand intricacies in it to unravel, enough to break the thread, and to divert the current, of a lively affection: whereas, friendship has no manner of business or traffic with any thing but itself. Moreover, to say truth, the ordinary talent of women is not such as is sufficient to maintain the conference and communication required to the support of this sacred tie; nor do they appear to be endued with firmness of mind to endure the constraint of so hard and durable a knot. Doubtless if there could be such a free and voluntary familiarity contracted, where not only the souls might have this entire fruition, but the bodies also might share in the alliance, and the whole man be engaged in it, the friend-

[3] That is to say that, according to the usage established in Montaigne's time, they gave one another the style of brothers, as it was to be the token and pledge of the friendship which they had contracted. And upon the same principle Mademoiselle de Gournay styled herself Montaigne's daughter, and not because Montaigne married her mother, as I have heard it affirmed.

ship would certainly be more full and perfect; but there is no example that this sex ever arrived at such perfection, and, by the ancient schools, is wholly rejected. That other, the Grecian license, justly abhorred by our manners, from having, according to their practice, a so necessary disparity of age and difference of offices betwixt the lovers, answers as little to the perfect union and harmony of the lovers that we here require. Quis est enim iste amor amicitiæ? Cur neque deformem adolescentem quisquam amat, neque formosum senem?[1] "For what is the love of friendship? Why does no one love a deformed youth or a comely old man?" The very picture that the Academy presents of it will not, as I conceive, contradict me when I say that the first fury inspired by the son of Venus, in the heart of the lover, upon the sight of blooming youth, to which they allow all the insolent and passionate efforts that an immoderate ardour can produce, was simply founded upon an external beauty, the false image of corporal generation; for upon the soul it could not ground this love, the sight of which, as yet, lay concealed, was but now springing up, and not of maturity to blossom. Which fury, if it seized upon a mean spirit, the means by which he preferred his suit were rich presents, advancement to dignities, and other such trumpery, which they by no means approve: if on a more generous soul the pursuit was suitably generous, by philosophical instructions, precepts to revere religion, to obey the laws, to die for the good of his country; by examples of valour, prudence, and justice, the lover studying to render himself acceptable by the grace and beauty of his soul, that of his body being long since faded and decayed, hoping by this mental society to establish a more firm and lasting contract. When this courtship came to its effect, in due season, for that which they do not require in the lover, namely leisure and discretion in his pursuit, they strictly require in the person loved; forasmuch as he is to judge of an internal beauty, of difficult knowledge, and obscure discovery, then there sprung in the person loved, the desire of a spiritual conception by the mediation of a spiritual beauty. This was the principal, the corporeal but an accidental and secondary part, all contrary to the lover. For this reason they prefer the person beloved, maintaining that the gods, in like manner, prefer him too, and very much blame the poet Æschylus for having, in the loves of Achilles and Patroclus, given the lover's part to Achilles, who was in the first flower and pubescency of his youth, and the handsomest of all the Greeks. After this general familiarity and mutual community of thoughts, is once settled, supposing the sovereign and most worthy part to govern and to perform its proper offices, they say that thence great utility was derived, both to private and public concerns, that the power of countries received its beginning thence, and that it was the chief security of liberty and justice. Of which the salutary loves of Harmodus and Aristogiton is an instance; and, therefore, it is that they called it sacred and divine, and conceived that nothing but the violence of tyrants and the baseness of the common people was inimical to it. In short, all that can be said in favour of the Academy is that it was a love which ended in friendship; which well enough agrees with the stoical definition of love: Amorem conatum esse amicitiæ faciendæ ex pulchritudinis specie.[2] "That love is a desire of contracting friendship from the beauty of the object."

Friendship against nature very much in use among the Greeks. Montaigne's opinion of it.

I return to my own more just and true description. Omnino amicitiæ, corroboratis jam confirmatis que et ingeniis, et ætatibus judicandæ sunt.[3] "Those are only to be reputed friendships that are fortified and confirmed by judgment and length of time." For the rest, what we commonly call friends and friendships are nothing but an acquaintance and connection, contracted either by accident or upon some design, by means of which there happens some little intercourse betwixt our souls: but, in the friendship I speak of, they mingle and melt into one piece, with so universal a mixture that there is left no more sign of the seam by which they were first conjoined. If any one should importune me to give a reason why I loved him, I feel it could no otherwise be expressed than by making answer, "Because it was he; because it was I." There is beyond what I am able to say, I know not what inexplicable and inevitable power that brought on this union. We sought one another long before we met, and from the characters we heard of one another, which wrought more upon our affections than in reason mere reports should do, and, as I think, by some secret appointment of heaven; we embraced each other in our names; and at our first meeting, which was accidentally at a great city entertainment, we found ourselves so mutually pleased with one another, we became, at once, mutually so endeared, that thence-forward nothing was so near to us as one another. He wrote an excellent Latin satire, which is printed,[4] wherein he excuses and explains the precipitateness of our intimacy, so suddenly come to perfection. Having so short a time to continue, as being begun so late, for we were both full grown men, and he some years the older, there was no time to lose; nor was it tied to conform itself to the example of those slow and regular friendships that require so many precautions of a long preliminary conversation. This has no other idea than that of itself, and can have no relation but to itself. 'Tis no one particular consideration, nor two, nor three, nor four, nor a thousand. 'Tis I know not what quintessence of all this mixture which, seizing my whole will, carried it to plunge and lose itself in his; and that having seized his whole will, brought it, with equal concurrence and appetite, to plunge and lose itself in mine. I may truly say lose, reserving nothing to ourselves that was either his or mine.

The quintessence of true friendship.

When Lælius, in the presence of the Roman Consuls, who, after they had sentenced Tiberius Gracchus, prosecuted all those who had any familiarity with him also, came to ask Caius Blosius, who was his chief friend and confidant, how much he would have done for him? he made answer, "All things." "How! All things!" said Lælius. "And what if he had commanded you to fire our temples?" "He would never have commanded me that," replied Blosius. "But what if he had?" said Lælius. "I would have obeyed him," said the other.[1] If he was so perfect a friend to Gracchus as the histories report him to have been, there was yet no necessity of offending the Consuls by such a bold confession, though he might still have retained the assurance he had of Gracchus's disposition. Still those who accuse this answer as seditious, do not well understand the mystery; nor pre-suppose, as was the fact, that he had Gracchus's will in his sleeve, both by the power of a friend and the perfect knowledge he had of the man. They were more friends than citizens, and more friends to one another than either friends or enemies to their country, or than friends to ambition and innovation. Having absolutely given up themselves to one another, each held absolutely the reins of the other's inclination, which they governed by virtue, and guided by the conduct of reason; which, without these, it is not possible to do, and, therefore, Blosius's answer was such as it ought to have been. If their actions flew out of the handle, they were neither, according to my notion, friends to one another nor to themselves. As to the rest, this answer carries no worse sound than mine would do to one that should ask me, "If your will should command you to kill your daughter, would you do it?" And that I should make answer that I would; for this expresses no consent to such an act, forasmuch as I do not, in the least, suspect my own will, and as little should I that of such a friend. 'Tis not in the power of all the eloquence in the world to dispossess me of the certainty I have of the intentions and resolutions of mine; nay, no one action of his, what face soever it might bear, could be presented to me, of which I could not presently, and at first sight, find out the moving cause. Our souls have drawn so unitedly together, and we have, with so mutual a confidence, laid open the very bottom of our hearts to one another's view, that I not only knew his as well as my own, but should, certainly, in any concern of mine, have trusted my interest much more willingly with him than with myself. Let no one, therefore, rank common friendship with such a one as this. I have had as much experience of these as another, and of the most perfect of their kind; but I do not advise that any should confound the rules of the one and the other; for they would find themselves much deceived. In ordinary friendships you must walk bridle in hand, with prudence and circumspection, for in them the knot is not so sure that a man may not fully depend upon its not slipping. "Love him," said Chilo, "so as if you were one day to hate him; and hate him so as you were one day to love him."[2] A precept that, though abominable in the sovereign and perfect friendship which I speak of, is, nevertheless, very sound as to ordinary cases, and to which the saying that Aristotle had so frequently in his mouth, "O my friends, there is no friend,"[3] may very fitly be applied. In this glorious commerce, the good offices, and benefits, by which other friendships are supported and maintained, do not deserve so much as to be mentioned, and are, by this concurrence of our wills, rendered of no use. As the kindness I have for myself receives no increase, for any thing I relieve myself withal, in time of need, whatever the Stoics say, and as I do not find myself obliged to myself for any service I do myself, so the union of such friends, being really perfect, deprives them of all idea of acknowledgment of such duties, and makes them loathe and banish from their conversation these words implying a difference and distinction, benefit, obligation, entreaty, thanks, and the like. All things, wills, thoughts, opinions, goods, wives, children, honour, and life, being, in effect, common betwixt them, and their condition being no other than one soul in two bodies, according to the very proper definition of Aristotle,[4] they can neither lend nor give any thing to one another. This is the reason why the law-givers, to honour marriage with some imaginary resemblance of this divine alliance, interdict all

The idea of common friendship.

Amongst friends all things are common.

[2] Aulus Gellius, i. 3. Diogenes Laertius, In the Life of Bias, attributes this saying to that wise man, i. 7., as Aristotle had done before, in his Rhetoric, ii. 13, where we read the second article, viz. "That a man should be hated as if some day hereafter he should be loved;" which is not in Diogenes Laertius. As to the first article, "That a man should only be loved as if he were some day to be hated," Cicero says that he cannot imagine such an expression came from Bias, one of the seven wise men. De Amicitiâ, 16.

gifts betwixt man and wife; inferring by that that all should belong to each of them, and that they have nothing to divide between or to give one another. If, in the friendship of which I speak, one could give to the other, the receiver of the benefit would be the man that obliged his friend; for each of them, above all things, studying how to be useful to the other, he that affords the occasion is the generous man, in giving his friend the satisfaction of doing that which, above all things, he does most desire. When the philosopher, Diogenes, wanted money, he used to say that he re-demanded it of his friends, not that he demanded it;[1] and to let you see the practice of this, I will here produce an ancient and singular example: Eudamidas, a Corinthian, had two friends, Charixenus, a Syconian, and Aretheus, a Corinthian; this man coming to die, being poor, and his two friends being rich, he made his will, after this manner: "I bequeath to Aretheus the maintenance of my mother, to support and provide for her in her old age; and to Charixenus I bequeath the care of marrying my daughter, and to give her as good a portion as he is able; and in case one of these chances to die, I hereby substitute the survivor in his place."[2] They who first saw this will made themselves very merry at the contents; but the heirs being made acquainted with it, accepted the legacies with very great content; and one of them, Charixenus, dying within five days after, and Aretheus having thus the charge of both devolved solely to him, he nourished the old woman with very great care and tenderness, and, of five talents he had, gave two and a half in marriage with an only daughter he had of his own, and two and a half in marriage with the daughter of Eudamidas, and in one and the same day solemnized both their nuptials. This example is very full to the point, if one thing were not to be objected, namely, the multitude of friends; for the perfect friendship I speak of is indivisible; each one gives himself so entirely to his friend that he has nothing left to distribute to others: nay, is sorry that he is not double, treble, or quadruple, and that he has not many souls and many wills to confer them all upon this one object. Common friendships will admit of division, one may love the beauty of this, the good humour of that person, the liberality of a third, the paternal affection of a fourth, the fraternal love of a fifth, and so on. But this friendship that possesses the whole soul, and there rules and sways with an absolute sovereignty, can admit of no rival. If two, at the same time, should call to you for succour, to which of them would you run? Should they require of you contrary offices, how could you serve them both? Should one commit a thing to your secresy that it were of importance to the other to know, how would you disengage yourself? The one particular friendship disunites and dissolves all other obligations whatsoever. The secret I have sworn not to reveal to any other I may, without perjury, communicate to him who is not another, but, myself. 'Tis miracle enough, certainly, for a man to double himself, but they that talk of tripling, talk they know not of what. Nothing is extreme that has its like; and whoso shall suppose that, of two, I love one as much as the other, that they love one another too, and love me as much as I love them, does multiply into a society that which is the most single and one of all things, and wherein, moreover, one only is the hardest thing in the world to find. The remaining part of this story suits very well with what I said before; for Eudamidas, as a bounty and favour, bequeathes to his friends a legacy of employing themselves in his service; he leaves them heirs to this liberality of his, which consists in giving them the opportunity of conferring a benefit upon him, and, doubtless, the force of friendship is more eminently apparent in this act of his than in that of Aretheus. In short, these are effects not to be imagined nor comprehended by such as have no experience of them, and which make me infinitely honour and admire the answer of that young soldier to Cyrus, by whom, being asked how much he would take for a horse, with which he had won the prize of a race, and whether he would exchange him for a kingdom? "No, truly, sir," said he, "but I would give him with all my heart for a true friend, could I find a man worthy of that relation."[3] He did well in saying, could I find, for though a man may almost every where meet with men sufficiently qualified for a superficial acquaintance, yet, in this, where a man is to deal from the very bottom of his heart, without any manner of reservation, it will be requisite that all the wards and springs be true and plain, and perfectly sure. In leagues that hold but by one end, we have only to provide against the imperfections that particularly concern that end. It can be of no importance to me of what religion my physician or my lawyer is, provided the one be a good lawyer, and the other a good physician; this consideration has nothing in common with the offices of friendship, and I am of the same indifferency in the domestic acquaintance my servants must necessarily contract with me; I never enquire, when I take a footman, if he be chaste, but if he be diligent; and am not solicitous if my chairman be given to gaming, so he be strong and able, or if my cook be a swearer, so he be a good cook. I do not, however, take upon me to direct what other men should do in such matters—there are those that meddle enough with that—but only give an account of what I do myself.

Mihi sic usus est: tibi, ut opus est facto, face.[1]

"This has my practice been: but thou may'st do What thy affairs or fancy prompt thee to."

At table, I prefer the witty before the grave: in bed, beauty before goodness; and in common discourse, eloquence, whether or no there be sincerity in the case. And as he[2] that was found astride upon a stick, playing with his children, entreated the person who had surprised him in that posture to say nothing of it till he himself came to be a father, supposing that the fondness that would then possess his own soul would render him a more equal judge of such an action, so I also could wish to speak to such as have had experience of what I say; though, knowing how remote a thing such a friendship is from the common practice, and how rarely such is to be found, I despair of meeting with any one qualified to be a judge. For even the discourses left us by antiquity upon this subject seem to me flat and low, in comparison of the sense I have of it, and in this particular the effects surpass the very precepts of philosophy.

Nil ego contulerim jucundo sanus amico.[3]

"I know no pleasure that can health attend,
Like the delight of an amusing friend."

Menander of old declared him to be happy that had the good fortune to meet with but the shadow of a friend;[4] and doubtless he had good reason to say so, especially if he spoke by experience: for, in good earnest, if I compare all the rest of my life,—though, thanks be to God, I have always passed my time pleasantly enough and at my ease, and, the loss of such a friend excepted, free from any grievous affliction, and in great tranquillity of mind, having been contented with my natural and original conveniences and advantages, without being solicitous after others,—if I should compare it all, I say, with the four years I had the happiness to enjoy the sweet society of this excellent man, 'tis nothing but smoke, but an obscure and tedious night. From the day that I lost him,

—— Quem semper acerbum,
Semper honoratum (sic Di voluistis!) habebo,[5]

"Which, since 'tis heaven's decree, though too severe,
I shall lament, but ever shall revere,"

I have only led a sorrowful and languishing life; and the very pleasures that present themselves to me, instead of administering anything of consolation, double my affliction for his loss. We were halves throughout, and to that degree that, methinks, by outliving him I defraud him of his part.

Nec jus esse ulla me voluptate hic frui
Decrevi, tantisper dum ille abest, meus particeps.[6]

"No pleasing thought shall e'er my soul employ While he is absent who was all my joy."

I was so accustomed to be always his second in all places, and in all things, that, methinks, I am no more than half a man, and have but half a being.

Illam meæ si partem animæ tulit

"For, since that half my soul was snatched away
By riper age, why does the other stay?
Which now's not dear, nor truly does survive
That day our double ruin did contrive."

There is no act or imagining of mine wherein I do not miss him. For as he surpassed me by infinite degrees in virtue and all other accomplishments, so he also did in all offices of friendship.

From that sad day when thou wert snatched from hence!
Those joys are vanished which my heart once knew,
When in sweet converse all our moments flew:

And all my soul is lifeless since thou'rt dead.
The Muses at thy fun'ral I forsook,
And of all joy my leave for ever took.
Dearer than life! am I so wretched then,
Never to hear or speak to thee again?
Nor see those lips, now frozen up by death?
Yet I will love thee to my latest breath!"

But let us hear a boy of sixteen speak:—In this place I had intended to have inserted his Memoirs upon the famous edict of January; but as I have since found that they are already printed,[10] and with a malicious design, by some who make it their business to molest and endeavour to subvert the state of our government, not caring whether they mend and reform it or no; and that they have mixed up this writing of his with others of their own leaven, I desist from that purpose. But that the memory of the author may not suffer with such as were not acquainted with his principles, I here give them to understand that it was written by him in his very early years, and that by way of exercise only, as a common theme that has been tumbled and tossed about by a thousand writers. I make no question but that he himself believed what he wrote, being so conscientious that way that he would not so much as lie in jest: and I moreover know that, could it have been in his own choice, he would rather have been born at Venice than at Sarlac, and he had reason: but he had another maxim sovereignly imprinted in his soul, religiously to obey and submit to the laws under which he was born. There never was a better citizen, nor more anxious for his country's peace; neither was there ever a greater enemy to all the commotions and innovations of his time: so that he would, without doubt, much rather have employed his talent to the extinguishing of those civil flames than have added any fuel to them: for he had a mind framed to the model of better ages. But in exchange of this serious piece, I will present you with another of a more gay and frolic air from the same hand, and writ at the same age.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

NINE AND TWENTY SONNETS OF ESTIENNE DE LA BOËTIE.

To Madame de Grammont, Countess of Guissen.

MADAM, I offer you nothing of mine, either because it is already yours, or because I find nothing in my writings worthy of you. But I have a great desire that these verses, into what part of the world soever they may travel, may carry your name in the front, for the honour will accrue to them, by having the great Corisande d'Andoins for their safe conduct.[1] I conceive this present, madam, so much the more proper for you, both by reason there are few ladies in France who are so good judges of poetry and make so good use of it as you do; as also that there is none who can give it the spirit and life you can, by that incomparable voice nature has added to your other perfections. These verses, madam, deserve your esteem, and you will concur with me in this, that Gascony never yielded any with more invention, finer expression, or that more evidently shew themselves to have flowed from a master-hand. And be not jealous then that you have but the remainder of what I published some years since, under the name of Monsieur de Foix, your worthy kinsman; for certainly these have something in them more sprightly and luxuriant, as being written in a greener youth, when he was enflamed with a certain noble ardour, madam, of which I will tell you in your ear. The others were written since, when he was a suitor, in honour of his wife, and already smack somewhat of matrimonial coldness. And, for my part, I am of the same opinion with those who hold that poetry appears nowhere so gay as in a wanton and irregular subject.

[These nine-and-twenty sonnets that were inserted here, are since printed with Boëtie's other works. They are very indifferent compositions, being little else than amorous complaints expressed in a rough style, exhibiting the follies and outrages of a restless passion, overgorged, as it were, with jealousies, fears, and suspicions. Indeed, Montaigne himself, in the editions subsequent to that of 1588, omits them, observing, "These verses are to be found elsewhere."]

CHAPTER XXIX.

OF MODERATION.

As though we had an infectious touch, we, by our manner of handling, corrupt things that in themselves are laudable and good. We may grasp virtue so hard that it becomes vice, if we embrace it too eagerly and with too violent a desire. Those who say there is never any excess in virtue, forasmuch as it is no virtue when it once becomes excess, only play upon words.

Whether virtue can be too vehemently sought after.

> Insani sapiens nomen ferat, æquus iniqui,
> Ultra quàm satis est virtutem si petat ipsam.[2]
>
> "Mad grow the wise, the just unjust are found,
> When e'en to virtue they prescribe no bound."

This is a subtle consideration in philosophy. A man may both be too much in love with virtue and be excessive in a just action. Holy Writ agrees with this: "Be not wiser than you should, but be soberly wise."[3] I have known a great man prejudice the opinion men had of his religion, by pretending to be devout

[1] Diana, Viscountess of Louvigni, surnamed the Fair Corisandè of Andouins, married in 1567 Philibert, Count of Grammont and Guiche, who died at the siege of La Fère, in 1580. Andouins, or Andoins, was a barony of Bearn, three leagues from Pau. The King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., fell in love with the fair widow, and at one time had even an idea of marrying her. Count Hamilton, in his Epistle to Count Grammont, thus reminds him of his illustrious ancestress:—

"Honneur des rives éloignées Où Corisande vit le jour," &c.

beyond all examples of others of his condition.[1] I love temperate and moderate nature. An immoderate zeal, even for that which is good, though it does not offend, does astonish me, and puts me to study what name to give it. Neither the mother of Pausanias,[2] who was the first suggester of her son's death, and lay the first stone towards it; nor Posthumius, the dictator, who put his son to death, whom the ardour of youth had pushed upon the enemy a little before the rest of his squadron;[3] appear to me so just as strange; and I should neither advise, nor like to follow, a virtue so savage in itself, and that costs so dear. The archer that shoots over the mark misses as much as he that falls short; and 'tis equally troublesome to my eyes to look up at a great light as to look down into a dark abyss. Callicles, in Plato,[4] says that the extremity of philosophy is hurtful, and advises not to dive into it beyond the limits of profit; that taken moderately it is pleasant and useful, but that in the extreme it renders a man brutish and vicious; a contemner of religion and the common laws; an enemy to civil conversation and all human pleasures; incapable of all public administration; unfit either to assist others or to relieve himself; and a fit object to be injured and affronted without remedy. He says true, for in its excess it enslaves our natural freedom, and by an impertinent subtlety leads us out of the fair and beaten way that nature has traced out for us.

An immoderate zeal for that which is good.

The love we bear to our wives is very lawful, and yet theology thinks fit to curb and restrain it. As I remember, I have read one place of St. Thomas of Aquin, where he condemns marriage within any of the forbidden degrees,—for this reason, amongst others, that there is danger lest the friendship a man bears to such a woman should be immoderate; for if the conjugal affection be full and perfect betwixt them, as it ought to be, and that it be over and above surcharged with that of kindred too, there is no doubt but such an addition will carry the husband beyond the bounds of reason.[5]

Love to wives restrained by divinity.

Those sciences that regulate the manners of men, divinity and philosophy, will have a say in everything. There is no action so private that can escape their inspection and jurisdiction. They are best skilled who themselves can regulate and control their liberty; and not be like women who are ready enough to expose their persons for an amorous embrace, though they are too shy, forsooth, to do so to the physician, however great the need. Let me, therefore, in behalf of these sciences, teach those husbands, if such there be, who are too sensual, this lesson—that the very pleasures they enjoy in their converse with their wives are reproachable, if immoderate; and that a licentious and riotous abuse of them is a fault, as much as an illicit embrace. Those immodest tricks and postures that the first ardour suggests to us in this affair are not only indecently but prejudicially practised upon our wives. Let them at least learn impudence from another hand; they are always apt enough for our business, and I, for my part, always went the plain way to work.

Divinity and philosophy dictate in every thing.

Marriage is a solemn and religious connection, and therefore the pleasure we extract thence should be sober and serious, and mixed with a certain degree of gravity; it should be a kind of discreet and conscientious pleasure. And the chief end of it being generation, some make a question whether, when men have not that object in view, as when their wives are superannuated or already with child, it be lawful to embrace them. 'Tis homicide, according to Plato;[6] and certain nations (the Mahometan amongst others) abominate all conjunction with women with child, and so do others with women in their courses. Zenobia would never admit her husband for more than one encounter, after which she left him to his own swing for the whole time of her conception, and not till after that would again receive

[1] It is likely that Montaigne means Henry III. of France. The Cardinal d'Ossat, writing to Louisa, his queen dowager, told her, in his frank manner, that he had lived as much or more like a monk than a monarch. (Letter xxiii.) —And Sextus Quintus, speaking of that prince one day to the Cardinal de Joyeuse, protector of the affairs of France, said to him pleasantly, "There is nothing that your king hath not done, and does not do still, to be a monk, nor any thing that I have not done not to be a monk." See the note by Amelot de la Houssaye upon the words of the Cardinal d'Ossat, just now mentioned, p. 74, tom. i. of the Cardinal d'Ossat's Letters, Paris, 1698.

[2] Montaigne would here give us to understand, upon the authority of Diodorus of Sicily, that Pausanias's mother gave the first hint of the punishment that was to be inflicted on her son. "Pausanias (says this historian) perceiving that the Ephori and some other Lacedæmonians aimed at apprehending him, got the start of them, and went and took sanctuary in Minerva's temple; and the Lacedæmonians being doubtful whether they ought to take him thence, in violation of the franchise there, it is said that his own mother came herself to the temple, but spoke nothing, nor did any thing, more than lay a piece of brick, which she brought with her, on the threshold of the temple, which, when she had done, she returned home. The Lacedæmonians, taking the hint from the mother, caused the gate of the temple to be walled up, and by this means starved Pausanias, so that he died with hunger, &c." The name of Pausanias's mother was Alcithea, as we are informed by Thucydides's scholiast, who only says that it was reported that when they set about walling up the gates of the chapel in which Pausanias had taken refuge, his mother Alcithea laid the first stone.

[3] Opinions differ as to the truth of this matter. Livy thinks he has good authority for rejecting it, because it does not appear in history that Posthumius was branded with it, as Titus Manlius was, about 100 years after his time; for Manlius having put his son to death for the like cause, obtained the odious name of Imperiosus, and since that time Manliana Imperia has been used as a term to signify orders that are too severe. "Manliana Imperia," says Livy, "were not only horrible for the time present, but of a bad example to posterity." And this historian makes no doubt but such commands would have been actually styled Posthumiana Imperia, if Posthumius had been the first who set so barbarous an example. (T. Livius, iv. 29, and viii. 7.)—But, however, Montaigne has Valerius Maximus on his side, who says expressly that Posthumius caused his son to be put to death, ii. 7*b* ; and Diodorus of Sicily, xii. 19.

him. A noble and worthy example of conjugal continency.[1] It was doubtless from some lascivious poet, and one that himself was in great distress for a little of this sport, that Plato borrowed this story:[2] that Jupiter was one day so hot upon his wife that, not having so much patience as till she could get to the couch, he threw her upon the floor, where the vehemence of pleasure made him forget the great and important resolutions he had but newly taken with the rest of the gods in his celestial council, and to boast that he had had as good a bout as when he got her maidenhead unknown to their parents.

Wives of the kings of Persia, how received at their festivals.

The Kings of Persia were wont to invite their wives to the beginning of their festivals; but when the wine began to work in good earnest, and that they were to give the reins to pleasure, they sent them back to their private apartment, that they might not participate of their immoderate lust, sending for other women in their stead, with whom they were not obliged to so great a decorum and respect. All pleasures, and all sorts of gratifications, are not properly and fitly conferred upon all sorts of persons. Epaminondas had imprisoned a young man for certain debauches; Pelopidas requested he might be set at liberty, which Epaminondas denied to him, but granted it at the first word to a wench of his, who made the same intercession; saying, "That it was a gratification due to such a one as she, but not to a captain."[3] Sophocles being joint prætor with Pericles, seeing a fine boy pass by, "O! what a handsome boy is that," said he. "It would be well enough for any other than a prætor," answered Pericles, "who ought not only to have his hands, but his eyes chaste."[4] Ælius Verus, the Emperor, answered his wife, who reproached him for his amours with other women, that he did it upon a conscientious account, inasmuch as marriage was a state of honour and dignity, not of wanton and lascivious desire.[5] And our ecclesiastical history preserves the memory of that woman in great veneration who parted from her husband because she would not comply with his indecent and inordinate desire. In fine, there is no so just and lawful pleasure wherein intemperance and excess is not to be condemned.

Conjugal love ought to be accompanied with respect.

But, in truth, is not man a most miserable creature the while? It is scarce, by his natural condition, in his power to taste one pleasure pure and entire; and yet he must be contriving doctrines and precepts to curtail that little he has. He is not yet wretched enough, unless by art and study he augments his own misery.

Man a miserable creature.

Fortunæ miseras auximus arte vias.[6]

"We with misfortune 'gainst ourselves take part,
And our own miseries increase by art."

Human wisdom makes as ill use of her talent, when she exercises it in lessening the number and sweetness of those pleasures that are naturally our due, as she employs it favourably and well in artificially disguising and tricking out the ills of life, to alleviate the sense of them. Had I ruled the roast, I should have taken another and more natural, course, which, to say the truth, is both convenient and sacred, and should, peradventure, have been able to have limited it, too; notwithstanding that both our spiritual and corporal physicians, as by compact betwixt themselves, can find no other way to cure, nor other remedy for the infirmities of the body and the soul, than what is oft-times worse than the disease, by tormenting us more, and by adding to our misery and pain. To this end watchings, fastings, hair-shirts, remote and solitary banishments, perpetual imprisonments, whips, and other afflictions, have been introduced amongst men: but so that they should carry a sting with them, and be real afflictions indeed; and not fall out so as it once did to one Gallio, who having been sent an exile to the Isle of Lesbos, news was not long after brought to Rome that he there lived as merry as the day was long; and that what had been enjoined him for a penance turned to his greatest pleasure and satisfaction. Whereupon the Senate thought fit to recal him home to his wife and family, and confine him to his own house, to accommodate their punishment to his feeling and apprehension.[7] For to him whom fasting would make more healthful and more sprightly, and to him to whose palate fish was more acceptable than flesh, these would be no proper nor salutary recipe; no more than in the other sort of physic, where the drugs have no effect upon him who swallows them with appetite and pleasure. The bitterness of the potion, and the abhorrence of the patient, are necessary circumstances to the operation. The nature that would eat rhubarb like buttered turnips, would frustrate the use and virtue of it; it must be something to trouble and disturb the stomach that must purge and cure it. And here the common rule, that things are cured by their contraries, fails; for in this, one ill is cured by another.

This notion somewhat resembles the ancient one, of thinking to gratify the gods and nature by massacre and murder; an opinion once universally received in all religions, even in the time of our fathers. Amurath, at the taking of the Isthmus, immolated six hundred young Greeks to his father's soul, as a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the deceased. And in the new countries discovered in this age of ours, which are pure, and virgins yet, in comparison of ours, this practice is in some measure every where received. All their idols reek with human blood, not without various examples of horrid cruelty. Some they burn alive, and half-broiled take them off the coals to tear out their hearts and entrails; others, even women, they flay alive, and with their bloody skins clothe and disguise others. Neither are we without great examples of constancy and resolution in this affair. The poor souls that are to be sacrificed, old men, women, and children, go about some days before to beg alms for the offering of their sacrifice; and present themselves, singing and dancing about with the spectators, to the slaughter.

The sacrifice of human flesh a practice formerly in almost all religions.

How practised in the new world.

Wonderful firmness of those who are sacrificed there.

The ambassadors of the king of Mexico, setting forth to Fernando Cortez the power and greatness of their master, after having told him that he had thirty vassals, of whom each was able to raise an hundred thousand fighting men, and that he kept his court in the fairest and best fortified city under the sun, added at last, that he yearly offered to the gods fifty thousand men. Indeed, they affirmed that he maintained a continual war with some potent neighbouring nations, not only to keep the young men in exercise, but principally to have wherewithal to furnish his sacrifices with his prisoners of war. At a certain town in another place, for the welcome of the said Cortez, they sacrificed fifty men at once. I will tell you this one tale more, and I have done. Some of these people being beaten by him, sent to acknowledge him, and to treat with him of a peace, whose messengers carried him three sorts of presents, which they presented in these terms:—"Behold, lord, here are five slaves; if thou art a furious god, that feedest upon flesh and blood, eat these, and we will bring thee more; if thou art an affable god, behold here incense and feathers; if thou art a man, take these fowls and these fruits that we have brought thee."

CHAPTER XXX.

OF CANNIBALS.

When Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, invaded Italy, having viewed and considered the order of the army the Romans sent out to meet him,—"I know not," said he, "what kind of barbarians (for so the Greeks called all other nations) these may be; but the disposition of this army that I see has nothing of the barbarian in it."[1] As much said the Greeks of that which Flaminius brought into their country;[2] and Philip, beholding, from an eminence, the order and disposition of the Roman camp, led into his kingdom by Publius Sulpitius Galba, spoke to the same effect.[3] By which it appears how cautious men ought to be of taking things upon trust from vulgar opinion, and that we are to judge by the eye of reason, and not from common report. I have long had a man in my house that lived ten or twelve years in the new world discovered in these latter days, and in that part of it where Villegaignon landed, which he called Antartick France.[4] This discovery of so vast a country seems to be of very great consideration; and we are not sure that hereafter there may not be another found, so many wiser men than we having been deceived in this. I am afraid our eyes are bigger than our bellies, and that we have more curiosity than capacity; for we grasp at all, but catch nothing but air.

Reflections on the discovery of the new world.

Plato[5] brings in Solon, relating that he had heard from the Priests of Sais, in Egypt, that of old, and before the deluge, there was a great island, called Atlantis, situate directly at the mouth of the Strait of Gibraltar, which contained more ground than both Africa and Asia put together; that the kings of that country, who not only possessed that isle, but extended their dominion so far into the continent that they had a country as large as Africa to Egypt, and as long as Europe to Tuscany, had attempted to encroach even upon Asia, and to subjugate all the nations that border upon the Mediterranean Sea, as far as the Great Gulph;[6] and to that effect had over-run all Spain, the Gauls, and Italy, as far as Greece, where the Athenians stopped the torrent of their arms: but some time after both the Athenians, they, and their island, were swallowed by the flood. It is very likely that this violent eruption and inundation of water made strange alterations in the habitable parts of the earth; as 'tis said, for instance, that the sea then cut off Sicily from Italy;

"'Tis said those places by the o'erbearing flood,
Too great and violent to be withstood,

Which were before one solid continent."

Cyprus from Syria; the isle of Negropont from the Continent of Bœotia; and elsewhere, united lands that were separate before, by filling up the channel betwixt them with sand and mud;

Sterilesque diu palus, aptaque remis,
Vicinas urbes alit, et grave sentit aratrum.[2]

"Where once bare remigable marshes, now
Feed neighb'ring cities and admit the plough."

But there is no great appearance that this isle was this new world so lately discovered; for that almost touched upon Spain,[3] and it were an incredible effect of an inundation to have carried so prodigious a mass above twelve hundred leagues: besides that our modern navigators have already almost discovered it to be no island, but firm land and continent, with the East Indies on the one side, and the land under the two poles on the other; or, if it be separated from them, 'tis by so narrow a strait that it never more deserves the name of an island for that. It should seem that, in this great body, there are two sorts of motions, the one natural, and the other febrifick, as there are in ours. When I consider the impression that my own river, Dordoigne, has made, in my time, on the right bank of its descent, and that, in twenty years, it has gained so much, and undermined the foundation of so many houses, I perceive it to be an extraordinary agitation; for, had it always gone on at this rate, or were hereafter to do it, the aspect of the world would be totally changed. But rivers alter in this respect, sometimes spreading out against the one side, and sometimes against the other, and sometimes quietly keeping the channel. I do not speak of sudden inundations, the causes of which every body understands. In Medoc, by the sea-shore, the Sieur d'Arsac, my brother, had an estate, he had there, buried under the sands which the sea vomits before it; the tops of some houses are yet to be seen, but his good land is converted into pitiful barren pasturage. The inhabitants of the place affirm that, of late years, the sea has driven so vehemently upon them that they have lost four leagues of land. These sands are her harbingers: and we now see great heaps of moving sand that march half a league before her, and take possession of the land.

The other testimony from antiquity, to which some would apply this discovery of the new world, is in Aristotle; at least, if that little book of unheard-of miracles be his. He there tells us that certain Carthaginians, having crossed the Atlantic sea, without the Straits of Gibraltar, and sailed a very long time, discovered, at last, a great and fruitful island, all covered over with wood, and watered with several broad and deep rivers, far remote from any continent, and that they, and others, after them, allured by the pleasantness and fertility of the soil, went thither, with their wives and children, and began to plant a colony. But the senate of Carthage, perceiving their people, by little and little, to grow thin, issued out an express prohibition, that no one, upon pain of death, should transport themselves thither; and also drove out the new inhabitants, fearing, 'tis said, lest, in process of time, they should so multiply as to supplant themselves and ruin their state. But this relation of Aristotle's does no more agree with our new found lands than the other. This man that I have is a plain ignorant fellow, and, therefore, the more likely to tell truth: for though your better-bred sort of men are much more curious in their observation, and discover a great deal more, they gloss upon it, and, to give the greater weight to what they deliver, and allure your belief, they cannot forbear a little to alter the story. They never represent things to you simply as they are, but rather as they appeared to them, or as they would have them appear to you, and, to gain the reputation of men of judgment, and the better to induce your faith, are willing to help out the business with something more than is really true, of their own invention. Now, in this case, we should either have a man of irreproachable veracity, or so simple that he has not wherewithal to contrive and to give a colour of truth to false relations, and that can have no ends in forging an untruth. Such a one is mine; and, besides the little suspicion the man lies under, he has divers times brought me several seamen and merchants that, at the same time, went the same voyage. I shall, therefore, content myself with his information, without enquiring what the cosmographers say to the business. We need topographers to trace out to us the particular places where they have been; but for having had this advantage over us, to have seen the Holy Land, they would have the privilege, forsooth, to tell us stories of all the other parts of the world besides. I would have every one write what he knows, and as much as he knows, but no more; and that not in this only, but in all other subjects: for such a person may have some particular knowledge and experience of the nature of

The qualities requisite in an historian.

Authors should write no more on a subject than what they know of it.

such a river, or such a fountain, that as to other things knows no more than what every body does, and yet, to keep a clutter with this little pittance of his, will undertake to write the whole body of physics: a vice whence many great inconveniences derive their original.

Barbarism, what it is taken for.

Now, to return to my subject, I find that there is nothing barbarous and savage in this nation, by any thing that I can gather, excepting that every one gives the title of barbarism to every thing that is not in use in his own country: as, indeed, we have no other level of truth and reason than the example and idea of the opinions and customs of the place wherein we live. There is always the perfect religion, there the perfect government, there the perfect every thing. This nation are savages, in the same way that we say fruits are wild, which nature produces of herself, and by her own ordinary progress; whereas, in truth, we ought rather to call those wild whose natures we have changed by our artifice, and diverted from the common order. In those, the genuine, most useful, and natural virtues and properties, are vigorous and active, which we have degenerated in these, by accommodating them to the pleasure of our own corrupted palate. And yet, for all this, our taste confesses a flavour and delicacy, excellent even to emulation of the best of ours, in several fruits those countries abound with, without art or culture; nor is it reasonable that art should gain the point over our great and powerful mother, Nature. We have so oppressed her beauty and the richness of her works, by our inventions, that we have almost smothered her; but, where she shines in her own purity and proper lustre, she marvellously baffles and disgraces all our vain and frivolous attempts.

Et veniunt hederæ sponte sua melius,
Surgit et in solis formosior arbutus antri;
* * * * * * * * * *
Et volucres nullâ dulcius arte canunt.[1]

"Best thrives the ivy when no culture spoils,
The strawb'ry most delights in shaded soils;
Birds, in wild notes, their throats harmonious stretch
With greater art than art itself can teach."

Our utmost endeavours cannot arrive at so much as to imitate the nest of the least of birds, its contexture, its elegance, its convenience; not so much as the web of a contemptible spider. "All things," says Plato, "are produced either by nature, or by fortune, or by art; the greatest and most beautiful by the one, or the other of the former, the least and the most imperfect by the last."[2]

In what sense the American savages are barbarians.

These nations then seem to me to be so far barbarous, as having received but very little form and fashion from art and human invention, and being consequently not much remote from their original simplicity. The laws of nature govern them still, not as yet much vitiated with any mixture of ours; nay, in such purity that I am sometimes troubled we were no sooner acquainted with these people, and that they were not discovered in those better times, when there were men much more able to judge of them than we are. I am sorry that Lycurgus and Plato had no knowledge of them; for, to my apprehension, what we now see in those natives does not only surpass all the images with which the poets have adorned the golden age, and all their inventions in feigning a happy state of man, but moreover the fancy, and even the wish and desire of philosophy itself. So native and so pure a simplicity as we by experience see to be in them, could never enter into their imagination, nor could they ever believe that human society could have been maintained with so little artifice. Should I tell Plato that it is a nation wherein there is no manner of traffic, no knowledge of letters, no science of numbers, no name of magistrate, nor political superiority; no use of service, riches or poverty; no contracts, no successions, no dividends, no properties, no employments, but those of leisure; no respect of kindred, but in common; no clothing, no agriculture, no metal, no use of corn or wine; and where so much as the very words that signify lying, treachery, dissimulation, avarice, envy, detraction, and pardon, were never heard of—how much would he find his imaginary republic short of this perfection? Viri a diis recentes.[3] "Fresh from the hands of the gods."

The excellency of their polity.

Hos natura modos primùm dedit.[4]

"These were the manners first by nature taught."

As to the rest, they live in a country beautiful and pleasant, and so temperate, as my intelligence informs me, that 'tis very rare to hear of a sick person there; and they moreover assure me that they never saw any of the natives either paralytic, blear-eyed, toothless, or crooked with age. The situation of their country is along the sea-shore, and enclosed on the side towards the land with great and high mountains, having about an hundred leagues in breadth between. They have great store of fish and flesh meat that have no resemblance to ours, which they eat without any other cookery than plain boiling, roasting, or broiling. The first that carried a horse thither, though in several other voyages he had contracted an acquaintance and familiarity with them, put them into so terrible a fright at his appearance so mounted, that they killed him with their arrows before they could come to discover who he was. are very long, and of capacity to hold two or three hundred people, are made of the barks of tall trees, reared with one end upon the ground, and leaning against and supporting one another at the top, like some of our barns, of which the covering hangs down to the very ground, and serves for the side walls. They have wood so hard that they cleave it into swords, and make grills of it to broil their meat. Their beds are of cotton, hung swinging from the roof, like our seamen's hammocks; for every one one, the wives lying apart from their husbands. They rise with the sun, and so soon as they are up eat for all day; for they have no more meals but that. They do not drink then (as Suidas reports of some other people of the east, that never drink at their meals), but drink very often in the day, and sometimes a great deal. Their liquor is made of a certain root, and is as red as our claret; and this they never drink but luke-warm. It will keep only two or three days, has a sharp taste, is nothing heady, but very wholesome to the stomach, laxative for strangers, and a very pleasant beverage to such as are used to it. Instead of bread they make use of a certain white matter, like coriander comfits: I have tasted of it, the taste is sweet, but somewhat insipid. The whole day is spent in dancing.

Their pastimes.

The young men go a hunting after wild beasts with bows and arrows, and one part of their women are employed in preparing their drink the while, which is their chief employment. Some of their old men in the morning, before they fall to eating, preach to the whole family, walking to and fro from the one end of the house to the other, several times repeating the same sentence, till they have finished their round (for their houses are at least a hundred yards long); enjoining valour towards their enemies and love towards their wives are the two heads of his discourse, never failing, as a burden, to put them in mind that 'tis to their wives they are obliged for providing them their drink warm and relishing. The fashion of their beds, ropes, swords, and the wooden bracelets, which they tie about their wrists when they go to fight, and of their great canes, bored hollow at one end, by the sound of which they keep the cadence of their dances, is to be seen in several places, and amongst others at my house. They shave all over, and much more closely than we, without any other razor than one of wood or of stone.

They believe the immortality of the soul.

They believe the immortality of the soul, and that those who have merited well of the gods are lodged in that part of heaven where the sun rises, and the accursed in the west.

Their priests and prophets, their morality, and how they are treated, if their prophecies prove false.

They have a kind of priests and prophets that rarely present themselves to the people, having their abode in the mountains. At their arrival there is a great feast and solemn assembly of many villages made, that is, all the neighbouring families, for every house, as I have described it, makes a village, and are about a French league distant from one another. This prophet declaims to them in public, exhorting them to virtue and their duty: but all their ethics consist in these two articles—resolution in war and affection to their wives. He also prophesies to them events to come, and the issues they are to expect from their enterprizes, prompts them to, or diverts them from, war. But let him look to't; for if he fail in his divination, and anything happen otherwise than he has foretold, he is cut into a thousand pieces, if he be caught and condemned for a false prophet; and for that reason, if any of them finds himself mistaken, he is no more to be heard of. Divination is a gift of God, and therefore to abuse it ought to be a punishable imposture. Amongst the Scythians, when their diviners failed in the promised effect, they were laid, bound hand and foot, upon carts laden with firewood, and drawn with oxen, on which they were burnt to death.[1] Such as only meddle with things subject to the conduct of human capacity are excusable in doing the best they can: but those other sort of people that come to delude us with assurances of an extraordinary faculty beyond our understanding, ought they not to be punished for the temerity of their imposture, when they do not make good the effect of their promise?

False prophets burnt by the Scythians.

They have wars with the nations that live farther within the main land, beyond their mountains, to which they go naked, and without other arms than their bows and wooden swords, pointed at one end like the head of a javelin. The obstinacy of their battles is wonderful: they never end without great effusion of blood; for as to running away, or fear, they know not what it is. Every one for a trophy brings home the head of an enemy he has killed, which he fixes over the door of his house. After having a long time treated their prisoners very well, and given them all the luxuries they can think of, he to whom the prisoner belongs invites a great assembly of his kindred and friends, who being come, he ties a rope to one of the arms of the prisoner, of which at a distance, out of his reach, he holds the one end himself, and gives to the friend he loves best the other arm, to hold after the same manner; which being done, they two, in the presence of all the assembly, dispatch him with their swords. After that they roast him, eat him amongst them, and send some chops to their absent friends; which nevertheless they do not do, as some think, for nourishment, as the Scythians anciently did, but as a representation of an extreme revenge, as will immediately appear. Having observed the Portuguese, who were in league with their enemies, to inflict another sort of death upon any of them they took prisoners, which was to set them up to the girdle in the earth, to shoot at the remaining part till it was stuck full of arrows, and then to hang them; they who thought those people of the other world (as men who had sown the knowledge of a great many vices amongst their neighbours, and were much greater masters in all kind of malignity than they,) did not exercise this sort of revenge without reason, and that it must needs be more painful than theirs, began to leave their old way and to follow this. I am not sorry that we should here take notice of the barbarous horror of so cruel an act, but that, seeing so clearly into their faults, we should be so blind to our own. I conceive there is more barbarity in eating a man alive than when he is dead; in tearing a body that is yet perfectly sentient limb from limb, by racks and torments, in roasting it by degrees, causing it to be bit and worried by dogs and swine (as we have not only read, but lately seen, not amongst inveterate and mortal enemies, but amongst neighbours and fellow-citizens, and, what is worse, under colour of piety and religion), than to roast and eat him after he is dead.

They eat their prisoners, and why.

[1] Herod. iv. 69.

Chrysippus[1] and Zeno, chiefs of the Stoic sect, were of opinion that there was no harm in making use of our dead carcases, in what kind soever, for our necessity, and in feeding upon them too; as our ancestors, who, being besieged by Cæsar in the city of Alexia, resolved to sustain the famine of the siege with the bodies of their old men, women, and other persons, who were incapable of bearing arms.

> Vascones (fama est) alimentis talibus usi,

And the physicians make no scruple of employing it to all sorts of use, either to apply it outwardly, or to give it inwardly for the health of the patient. But there never was any opinion so irregular as to excuse treachery, disloyalty, tyranny and cruelty, which are our familiar vices. We may, then, well call these people barbarous, in respect to the rules of reason; but not in respect to ourselves, who, in all sorts of barbarity, exceed them. Their wars are throughout noble and generous, and carry as much excuse and fair pretence as this human malady is capable of; having with them no other foundation than the sole jealousy of valour. Their disputes are not for the conquests of new lands, those they already possess being so fruitful by nature as to supply them, without labour or concern, with all things necessary, in such abundance that they have no need to enlarge their borders. And they are moreover happy in this, that they only covet so much as their natural necessities require: all beyond that is superfluous to them. Men of the same age generally call one another brothers, those who are younger, sons and daughters, and the old men are fathers to all. These leave to their heirs in common this full possession of goods, without any manner of division, or other title than what nature bestows upon her creatures in bringing them into the world. If their neighbours pass the mountains, and come to attack them, and obtain a victory, all the victors gain by it is glory only, and the advantage of having proved themselves the better in valour and virtue: for they never meddle with the goods of the conquered, but presently return into their own country, where they have no want of any necessary; nor of this greatest of all goods, to know how to enjoy their condition happily, and to be content. And these in turn do the same. They demand of their prisoners no other ransom than acknowledgment that they are overcome. But there is not one found in an age that will not rather choose to die than make such a concession; or either by word or look recede from the grandeur of an invincible courage. There is not a man amongst them who had not rather be killed and eaten, than so much as to open his mouth to entreat he may not. They use them with all liberality and freedom, to the end their lives may be so much the dearer to them; but frequently entertain them withal with menaces of their approaching death, of the torments they are to suffer, of the preparations that are making in order to it, of the mangling their limbs, and of the feast that is to be made, where their carcase is to be the only dish. All which they do to no other end but only to extort some gentle or submissive word from them, or to frighten them so as to make them run away: so that they may obtain this advantage, that they had terrified them, and that their constancy was shaken. And indeed, if rightly taken, it is in this point only that a true victory consists.

The savages of America make war after a very noble manner.

Their moderation.

Their cordiality to one another.

All that they get is glory by any victory over their neighbours.

The Hungarians, a very warlike people, never pursued their point farther than to reduce the enemy to their discretion; for, having forced this confession from them, they let them go without injury or ransom, excepting, at the most, to make them engage their word never to bear arms against them again. We get several advantages over our enemies that are borrowed, and not truly our own: 'tis the quality of a porter, and no effect of valour, to have stronger arms and legs; 'tis a dead and spiritless quality to draw up well; 'tis a stroke of fortune to make our enemy stumble, or to dazzle him with the light of the sun; 'tis a trick of science and art, which may happen in any cowardly blockhead, to be a good fencer. The estimation and value of a man consist in the heart and in the will: there his true honour lives. Valour is stability, not of legs and arms, but of the courage and the soul; it does not lie in the goodness of our horse, or of our arms, but in ourselves. He that falls, firm in his courage,—Si succiderit, de genu pugnat;[1] "If his legs fail him, fights upon his knees;" he who, despite the danger of death near at hand, abates nothing of his assurance; who, dying, does yet dart at his enemy a fierce and disdainful look, is overcome, not by us, but by fortune: he is killed, not conquered; the most valiant[2] are sometimes the most unfortunate. There are some defeats more triumphant than victories. Those four sister-victories, the fairest the sun ever beheld, of Salamis, Platea, Mycale, and Sicily, never opposed all their united glories to the single glory of the discomfiture of King Leonidas and his heroes at the Pass of Thermopylæ. Who ever ran with a more glorious desire and greater ambition to the winning, than the Captain Ischolas to the certain loss of a battle? Who ever set about with more ingenuity and eagerness to secure his safety than he did to assure his ruin? He was ordered to defend a certain pass of Peloponnesus against the Arcadians, which, from the nature of the place and the inequality of forces, finding it utterly impossible for him to do, and seeing clearly that all who presented themselves to the enemy must certainly be left upon the place; and, on the other hand, reputing it unworthy of his own virtue and magnanimity, and of the Lacedæmonian name, to fail in his duty, he chose a mean betwixt these two extremes, after this manner: the youngest and most active of his men he preserved for the service and defence of their country, and therefore sent them back; and with the rest, whose loss would be of less consideration, he resolved to make good the pass, and, with the death of them, to make the enemy buy their entry as dear as possibly he could." And so it fell out; for, being presently encompassed on all sides by the Arcadians, after having made a great slaughter of the enemy, he and his men were all cut in pieces.[3] Is there any trophy dedicated to conquerors which is not much more due to those who were thus overcome? The part that true conquering has to play lies in the encounter, not in the coming off; the honour of valour consists in fighting, not in subduing.

What constitutes the true merit of a man, and his superiority over his fellow-creatures.

Defeats that are more meritorious than the greatest victories.

But to return to my story. These prisoners are so far from discovering the least weakness for all the terrors can be represented to them, that, on the contrary, during the two or three months that they are kept, they always appear with a cheerful countenance; importune their masters to make haste to bring them to the test; defy, rail at them, and reproach them with cowardice, and the number of battles they have lost against those of their country. I have a song made by one of these prisoners, wherein he bids them come all and dine upon him, and welcome, for they shall withal eat their own fathers and grandfathers, whose flesh has served to feed and nourish him. "These muscles," says he, "this flesh, and these veins, are your own. Poor fools that you are, you little think that the substance of your ancesters' limbs is here yet: taste it well, and you will find in it the relish of your own flesh." In which song there is to be observed an invention that smacks nothing of the barbarian. Those that paint these people dying after this manner, represent the prisoner spitting in the face of his executioners, and making at them a wry mouth. And 'tis most certain that, to the very last gasp, they never cease to brave and defy them both in word and gesture. In plain truth, these men are very savage in comparison of us, for, of necessity, they must either be absolutely so, or else we are savages; for there is a vast difference betwixt their manners and ours.

The constancy of these savages that are taken prisoners.

The martial song of one of the savage prisoners.

The men there have several wives, and so much the greater number by how much they have the greater reputation for valour, and it is one very remarkable virtue their women have, that the same endeavours our wives jealously use to hinder and divert us from the friendship and familiarity of other women, these employ to acquire it for their husbands; being, above all things, solicitous of their husbands' honour, 'tis their chiefest care to procure for him the most companions in his affections they can, forasmuch as it is a testimony of their husbands' valour. Ours will cry out that 'tis monstrous: it is not so; 'tis a truly matrimonial virtue, though of the highest form. In the Bible, Sarah, Leah, and Rachel, and the wives of Jacob, gave the most beautiful of their handmaids to their husbands; Livia promoted the appetites of Augustus to her own prejudice; and Stratonice, the wife of King Dejotarus, not only gave up a fair young maid that served her, to her husband's embraces, but,

moreover, carefully brought up the children he had by her, and assisted them in the succession to their father's crown.[1]

And, that it may not be supposed that all this is done by a simple and servile observance of their common practice, or by any authoritative impression of their ancient custom, without judgment or reason, or, from having a soul so stupid that it cannot contrive what else to do, I must here give you some touches of their sufficiency in point of understanding. Besides what I repeated to you before, which was one of their songs of war, I have another, a love-song, that begins thus: "Stay, adder, stay, that, by thy pattern, my sister may draw the fashion and work of a rich belt I would present to my beloved; so may thy beauty and the excellent order of thy scales be for ever preferred before all other serpents." The first couplet is the burthen of the song. Now I have conversed enough with poetry to judge thus much: that not only there is nothing barbarous in this composition, but, moreover, that it is perfectly anacreontic. Indeed, their language is soft, of a pleasing accent, and something bordering upon the Greek terminations. Three of these people, not foreseeing how dear their knowledge of the corruptions of this part of the world will, one day, cost their happiness and repose, and that the effect of this commerce will be their ruin; which, I suppose, is in a very fair way (miserable men, to suffer themselves to be deluded with desire of novelty, and to have left the serenity of their own heaven to come so far to gaze at ours!), went to Rouen, at the time that the late King Charles the Ninth was there. The king himself talked to them a good while, and they were made to see our fashions, our pomp, and the form of a great city; after which some one asked their opinion, and would know of them, what of all the things they had seen they found most to be admired? To which they made answer, three things, of which I have forgot the third, and am vexed at it, but two I yet remember. They said that, in the first place, they thought it very strange that so many tall men wearing beards, strong and well armed, who were about the king ('tis like, they meant the Swiss of the guard), should submit to obey a child, and that they did not rather choose out one amongst themselves to command: secondly, (they have a way of speaking in their language, to call men the half of one another,) that they had observed that there were, amongst us, men full and crammed with all manner of luxuries, whilst, in the mean time, their halves were begging at their doors, lean and half-starved with hunger and poverty; and thought it strange that these necessitous halves were able to suffer so great an inequality and injustice, and that they did not take the others by the throats, or set fire to their houses. I talked to one of them a long while, but I had an interpreter, who followed so ill, and whose stupidity kept him from understanding my questions so almost entirely that I could get nothing out of him of any moment. Asking him what advantage he reaped from the superiority he had amongst his own people—for he was a captain, and our mariners called him king,—he told me, to march at the head of them to war; and demanding of him, farther, how many men he had to follow him? he shewed me a space of ground, to signify as many as could march in such a compass; which might be four or five thousand men; and, putting the question to him, whether or no his authority expired with the war? he told me this remained; that when he went to visit the villages in his dependancy, they cleared him paths through the thick of their woods, through which he might pass at his ease. All this does not sound very ill, but then, forsooth, they wear no breeches.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THAT A MAN IS SOBERLY TO JUDGE OF DIVINE ORDINANCES.

THINGS unknown are the principal and true field of imposture, forasmuch as, in the first place, their very strangeness lends them credit; and, moreover, by not being subjected to our ordinary reason, they deprive us of the means to question and dispute them. On which account, says Plato,[2] it is much more easy to satisfy the hearers, when speaking of the nature of the gods, than of the nature of men, because the ignorance of the auditory affords a fair and large career, and all manner of liberty in the handling of recondite things; and thence it comes to pass that nothing is so firmly believed as what we least know: nor any people so confident as those who entertain us with fables, such as your alchymists, judicial astrologers, fortune-tellers, physicians, and id genus omne. To whom I could, willingly, if I durst, join a set of people that take upon them to interpret and controul the designs of God himself, making a business of finding out the cause of every accident, and of prying into the secrets of the divine will, there to discover the incomprehensible motives of his works. And although the variety and the continual discordance of events throw them from corner to corner, and toss them from east to west, yet do they still persist in their vain inquisition, and, with the same pencil, paint black and white. In a nation of the Indies, there is this commendable custom, that when any thing befalls them amiss in any encounter or battle, they publicly ask pardon of the sun, who is their God, as having committed an unjust action, always imputing their good or evil fortune to the divine justice, and to that submitting their own judgment and reason. 'Tis enough for a Christian to believe that all things come from God, to receive them with acknowledgment of his divine and inscrutable wisdom, and thankfully to accept and receive them with what face soever they may present themselves. But I do not approve of what I see in use, that is, to seek to conform and support our religion by the prosperity of our enterprises. Our belief has other foundation enough without going about to authorise it by events; for the people being accustomed to such arguments as these, so plausible, and so fitted to their own taste, it is to be feared lest, when they fail of success, they should also stagger in their faith. As in the war, wherein we are now engaged, upon the account of religion, those who had the better in the affair of Rochelabeille,[1] making great brags of that success, as an infallible approbation of their cause, when they came afterwards to excuse their misfortunes of Jarnac and Moncontour,[2] 'twas by saying they were fatherly scourges and corrections; if they have not a people wholly at their mercy, they make it manifestly enough to appear what it is to take two sorts of grist out of the same sack, and with the same mouth to blow hot and cold. It were better to possess the vulgar with the solid and real foundations of truth. 'Twas a brave naval battle that was gained a few months since, against the Turks, under the command of Don John of Austria;[3] but it has also pleased God, at other times, to let us see as great victories at our own expense. In fine, 'tis a hard matter to reduce divine things to our balance without losing a great deal of the weight. And he that would take upon him to give a reason why Arius and his Pope Leo, the principal heads of that heresy, should die at different times, of such similar and such strange deaths (for being withdrawn from the disputation by a disorder of the bowels, they both of them suddenly gave up the ghost upon the close-stool[4]), and would aggravate this divine vengeance by the circumstances of the place; might as well add the death of Heliogabalus, who was also slain in a house of office.[5] But what then? Irenæus was involved in the same fortune; God being pleased to shew us that the good have something else to hope for; and the wicked something else to fear, than the fortunes and misfortunes of this world: he manages and applies them according to his own secret will and pleasure, and deprives us of the means foolishly to make our own profit. And those people both abuse themselves and us who will pretend to dive into these mysteries by the strength of human reason. They never give one hit that they do not receive two for it; of which St. Augustin gives a very great proof upon his adversaries. 'Tis a conflict that is more decided by strength of memory than the force of reason. We are to content ourselves with the light it pleases the sun to communicate to us by his rays, and he who will lift up his eyes to take in a greater, let him not think it strange if, for the reward of his presumption, he there lose his sight. Quis hominum potest scire consilium Dei? Aut quis poterit cogitare, quid velit Dominus?[6] "Who amongst men can know the counsel of God? Or who can think what the will of the Lord is?"

No authority can be ascribed to our religion from events.

The good or bad success of men no proof either of their merit or demerit.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THAT WE ARE TO AVOID PLEASURES EVEN AT THE EXPENSE OF LIFE.

I HAVE, long ago, observed most of the opinions of the ancients to concur in this, that it is high time to die when there is more ill than good in living, and that to preserve life, to our own torment and inconvenience, is contrary to the very laws of nature, as these old lines instruct us:

Ἢ ζῆν ἀλύπως, ἢ θανεῖν εὐδαιμόνως.
Καλὸν θνήσκειν οἷς ὕβρι τὸ ζῆν φέρει.
Κρεῖσσον τὸ μὴ ζῆν ἐσὶν, ἢ ζῆν ἀθλίως.[7]

"Adieu! want, care, with mis'ry's various train, Death then is happy, when to live is pain."

But to push this contempt of death so far as to employ it to the removing our thoughts from the coveting of honours, riches, dignities, and other favours, and goods of fortune, as we call them, as if reason had not sufficient to do to persuade us to avoid them without adding this new charge I had never seen it either enjoined or practised, till this passage of Seneca fell into my hands; who, advising Lucilius, a man of great power and authority about the Emperor, to alter his voluptuous and magnificent way of living, and to retire himself from this worldly vanity and ambition, to some solitary, quiet, and philosophical life, and the other alleging some difficulties: "I am of opinion," says he,[8] "either that you leave that life or life itself; but I would advise thee to the gentler way, and to untie, rather than to break, the knot thou hast ill knit, provided that, if it be not otherwise to be untied, thou resolutely break it. There is no man so great a coward that had not rather once fall than be always falling." I should have found this counsel conformable enough to the stoical roughness; but it appears the more strange for being borrowed from Epicurus, who writes the same thing upon the like occasion to Idomeneus. And I think I have observed something like it, but with Christian moderation, amongst our own people. St. Hilary, Bishop of Poictiers, that famous enemy of the Arian heresy, being in Syria, had intelligence thither sent him that Abra, his only daughter, whom he left at home under the eye and tuition of her mother, was sought in marriage by the greatest nobleman of the country, as being a virgin virtuously brought up, fair, rich, and in the flower of her age. Whereupon he writ to her (as it appears upon record) that she should remove her affection from all the pleasures and advantages proposed unto her; for he had in his travels found out a much greater and more worthy fortune for her, a husband of much greater power and magnificence, that would present her with robes and jewels of inestimable value: wherein his design was to dispossess her of the appetite and use of worldly delights, to join her wholly to God. But the nearest and most certain way to this being, as he conceived, the death of his daughter, he never ceased, by vows, prayers, and orisons, to beg of the Almighty that he would please to call her out of this world, and to take her to himself; as accordingly it came to pass; for soon after his return she died, at which he expressed a singular joy. This seems to outdo the others, forasmuch as he applies himself to this means in the first instance, which they only take subsidiarily, and, besides, it was towards his only daughter. But I will not omit the latter end of this story, though it be from my purpose. St. Hilary's wife, having understood from him how the death of their daughter was brought about by his desire and design, and how much happier she was, to be removed out of this world than to have stayed in it, conceived so lively an apprehension of the eternal and heavenly beatitude that she begged of her husband with the extremest importunity to do as much for her; and God, at their joint request, shortly after calling her to him, it was a death embraced on both sides with singular content.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THAT FORTUNE[1] IS OFTENTIMES OBSERVED TO ACT BY THE RULE OF REASON.

THE inconstancy of the various motions of fortune may reasonably make us expect she should present us with all sorts of faces. Can there be a more express act of justice than this? The Duke of Valentinois, having resolved to poison Cardinal Adrian Corneto, with whom his father, Pope Alexander the Sixth, and himself, were to sup in the Vatican, sent before a bottle of poisoned wine, with strict order to the butler to keep it very safe. The Pope being come before his son, and calling for drink, the butler, supposing this wine had only been so strictly recommended to his care upon the account of its excellence, presented it immediately to the Pope, and the Duke himself, coming in presently after, and being confident that they had not meddled with his bottle, took also his cup; so that the father died immediately upon the spot, and the son, after having been long tormented with sickness, was reserved to another and a worse fortune.[2] Sometimes she seems to play upon us just in the nick of an affair. Monsieur d'Estrée, at that time standard-bearer to Monsieur de Vendosme, and Monsieur de Liques, lieutenant to the Duke of Ascot's troop, being both suitors to the Sieur de Founguesselles's sister,[3] though of different parties (as it oft falls out amongst frontier neighbours), the Sieur de Liques carried her; but on the same day he was married, and, which was worse, before he went to bed to his wife, the bridegroom having a mind to break a lance in honour of his new bride, went out to skirmish near St. Omers, where the Sieur d'Estrée proving the stronger, took him prisoner; and, the more to illustrate his victory, the lady herself was fain to request him of courtesy to deliver up his prisoner to her, as he accordingly did; the gentlemen of France never denying anything to the ladies. Does this not seem a master-stroke: Constantine, the son of Helen, founded the empire of Constantinople; and so many ages after, Constantine, the son of Helen, put an end to it.

[1] The word fortune, so often used by Montaigne, and sometimes in passages where he might have employed the word providence, was censured by the docteurs moines, who examined the Essays during the author's stay in Rome, in 1581. (See his Journey in Italy.) In countries subject to the Inquisition, at Rome especially, it was forbidden to say fatum or fata. An author having occasion to use the word, printed it facta, but in the errata put "for facta, read fata." And similar stratagems were more than once resorted to. Thus the Protestant Daniel Heinsius, sending forth in that city a work in which he spoke of Pope Urban VIII., called him in the text, Ecclesiæ Caput, but, in the errata, Ecclesiæ Romanæ Caput. It would seem that the censorship of books was not always exercised by persons of much ability. La Mothe le Vayer says, that Naudæus himself told him that in a work which he wished to print at Rome, and which contained these words, Virgo fata est, the Inquisitor noted in the margin, Propositio hæretica; nam non datur FATUM. The prohibition was so closely carried in force that Addison, in his Travels in Italy, tells us he was much amused at reading, at the head of an opera-bill, the following:—"PROTESTA. Le Voci, Fato, Deità, Destino, e simili, che per entro questo dramma troverai, son messe per ischerzo poetico, è non per sentimento vero, credendo sempre in tutto quello, che crede et comanda santa madre Chiesa." Montaigne justifies himself, in chap. lvi. of this work, for having used some of these prohibited words, verbis indisciplinata, as he calls them; it would seem, from the old editions, that he did not put forth this sort of apology till after his return from Rome.

Sometimes she is pleased to emulate our miracles. We are told that King Clovis besieging Angouleme, the walls fell down of themselves by divine favour. And Bouchet has it from some author, that King Robert, having sat down before a city, and being stolen away from the siege to keep the feast of Saint Aignan at Orleans; as he was in devotion at a certain point of the mass, the walls of the beleaguered city, without any effort of the besiegers, fell down in ruins. But she did quite contrary in our Milan war; for Captain Rense laying siege to the city of Arona,[1] and having carried a mine under a great parcel of the wall, the mine being sprung, the wall was lifted from its base, but dropped down again nevertheless whole and entire, and so exactly upon its foundation that the besieged suffered no inconvenience by that attempt.

Fortune sometimes turns doctor.

Sometimes she plays the doctor. Jason of Phereus being given over by the physicians, by reason of a desperate imposthume in his breast, having a mind to rid himself of his pain, by death at least, in a battle threw himself desperately into the thickest of the enemy, where he was so fortunately wounded quite through the body that the imposthume broke, and he was perfectly cured.[2] Did she not also excel the painter Protogenes in his art? who having finished the picture of a dog, quite tired and out of breath, in all the other parts excellently well to his own liking, but not being able to express as he would the slaver and foam that should come out of his mouth, vexed and angry at his work, he took his spunge, which by cleaning his brushes had imbibed several sorts of colours, and threw it in a rage against the picture, with an intent utterly to efface it; when fortune guiding the sponge to hit just upon the mouth of the dog, it there performed what all his art was not able to do.[3] Does she not sometimes direct our councils and correct them? Isabella, Queen of England, being to sail from Zealand into her own kingdom,[4] with an army in favour of her son against her husband, had been lost had she come into the port she intended, being there laid wait for by the enemy; but fortune, and sometimes she corrects our counsels.

Sometimes she is superior to art;

against her will, threw her into another haven, where she landed in safety. And he of old who, throwing a stone at a dog, hit and killed his mother-in-law, had he not reason to pronounce this verse:—

Ταυτόματον ημῶν καλλίω βουλεύεται.[5]

"fortune has more judgment than we."

She surpasses the rules of human prudence.

Icetes[6] had engaged with two soldiers to kill Timoleon at Adrano in Sicily. These chose their time to do it, when he was assisting at a sacrifice, and, thrusting into the crowd, as they were making signs to one another, that now was a fit time to do their business, in steps a third, who with a sword takes one of them full drive on the head, lays him dead upon the place, and runs away. Which the other seeing, and concluding himself discovered and lost, he runs to the altar and begs for mercy, promising to discover the whole truth, which as he was doing, and laying open the whole conspiracy, behold the third man, who, being apprehended, was as a murderer thrust and hauled by the people through the crowd towards Timoleon and other the most eminent persons of the assembly, before whom being brought he cried out for pardon, pleaded that he had justly slain his father's murderer; which he also proved upon the place, by sufficient witnesses, whom his good fortune very opportunely supplied him withal, that his father was really killed in the city of the Leontines by that very man on whom he had taken his revenge; he was presently awarded ten attic minæ, for having had the good fortune, in designing to revenge the death of his father, to preserve the life of the common father of Sicily. Thus fortune, in her conduct, surpasses all the rules of human prudence. But, to conclude, is there not a direct application of her favour, bounty, and piety, manifestly discovered in this action? Ignatius the father and Ignatius the son being proscribed by the triumviri of Rome, resolved upon this generous act of mutual kindness, to fall by the hands of one another, and by that means to frustrate and defeat the cruelty of the tyrants; and accordingly, with their swords drawn, ran full drive one upon another, where fortune so guided the points that they made two equally mortal wounds, affording withal so much honour to so brave a friendship, as to leave them just strength enough to draw out their bloody swords, that they might have liberty to embrace one another in this dying condition, with so close an embrace that the executioners cut off both their heads at once, leaving the

CHAPTER XXXIV.

OF ONE DEFECT IN OUR GOVERNMENT.

My late father, who, for a man that had no other advantages than experience only, and his own natural parts, was of a very clear judgment, formerly told me that he once had thoughts of endeavouring to introduce this practice, that there might be in every town a certain place assigned, to which such as stood in need of any thing might repair, and have their business entered by an officer appointed for that purpose. As, for example, I want to sell pearls; I want to buy pearls; such a one wants company to go to Paris; such a one enquires for a servant of such a quality; such a one for a master; such a one for such an artificer; some for one thing, some for another, every one according to what he wants. And it seems to me that these mutual advertisements would be of no contemptible advantage to the public business; for there are, every day, conditions that seek after one another, and for want of knowing one another's occasions, leave men in very great necessity.

The project of an office of agency.

I hear, to the great shame of the age we live in, that in our very sight two most excellent men for learning died so poor that they had scarce bread to put in their mouths, Lilius Gregorius Giraldus,[2] in Italy, and Sebastianus Castalio,[3] in Germany. And I believe there are a thousand men would have invited them into their families, on advantageous conditions, or have relieved them where they were, had they known their wants. The world is not so generally corrupted but that I know a man that would heartily wish the estate his ancestors have left him might be employed, so long as it shall please fortune to give him leave to enjoy it, to secure remarkable persons of any kind, whom misfortune sometimes persecutes to the last degree, from the danger of necessity; and, at least, place them in such a condition that they must be very hard to please if they were not contented. My father, in his domestic government, had this order (which I know how to commend but by no means imitate), that besides the day-book or register of the household affairs, where the small accounts, payments, and disbursements, which do not require a special hand, were entered, and which a bailiff always had in custody; he ordered him whom he kept to write for him, to keep a journal, and in it to set down all the remarkable occurrences, and, day by day, the memoirs of the affairs of his house; very pleasant to look over when time begins to wear things out of memory, and very useful sometimes to put us out of doubt, when such a thing was begun, when ended, what courses were debated on, what concluded; our voyages, absences, marriages, and deaths, the reception of good or ill news, the change of principal servants, and the like. An ancient custom which I think it would not be amiss for every one to revive in his own house; and I did very foolishly in neglecting it.

The miserable deaths of Giraldus and Castalio.

CHAPTER XXXV.

OF THE CUSTOM OF WEARING CLOTHES.

Whatever I shall say upon this subject, I must, of necessity, invade some of the bounds of custom, so careful has she been to shut up all the avenues. I was discussing with myself, in this shivering season, whether the fashion of going naked, in those nations lately discovered, is imposed upon them by the hot temperature of the air, as we say of the Moors and Indians, or whether it was the original fashion of mankind. Men of understanding, forasmuch as all things under the sun, as Holy Writ declares, are subject to the same laws, have been wont, in such considerations as these, where we are to distinguish the natural laws from those of man's invention, to have recourse to the general polity of the world, where there can be nothing counterfeited. Now, all other creatures being sufficiently furnished with all things necessary for the support of their being, without needle and thread, it is not to be imagined that we only should be brought into the world in a defective and indigent condition, and in such a state as cannot subsist without foreign assistance; and therefore it is that I believe that, as plants, trees, and animals, and all things that have life, are seen to be, by nature, sufficiently clothed and covered to defend them from the injuries of weather,

What gave rise to the custom of some nations to go stark naked.

> Proptereaque feré res omnes, aut corio sunt,
> Aut setâ, aut conchis, aut callo, aut cortice tectæ.[4]
>
> "And, therefore, shells, or rinds, or films, inclose,
> Or skin, or hair, on ev'ry body grows."

so were we: but as those who, by artificial light, put out that of the day, so we, by borrowed forms and fashions, have destroyed our own. And 'tis plain enough to be seen that

'tis custom only which renders that impossible that otherwise is nothing so; for, of those nations who have no manner of knowledge of clothing, some are situated under the same temperature that we are, and some in much colder climates. And, besides, our most tender parts are always exposed to the air, as the eyes, mouth, nose, and ears; and our country fellows, like our ancestors, go with their breasts open. Had we been born with a necessity upon us of wearing petticoats and breeches, there is no doubt but nature would have fortified those parts she intended should be exposed to the fury of the seasons with a thicker skin, as she has done the fingers' ends and the soles of the feet. And why should this seem hard to believe? I observe much greater distance betwixt my mode of dress and that of one of our country peasants, than betwixt his and a man that has no other covering but his skin. How many men, especially in Turkey, go naked merely upon account of devotion? Somebody, I forget who, asked a beggar, whom he saw in his shirt, in the depth of winter, as brisk and frolic as he who goes muffled up to the ears in furs, how he was able to endure to go so? "Sir," said the fellow, "you go with your face bare; I am all face." The Italians have a story of the Duke of Florence's fool, whom his master asking how, being so thin clad, he was able to support the cold, when he, himself, warm wrapt up as he was, was hardly able to do it? "Why," replied the fool, "use my receipt; put on all the clothes you have at once, as I do, and you'll feel no more cold than I." King Massinissa, to an extreme old age, could never be prevailed upon to go with his head covered, how cold, stormy, or rainy soever the weather might be.[1] Which also is reported of the Emperor Severus. Herodotus tells us[2] that, in the battles fought betwixt the Egyptians and the Persians, it was observed, both by himself and others, that of those who were left dead upon the place, the heads of the Egyptians were found to be, without comparison, harder than those of the Persians, by reason that the last had gone with their heads always covered from their infancy, first, with biggins, and then with turbans, and the others always shaved and bare. And King Agesilaus continued to a decrepid age, to wear always the same clothes in winter that he did in summer.[3] Cæsar, says Suetonius, marched always at the head of his army, for the most part on foot, with his head bare, whether it was rain or sun-shine, and as much is said of Hannibal,

Tum vestice nudo,
Excipere insanos imbres, cœlique ruinam.[4]

" Exposing his bare head to furious show'rs, While hail or rain in torrents on it pours."

A Venetian, who has long lived in Pegu, and is lately returned thence, writes, that the men and women of that kingdom, though they cover the rest of their persons, go always bare foot, and ride so too. And Plato does very earnestly advise, for the health of the whole body, to give the head and the feet no other clothing than what nature has bestowed. He whom the Poles have elected for their king,[5] since ours left them, who is indeed one of the greatest princes of this age, never wears any gloves, and for winter, or whatever weather may come, never wears any other cap abroad than the same he wears at home. Whereas, I cannot endure to go unbuttoned or loose, our neighbouring labourers would think themselves in chains if they were so braced. Varro is of opinion that when it was ordained we should be bare in the presence of the Gods, and before the magistrate, it was rather so ordered upon the score of health, and to inure us to the injuries of weather, than upon the account of reverence.[6] And since we are now talking of cold, and are Frenchmen, used to trick ourselves out in many colours, (not I myself, for I seldom wear other than black or white, in imitation of my father,) let us add another story of Captain Martin du Bellay, who affirms, that in the journey through Luxemburg, he saw such a great frost that the munition-wine was cut with hatchets and wedges, delivered out to the soldiers by weight, and carried away in baskets:[7] and Ovid,

Nudaque consistunt formam servantia testæ
Vina, nec hausta meri, sed data frusta, bibunt.[8]

" The wine
Stript of its cask, retains the figure still,
Nor do they draughts, but crusts of Bacchus, swill."

At the mouth of the Lake Mœotis, the frosts are so severe that in the very same place where Mithridates's lieutenant had fought the enemy dry-foot, and given them a defeat, the summer following he also obtained over them a naval victory.[9] The Romans fought at a very great disadvantage in the engagement they had with the Carthaginians near Placentia, by reason that they went to the charge with their blood congealed, and their limbs numbed with cold,[10] whereas Hannibal had caused great fires to be made through his camp to warm his soldiers, and oil to be distributed amongst them, to the end that, anointing themselves, they might render their nerves more supple and active, and fortify the pores against the violence of the air, and freezing wind that then raged. The retreat the Greeks made from Babylon into their own country is famous for the difficulties and calamities they had to overcome. Of which this was one, that being encountered in the mountains of Armenia, with a horrible storm of snow, they lost all knowledge of the country, and of the ways, and being shut up, were a day and a night without eating or drinking, most of their cattle dead, many of themselves starved dead, several struck blind with the driving and glittering of the snow, many of them maimed in their fingers and toes, and many stiff and motionless with the extremity of the cold, who yet had their understanding entire.[1]

Fruit trees buried in the winter.

Alexander saw a nation where they bury the fruit trees in winter, to defend them from the frost,[2] and we also may see the same. But concerning clothes, the King of Mexico changed his apparel four times a day, and never put them on more, employing those he left off, in his continual liberalities and rewards; nor was either pot, dish, or other utensil of his kitchen or table ever served up to him twice.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

OF CATO THE YOUNGER.

I AM not guilty of the common error of judging another by myself. I easily believe that in another's humour which is contrary to my own: and though I find myself engaged to one certain form, I do not oblige others to it, as many do, but believe and apprehend a thousand different ways of living; and, contrary to most men, more easily admit of differences than uniformity amongst us. I, as frankly as any one would have me, discharge a man from my humours and principles, and consider him simply as he is, without reference to myself, taking him according to his own particular model. Though I am not continent myself, I nevertheless sincerely approve of the continency of the Feuillans and the Capuchins, and highly commend their way of living. I insinuate myself very well by imagination into their place, and love and honour them the more for being other than I am myself. I very much desire that we may be judged every man by himself, and would not be drawn into the consequences of common examples. My weakness does nothing alter the esteem I ought to have of the force and vigour of those who deserve it. Sunt qui nihil nudent quam quod se imitari posse confidunt.[3] "There are those who persuade nothing but what they believe they can imitate themselves." Crawling upon the slime of the earth, I do not, for all that, the less observe in the clouds the inimitable height of some heroic souls. 'Tis a great deal for me to have my judgment regular and right, even though the effects cannot be so, and to maintain this sovereign power at least free from corruption: 'tis something to have my will right and good when my legs fail me. This age wherein we live, in our part of the world at least, is grown so stupid that not only the exercise, but the very imagination of virtue is defective, and seems to be nothing but college jargon.

Virtutem verba putant, ut lucum ligna.[4]

"Words finely couch'd these men for virtue take,
As if each wood a sacred grove could make."

Quam vereri deberent, etiam si percipere non possent.[5] "Which they ought to reverence, though they cannot comprehend." 'Tis a mere gew-gaw to hang in a cabinet, or at the end of the tongue as on the tip of the ear, for ornament only. There are no more virtuous actions extant, and those actions that carry a shew of virtue have yet nothing of its essence; for 'tis profit, glory, fear and custom, and other such like foreign causes, are the incentives to produce them. Our justice also, our valour and good offices, may be called so too in respect to others, and according to the face they appear with to the public; but in the doer it can by no means be virtue, because there is another end proposed, another moving cause. Now, virtue owns nothing to be her's but what is done by herself, and for herself, alone. In that great battle of Platæa, which the Greeks, under the command of Pausanias, obtained against Mardonius and the Persians, the conquerors, according to their custom, coming to divide amongst them the glory of the exploit, they assigned to the Spartan nation the pre-eminence of valour in this engagement. The Spartans, great judges of bravery, when they came to determine to what particular man of their nation the honour was due of having best behaved himself upon this occasion, found that Aristodemus had, of all others, hazarded his person with the greatest courage; but they did not, however, allow him any prize or reward, by reason that his valour had been incited by a desire to clear his reputation from the reproach of his miscarriage at the affair of Thermopylæ, and, with a desire to die bravely, to wipe off that former blemish.[6] Our judgments are yet sick, and obey the humour of our depraved manners. I observe most of the wits of these times exercise their ingenuity in endeavouring to blemish and darken the glory of the greatest and most generous actions of former ages, putting one vile interpretation or another Vicious motives destroy the essence of virtue.

Why the Spartans refused the reward of valour to a person who signalized himself the most in a battle.

Many people study to depreciate the noblest deeds of the ancients.

upon them all, and forging and supposing vain causes and motives for them. A mighty fine subtlety indeed! Give me the greatest and purest action that ever the day beheld, and I will furnish a hundred plausible vicious motives to obscure it. God knows, whoever will stretch them out to the full, what diversity of images our internal wills suffer under; they do not play the censurers so maliciously as they do it ignorantly and rudely. The same pains and license that others take to bespatter these illustrious names, I would willingly undergo to lend them a shoulder to raise them higher. These rare images, that are culled out by the consent of the wisest men of all ages for the world's example, I should endeavour to honour anew, as far as my invention would permit, in all the circumstances of favourable interpretation. And we may well believe that the force of our invention is infinitely short of their merit. 'Tis the duty of good men to draw virtue as beautiful as they can, and there would be no impropriety in the case should our passion a little transport us in favour of so sacred a form. What these people do to the contrary they either do out of malice, or by the vice of confining their belief to their own capacity, as I have said before; or, which I am more inclined to think, from not having their sight strong, clear, and elevated enough to conceive the splendour of virtue in her native purity. As Plutarch complains that, in his time, some attributed the cause of the younger Cato's death to his fear of Cæsar, at which he is very angry, and with good reason, by that a man may guess how much more he would have been offended with those who have attributed it to ambition. Senseless people! He would have performed a just and generous action, even though he were to have had ignominy for his reward instead of glory. That man was, in truth, a pattern that nature chose out to shew to what height human virtue and constancy could arrive. But I am not capable of handling so noble an argument, and shall therefore only set five Latin poets together by the ears, to see who has done best in the praise of Cato; and, inclusively, for their own too. Now, a man well read in poetry will think the two first, in comparison of the others, a little languishing; the third, more vigorous, but overthrown by the extravagance of his own force. He will then think that there will be yet room for one or two gradations of invention to come to the fourth; but, coming to mount the pitch of that, he will lift up his hands for admiration; the last, the first by some space (but a space that he will swear is not to be filled up by any human wit), he will be astonished, he will not know where he is. These are wonders. We have more poets than judges and interpreters of poetry. It is easier to write an indifferent poem than to understand a good one. There is, indeed, a certain low and moderate sort of poetry that a man may well enough judge by certain rules of art; but the true, supreme, and divine poesy is above all the rules of reason. Whoever discerns the beauty of it, with the most assured and most steady sight, sees no more than the quick reflection of a flash of lightning. This is a sort of poetry that does not exercise, but ravishes and overwhelms, our judgment. The fury that possesses him who is able to penetrate into it, wounds yet a third man by hearing him repeat it. It is like a loadstone, that not only attracts the needle, but also infuses into it the virtue to attract others. And this is more evidently seen at our theatres, where the sacred inspiration of the muses, having first stirred up the poet to anger, sorrow, hatred, and out of himself, to whatever it will, does moreover by the poet possess the actor, and by the actor, consecutively, all the spectators,—showing how much our passions hang and depend upon one another.[1] Poetry has ever had that power over me, from a child, to transpierce and transport me. But this quick sense of it, that is natural to me, has been variously handled by variety of forms, not so much higher and lower (for they were ever the highest of every kind), as differing in colour. First, a gay and sprightly fluency, afterwards a lofty and penetrating subtlety; and, lastly, a mature and constant force. Their names will better express them: Ovid, Lucan, Virgil. But our poets are beginning their career:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THAT WE LAUGH AND CRY FOR THE SAME THING.

The vanquished bewailed by the victors.

WHEN we read in history that Antigonus was very much displeased with his son, for presenting him the head of King Pyrrhus, his enemy, newly slain, fighting against him, and that seeing it he wept;[2] that René, Duke of Lorraine, also lamented the death of Charles, Duke of Burgundy,[3] whom he had himself defeated, and appeared in mourning at his funeral; and that in the battle of Auroy,[4] which Count de Montfort obtained over Charles de Blois, his competitor for the duchy of Brittany, the conqueror meeting the dead body of his enemy was very much afflicted at his death; —we must not presently cry out,

Et così aven che l'animo ciascuna,
Sua passion sotto el contrario manto,
Ricopre, con la vista or' chiara, or' bruma.[5]

"That every one, whether of joy or woe,
The passion of his mind can govern so
As when most griev'd to show a visage clear,
And melancholy when best pleas'd appear."

When Pompey's head was presented to Cæsar the histories tell us that he turned away his face, as from a sad and unpleasing object.[6] There had been so long an intelligence and companionship betwixt them in the management of the public affairs, such a community of fortunes, so many mutual offices, and so near an alliance, that this countenance he wore ought not to suffer under any misinterpretation, or to be suspected for either false or counterfeit, as this other seems to believe:

Tutumque putavit
Jam bonus esse socer; lachrymas non sponte cadentes
Effudit, gemitusque expressit pectore læto,
Non aliter manifesta putans abscondere mentis
Gaudia, quam lachrymas.[7]

"And now he saw
'Twas safe to be a pious father-in-law,
He shed fore'd tears, and from a joyful breast
Fetch'd sighs and groans, conceiving tears would best Conceal his inward joy."

For though it be true that the greatest part of our actions are no other than vizor and disguise, and that it may sometimes be real and true that

Hæredis fletus sub personâ risus est,[8]

"The heir's dissembled tears, behind the screen Could one but peep, would joyful smiles be seen,"

yet in judging of these matters we should consider how much our souls are oftentimes agitated with divers passions. And as they say that in our bodies there is a congregation of divers humours, of which that is the sovereign which, according to the complexion we are of, is commonly most predominant in us: so, though the soul has in it divers motions to agitate it, yet must there of necessity be one to over-rule all the rest, though not with so necessary and absolute a dominion but that through the flexibility and inconstancy of the soul those of less authority may, upon occasion, re-assume their place and make a little sally in turn. Thence it is that we see not only children, who innocently obey and follow nature, often laugh and cry at the same thing: but none of us can boast, what journey soever he may have in hand that he has the most set his heart upon, but when he comes to part with his family and friends he will find something that troubles him within; and though he restrain his tears, yet he puts his foot in the stirrup with a sad and cloudy countenance. And what gentle flame soever may have warmed the heart of modest and well-born virgins, yet have they to be forced from about their mothers' necks to be put to bed to their husbands, whatever this boon companion is pleased to say:

Mankind subject to different passions.

Estne novis nuptis odio Venus? anne parentum
Frustrantur falsis gaudia lachrymulis,
Ubertim thalami quas intra limina fundunt?
Non, ita me divi, vera gemunt, juverint.[9]

"Does the fair bride the sport so greatly dread,
That she takes on so when she's put to bed?
Her parents' joys t' allay with a feign'd tear,
She does not cry in earnest, I dare swear."

Neither is it strange to lament a person dead whom a man would by no means wish to be alive. When I rattle my servant I do it with all my mettle, and load him with no feigned, but downright real, curses: but the heat being over, if he should stand in need of me, I should be very ready to do him good; for I instantly turn the leaf. When I call him calf and coxcomb I do not pretend to entail those titles upon him for ever; neither do I think I give myself the lie in calling him an honest fellow presently after. No one quality possesses us solely and universally. Were it not like a fool to talk to one's self, there would hardly be a day or an hour wherein I might not be heard to mutter to myself and against myself, "Fool! blockhead!" and yet I do not think that to be my character. Who for seeing me one while cold, and presently very kind to my wife, believes the one or other to be counterfeit, is an ass. Nero, taking leave of his mother, whom he sent to be drowned, was nevertheless sensible of some emotion at the farewell, and was struck with horror and pity. 'Tis said that the light of the sun is not one continuous thing, but that he darts new rays so thick one upon another that we cannot perceive the intermission:

> Largus enim liquidi fons luminis, æthereus Sol
> Irrigat assiduè cœlum candore recenti,
> Suppetidatque novo confestim lumine lumen.[1]
>
> "For the æthereal sun that shines so bright,
> Being a fountain large of liquid light,
> With fresh rays sprinkles still the cheerful sky,
> And with new light the light does still supply."

Just so the soul variously and imperceptibly darts out her passions. Artabanus surprising once his nephew Xerxes, chid him for the sudden alteration of his countenance. He was considering the immeasurable greatness of his forces passing over the Hellespont for the Grecian expedition, and was first seized with a palpitation of joy to see so many thousands of men at his command, and this appeared in the gaiety of his looks: but his thoughts at the same instant suggesting to him that of so many lives there would not be one left in a century, at most, he presently knit his brows and grew sad, even to tears.[2] We have resolutely pursued the revenge of an injury received, and been sensible of a singular satisfaction at our victory: but we weep notwithstanding. Yet 'tis not for the victory that we weep; there is no alteration as to that. But the soul looks upon the thing with another eye, and represents it to itself with another kind of face; for every thing has many faces and several aspects, like a ball. Relations, old acquaintance, and friendships, possess our imaginations, and make them tender for the time: but the turn is so quick that it escapes us in a moment.

The soul does not look upon things with one and the same eye, nor with one and the same bias.

> Nil adeò fieri celeri ratione videtur,
> Quàm si mens fieri propouit, et inchoat ipsa.
> Ociùs ergo animus, quàm res se perciet ulla,
> Aute oculos quorum in promptu natura videtur.[3]
>
> "As no one action seems so swiftly done
> As what the mind has plann'd and once begun;
> This observation evidently proves
> The mind than other things more swiftly moves."

And therefore, while we would make one continued thing of all this succession of passion, we deceive ourselves. When Timoleon[4] laments the murder he had committed upon so mature and generous deliberation, he does not lament the liberty restored to his country, he does not lament the tyrant, but he laments his brother. One part of his duty is performed, let us give him leave to perform the other.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

OF SOLITUDE.

LET us pass over that old comparison betwixt the active and the solitary life; and as for the fine saying in which ambition and avarice cloak themselves, "That we are not born for ourselves, but for the public,"[5] let us boldly appeal to those who are in the thick of public affairs, and let them lay their hands upon their hearts and then say whether, on the contrary, they do not rather aspire to titles and offices, and the tumult of the world, to make their private advantage at the public expense. But we need not ask them the question; for the corrupt ways by which men push on towards the height at which their ambitions aspire, do manifestly enough declare that their ends cannot be very good. Let us then tell ambition that it is she herself that gives us a taste of solitude; for what does she so much avoid as society? What does she so much seek as elbow-room? A man may do well or ill everywhere; but if what Bias says be true, that the greatest part is the worse,[6] or what the preacher says, that there is not one good in a thousand,

> Rari quippe boni: numero vix sunt totidem, quot > Thebarum portæ, vel divitis ostia Nili.[7]
>
> "How few good men are numbered on this soil!
> Scarce more than gates of Thebes or mouths of Nile."

The contagion is very dangerous in the crowd. A man must either imitate the vicious or hate them. Both are dangerous, either to resemble them, because they are many, or to hate many, because they are unresembling.[8] And merchants that go to sea are in the right, when they are cautious that those who embark with them in the same ship be neither dissolute blasphemers nor vicious otherways; looking upon such society as unfortunate. And therefore it was that Bias pleasantly said to some who, being with him in a dangerous storm, implored the assistance of the gods, "Peace! speak softly," said he, "that they may not know you are here in my company."[9] And a more forcible example:—Albuquerque, viceroy in the Indies for Emanuel, King of Portugal, in an extreme peril of shipwreck took a young boy upon his shoulders, for this only end, that in the society of their common danger his innocency might serve to protect him and to recommend him to the divine favour, that they might get safe to shore. 'Tis not that a wise man may not live everywhere content, and be alone in the crowd of a palace, but if it be left to his own choice he, according to the school, will fly the very sight of it. He can endure that, if need be; but if it be referred to him, he will choose this. He cannot think himself sufficiently rid of vice if he must yet contend with it in other men. Charondas punished as bad men those who were convicted of keeping bad company.[10] There is nothing so unsociable and sociable as man; the one by his vice, the other by his nature. And Antisthenes, in my opinion, did not give him a satisfactory answer, who reproached him with frequenting bad company, by saying, "That physicians live well amongst the sick."[1] For if they contribute to the health of the sick, no doubt but by the contagion, continual sight of, and familiarity with, diseases, they must of necessity impair their own. Now the end I suppose is all one, to live at more leisure and at greater ease. But men do not always choose the right way; for they often think they have totally taken leave of all business when they have only exchanged one employment for another. There is little less trouble in governing a private family than a whole kingdom. Wherever the mind is perplexed it is in an entire disorder, and domestic employments are not less troublesome for being less important. Moreover, for having shaken off the court and the exchange, we have not taken leave of the principal vexations of life:

——— Ratio et prudentia curas,
Non locus effusi late maris arbiter aufert.[2]

"Reason and prudence our affections ease,
Not the bold site that wide commands the seas."

Solitude does not free us from our vices.

Our ambition, avarice, irresolution, fear, and inordinate desires, do not leave us with change of place:

Et post equitem sedet atra cura.[3]

"And when he rides, black care sits close behind."

They often follow us even to the cloisters and to the philosophical schools; nor deserts, nor caves, hair-shirts, nor fasts, can disengage us from them.

Hæret lateri lethalis arundo.[4]

"The fatal shaft sticks to the wounded side."

One telling Socrates that such a one was nothing improved by his travels: "I very well believe it," said he, "for he took himself along with him."[5]

Quid terras alio calentes
Sole mutamus? Patriæ quis exul
Se quoque fugit.[6]

"To change our native soil why should we run,
And seek one warmed by a fiercer sun?
For who in exile ever yet could find
He went abroad and left himself behind?"

If a man do not first discharge both himself and his mind of the burden with which he finds himself oppressed, motion will but make it press the harder and sit the heavier, as the lading of a ship is of less incumbrance when fast stowed in a settled posture. You do a sick man more harm than good in removing him from place to place; you fix and establish the disease by motion, as stakes go deeper and more fixedly into the earth by being moved up and down in the place where they are designed to stand. And therefore it is not enough to get remote from the public; 'tis not enough to shift one's self,—a man must fly from the popular dispositions that have taken possession of his soul—he must sequester and tear himself from himself.

——Rupi jam vincula, dicas:
Nam luctata canis nodum arripit; attamen illi,
Cum fugit, à collo trahitur pars longa catenæ.[7]

"Thou'lt say, perhaps, that thou hast broke the chain;
Why, so the dog has gnaw'd the knot in twain
That tied him there; but, as he flies, he feels
The ponderous chain still rattling at his heels."

We still carry our fetters along with us; 'tis not an absolute liberty; we yet cast back a kind look upon what we have left behind us; the fancy is still full of our old way of living:

Nisi purgatum est pectus, quæ prælia nobis
Atque pericula tunc ingratis insinuandum?
Quantæ conscindunt hominem cupidinis æres
Sollicitum curæ? quantique perinde timores?
Quidve superbia, spurcitia, ac petulantia, quantus
Efficiunt clades? quid luxus, desidiæque?[8]

"Unless the mind be purged, what conflicts dire,
And dangers will not ev'ry thought inspire!
Th' ungrateful man, how many bitter cares
Incessant gall, and then how many fears!
What horrid massacres from pride ensue,
From sloth, lust, petulance, and from luxury, too!

In what true solitude consists.

The mind itself is the disease, and cannot escape from itself;

In culpâ est animus, qui se non effugit unquam,[9]

"Still in the mind the fault doth lie,
That never from itself can fly,"

and therefore it should be called home, and be confined within itself: that is the true solitude, which may be enjoyed in populous cities and in the courts of kings, though more commodiously apart.

Now, since we will attempt to live alone, and to waive all conversation amongst men, let us so order it that our content may depend wholly upon ourselves; let us dissolve all obligations that ally us to others. Let us obtain this from ourselves, that we may live alone in good earnest, and live at our ease too.

Constancy in the midst of misfortunes.

Stilpo having escaped from the fire that consumed the city where he lived, and where he had his wife, children, goods, and everything he was master of destroyed by the flames, Demetrius Poliorcetes seeing him, amidst so great a ruin, appear with a serene and undisturbed countenance, asked him if he had received no loss? To which he made answer: No; and that, thanks be to God, nothing was lost of his.[10] The philosopher Antisthenes pleasantly said, that men should only furnish themselves with such things as would swim, and might with the owner escape the storm;[11] and certainly a wise man never loses anything, if he has himself. When the city of Nola was ruined by the Barbarians, Paulinus, who was bishop of that place, having there lost all he had, and being himself a prisoner, prayed after this manner:—"O Lord, keep me from being sensible of this loss; for thou knowest they have yet touched nothing of that which is mine."[1] The riches that made him rich, and the goods that made him good, were still entire. This it is to make choice of treasures that can secure themselves from plunder and violence, and to hide them in a place into which no one can enter, and which no one can betray but ourselves. Wives, children, goods, must be had, and especially health, by him that can get it; but we are not so to set our heart upon them that our happiness must have its dependence upon any of them: we must reserve a withdrawing-room, wholly our own, and entirely free wherein to settle our true liberty, our principal solitude and retreat. And in this we must, for the most part, entertain ourselves with ourselves, and so privately that no knowledge or communication of any foreign concern be admitted there; there to laugh and to talk, as if without wife, children, goods, train, or attendance; to the end that, when it shall so fall out that we must lose any or all of these, it may be no new thing to be without them. We have a mind that can turn to itself, that can be its own company; that has wherewithal to attack and to defend, to receive and to give. Let us not then fear, in this solitude, to languish in an uncomfortable vacancy of thought.

In solis sis tibi turba locis.[2]

"In solitary places be Unto thyself good company."

Men put themselves into a flurry for a thousand things that don't concern them.

Virtue is satisfied with herself, without discipline, without words, without effects. In our ordinary actions there is not one of a thousand that concerns ourselves. He that thou seest scrambling up that battered wall, furious and transported, against whom so many musket shots are levelled; and that other, all over scars, pale, and fainting with hunger, yet resolved rather to die than to open the gate to him, dost thou think that these men are there upon their own account? No, peradventure in the behalf of one whom they never saw, and that never concerns himself for their pains and danger, but lies wallowing the while in sloth and pleasure. And this other snivelling, weak-ey'd, slovenly fellow, that thou seest come out of his study after midnight, dost thou think he has been tumbling over books to learn how to become a better man, wiser and more content? No such matter, he will there end his days, but he will teach posterity the measure of Plautus's verses, and the true orthography of some Latin word. Who is there that does not voluntarily exchange health, repose, and life itself, for reputation and glory, the most useless, frivolous, and false coin that passes current amongst us? As though our own death were not sufficient to terrify and trouble us, we charge ourselves, in addition, with those of our wives, children, and family: as though our own affairs did not afford us anxiety enough, we take upon us to annoy ourselves and disturb our brains, with those of our neighbours and friends:

Vah, quemquamne hominem in animum instituere, aut
Parare, quod sit carius, quam ipse est sibi![3]

"Alas! what mortal will be so unwise
Anything dearer than himself to prise?"

In whom solitude is most becoming.

Solitude seems to me to have the best pretence in such as have already employed most their active and flourishing age in the world's service; as for example, Thales. We have lived enough for others, let us at least live out the small remnant of life for ourselves; let us now call in our thoughts and intentions to ourselves, and to our own ease and repose. 'Tis no light thing to make a sure retreat; it will be enough to do, without mixing up with it other enterprizes and designs. Since God gives us leisure to prepare for, and to order our removal, let us make ready, pack up our baggage, take leave betimes of the company, and disentangle ourselves from those strong ties that engage us elsewhere, and separate us from ourselves. We must break the knot of our obligations, how powerful soever, and hereafter love this, or that, but espouse nothing but ourselves. That is to say, let the remainder be our own, yet not so joined and so rivetted as not to be forced away without flaying us, or tearing away a part of the whole piece. The greatest thing in the world is for a man to know how to be his own: 'tis time to wean ourselves from society when we can no more add any thing to it; he who is not in a condition to lend must forbid himself to borrow. Our forces begin to fail us; let us call them in, and lock them up at home. He that can convert and resolve into himself the offices of so many friendships, and of society, let him do it. In this decay of nature, which renders him useless, burthensome, and troublesome to others, let him take care not to be useless, burthensome, and troublesome to himself. Let him soothe and caress himself, and above all things be sure to govern himself with reverence to his reason and conscience to that degree as to be asham'd to make a false step in their presence. Rarum est enim, ut satis se quisque vereatur.[4] "For 'tis rarely that men have respect and reverence enough for themselves." Socrates says, that boys should cause themselves to be instructed, men exercise themselves in well doing, and old men retire from all civil and military employments, living at their own discretion, without the obligation to any office.[5] There are some complexions more proper for these precepts of retirement, than others. Such as are of a soft and faint apprehension, and of a delicate will, and affection which is not easily subdued to employment, which is my own case, will sooner incline to this advice than active and busy souls who embrace all, engage in all, and are hot upon every thing, who offer, present, and give themselves up to every occasion. We should avail ourselves of these accidental and extraneous things, so far as they are pleasant to us, but by no means lay our principal foundation thereon, for it is no true one; neither nature nor reason can allow it so to be; and why, then, should we, contrary to their laws, enslave our own content by giving it into the power of another? So, to anticipate also the accidents of fortune, and to deprive ourselves of the advantages we have in our own power, as several have done upon the account of devotion, and some philosophers upon a principle of reason, for a man to be his own servant, to lie hard, to put out his own eyes, throw wealth into the river, and seek out grief, as some do, that by the misery of this life they may pretend to bliss in another; and others, that by laying themselves on the ground they may avoid the danger of falling, are acts of an excessive virtue. The stoutest and firmest natures render even their retirement glorious and exemplary.

The constitutions most fitted for retirement.

Tuta et parvula laudo,
Cum res deficiunt, satis inter vilia fortis:
Verum, ubi quid melius contingit et unctius, idem
Hos sapere, et solos aio bene vivere, quorum
Conspicitur nitidis fundata pecunia villis.[1]

"Thus I, when better entertainments fail,
Bravely commend a plain and frugal meal;
On cheaper suppers show myself full wise;
But if some dainties more luxurious rise,
I call those wise and blest, and only those,
Whose large estates their splendid mansion shews."

A great deal less would serve my turn well enough. 'Tis enough for me, while in Fortune's favour, to prepare myself for her disgrace, and being at my ease to represent to myself, as far as my imagination can stretch, the ill to come; just as we practise at justs and tiltings, where we counterfeit war in the greatest calm of peace. I do not think Arcesilaus, the philosopher, the less a philosopher for knowing that he made use of gold and silver vessels,[2] as the condition of his fortune allowed him to do; and, indeed, have a better opinion of him than if he had denied himself what he used with liberality and moderation. I see the utmost limits of natural necessity, and considering a poor man begging at my door often more jocund and more healthy than I myself am, I put myself into his place, and attempt to dress my mind after his fashion. And running in like manner over other examples, though I fancy death, poverty, contempt, and sickness treading on my heels, I easily resolve not to be affrighted, forasmuch as a less than I am takes them with so much patience; I am not willing to believe that a weak understanding can do more than a strong one; or that the effects of reason cannot be as great as those of custom. And knowing how slight and uncertain these accidental conveniences are, I never forget, in the height of these enjoyments, to make it my chief prayer to God that he will please to render me content with myself, and the condition wherein he has placed me. I see young men, gay, merry fellows, who nevertheless keep a provision of pills in their trunks at home, to take when they catch a cold, which they fear so much the less because they think they have the remedy at hand. We should all take the example, and, if we find ourselves subject to some more violent disease, should furnish ourselves with such medicines as may numb and stupify the part affected. The employment a man should choose for a solitary life ought neither to be a laborious, nor an unpleasing one, otherwise 'tis to no purpose at all to be retired. And this depends upon every one's liking and humour; mine has no turn for household matters, and such as love this occupation ought to apply themselves to it with moderation;

The limits of natural necessities.

And not himself to 's business submit."[4]

otherwise 'tis a very servile employment, as Sallust tells us;[4] though some parts of it are more colourable than others, as the care of gardens, which Xenophon gives to Cyrus;[5] a mean may be found out betwixt that low and sordid application, so full of perpetual solicitude, which is seen in men who make it their entire business and study, and that stupid and extreme negligence, letting all things go to rack, which we see in others.

Whilst he aloft on Fancy's wings is borne."

But let us hear what advice the younger Pliny gives his friend, Cornelius Rufus, upon the subject of solitude: "I advise thee, in the pleasant retirement wherein thou art, to leave to thy servants that base and abject care of thy domestic matters, and to addict thyself to the study of letters, to extract thence something that may be entirely and absolutely thine own."[7] By which he means reputation; like Cicero, who says that he wishes to employ his solitude and retirement from public affairs, to acquire by his writings an immortal life.[1]

Usque adeone
Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc sciat alter.[2]

"Is knowledge nothing worth, unless you show
To others all that you pretend to know?"

It appears to be reason, when a man talks of retiring from the world, that he should look quite out of himself. These do it but by halves. They design well enough for themselves, 'tis true, when they shall be no more in it; but still they pretend to extract the fruits of their design from the world, when absent from it, by a ridiculous contradiction.

The imagination of those who seek solitude upon the account of devotion, filling up their courage with the certainty of the divine promises in the other life, is much more rationally founded. They propose to themselves God, an infinite object in goodness and power. The soul has there wherewithal, at full liberty, to satiate her desires. Afflictions and sufferings turn to their advantage, being undergone for the acquisition of an eternal health and everlasting joys. Death is to be wished and longed for, where it is the passage to so perfect a condition. And the severe rules they impose upon themselves are immediately softened down by custom, and all their carnal appetites baffled and subdued, by refusing to humour and feed them; they being only supported by use and exercise. This sole end, therefore, of another happy and immortal life, is that which really merits that we should abandon the pleasures and conveniences of this. And he who can really and constantly enflame his soul with the ardour of this lively faith and hope, does erect for himself in his solitude a more voluptuous and delicious life than any other sort of life. Neither the end, then, nor the means, of this advice of Pliny pleases me, for we often fall out of the frying-pan into the fire. This book-employment is as painful as any other, and as great an enemy to health, which ought to be the first thing in every man's thoughts; neither ought a man to be allured with the pleasure of it, which is the same that destroys the wary, avaricious, voluptuous, and ambitious men. The sages give us caution enough to beware of the treachery of our appetites, and to distinguish true and entire pleasures from such as are mixed and complicated with pain. For the greatest part of pleasures (say they) tickle and caress only to strangle us, like those thieves whom the Egyptians called Philetas.[3] If head-ache came before drunkenness, we should have a care of drinking too much: but pleasure to deceive us marches before, and conceals her train. Books are pleasant, but if by their use we impair our health, and spoil our good humour, the best things we have, let us give them over. I, for my part, am one of those who think that no fruit derived from them can recompense so great a loss. As men who feel themselves weakened by a long series of indisposition give themselves up at last to the mercy of medicine, and submit to certain rules of living, which they are for the future never to transgress; so he who retires, weary of, and disgusted with, the common way of living, ought to model this new one he enters into by the rules of reason, and to institute and arrange it by premeditation, and after the best method he can contrive. He ought to have taken leave of all sorts of labour, what face soever it bears; and generally to have shaken off all those passions which disturb the tranquillity of body and soul, and then choose the way that best suits his own humour:

What is to be thought of the solitude which is courted for the sake of devotion.

Unusquisque suâ noverit ire viâ.[4]

"We each best know to what we are inclined."

In attending to domestic matters, in study, hunting, and all other exercises, we should go to the utmost limits of pleasure; but must take heed of proceeding farther, or trouble begins to mix in it. We are to reserve so much employment only as is necessary to keep us in breath; and to defend us from the inconveniences that the other extreme, of a dull and stupid laziness, brings along with it. There are some sterile, knotty sciences, and chiefly hammered out for the crowd; let such be left to them who are engaged in the service of the world. I for my part care for no other books but either such as are pleasant and easy, to tickle my fancy, or those that comfort and instruct me how to regulate my life and death.

Certain sciences with which the mind must not be embarrassed.

Tacitum sylvas inter reptare salubres,
Curantem quidquid dignum sapiente bonoque est.[5]

"Silently meditating in the groves,
What best a wise and honest man behoves."

The defect of Pliny's and Cicero's advice.

Wiser men may propose to themselves a repose wholly spiritual, as having great force and vigour of mind; but for me, who am but ordinarily furnished that way, I find it necessary to support myself with bodily conveniences; and age having of late deprived me of those pleasures that were most acceptable to me, I instruct and whet my appetite to those that remain, and are more suitable to this new season of my life. We ought to hold fast, tooth and nail, of the use of the pleasures of life, that our years, one after another, snatch away from us.

Carpamus dulcia; nostrum est
Quod vivis; cinis, et manes, et fabula fies.[6]

——— "And our time employ
In pleasures which alone give life its zest;
You'll be a tale and ashes like the rest."

Now, as to the end that Pliny and Cicero propose to us of glory; 'tis infinitely wide of my account; ambition is, of all others, the most contrary humour to solitude. Glory and repose are so inconsistent that they cannot possibly inhabit in one and the same place; and, as far as I understand, those who seek the two have only their arms and legs disengaged from the crowd: their mind and wishes remain engaged behind more than ever.

Glory and tranquillity incompatible.

Tun', vetule, auriculis alienis colligis escas?[1]

"Old as you are, will you the food supply
For other ears?

They are only retired to take a better leap, and by a stronger motion to give a brisker charge into the crowd. Will you see how they shoot short? Let us put into the balance the advice of two philosophers, of two very different sects,[2] writing the one to Idomeneus, the other to Lucilius, their friends, to retire into solitude from worldly honours and the administration of public affairs. "You have," say they, "hitherto lived swimming and floating; come now to die in the harbour. You have given the first part of your life to the light, give what remains to the shade. It is impossible to give over business if you do not also quit the fruit, and therefore disengage yourselves from all the concerns of name and glory. 'Tis to be feared the lustre of your former actions will give you but too much light, and follow you into your most private retreat. Quit with other pleasures that which proceeds from the approbation of the world. And as to your knowledge and parts, never concern yourselves, they will not lose their effect if yourselves be ever the better for them.[3] Remember him who, being asked Why he took so much pains in an art that could come to the knowledge of but few persons?[4] 'A few are enough for me,' replied he; 'I have enough with one, I have enough with never a one.' He said true; yourself and a companion are theatre enough to one another, or you to yourself.[5] Let us be to you the whole people, and the whole people to you but one.[6] 'Tis a low ambition to think to derive glory from a man's sloth and privacy. You should do like the beasts of chase, who efface the track at the entrance into their den.[7] You are to concern yourselves no more how the world talks of you, but how you are to talk to yourselves. Retire yourself into yourself, but first prepare yourself there to receive yourself.[8] It were a folly to trust yourself in your own hands, if you cannot govern yourself.[9] A man may miscarry alone as well as in company; till you have rendered yourself one before whom you dare not trip, and till you have a bashfulness and respect for yourself; obversentur species honestæ animo.[10] (Let just and honest things be still represented to the mind.) Present continually to your imagination Cato, Phocion, and Aristides, in whose presence fools themselves will hide their faults, and make them controllers of all your intentions. Should these deviate from virtue, your respect to those will again set you right; they will keep you in the way of being contented with yourself, to borrow nothing of any other but yourself; to restrain and fix your soul in certain and limited thoughts, wherein she may please herself, and, having comprehended the true and real good which men the more enjoy the more they understand, to rest satisfied, without desire of prolongation of life or memory." These are the precepts of the true and natural philosophy, not of a boasting and prating philosophy, such as that of the two former.[11]

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A CONSIDERATION UPON CICERO.

One word more by way of comparison betwixt these two. There are to be gathered out of the writings of Cicero and the younger Pliny (who, in my opinion, but little resembles his uncle in his humour), infinite testimonies of a nature boundlessly ambitious; and, amongst others, this for one, that they both, in the sight of all the world, solicit the historians of their time not to forget them in their memoirs;[12] and fortune, as it were in spite, has made the vanity of these requests live upon record down to this age of ours, while she has long since buried the histories of themselves in 11 Pliny the Younger and Cicero.

12 Cicero writing to Lucceius (Epist. v. 12), and Pliny to Tacitus (vii. 33), with this most remarkable difference, however, that the first earnestly desires his friend not to attach himself scrupulously to the rules of, but boldly to leap the barriers of, truth in his favour. "Te plane etiam atque etiam rogo, ut et ornes ea vehementius etiam quam fortasse sentis et in ea leges historiæ negligas;" whereas Pliny declares expressly that he does not desire Tacitus to give the least offence to the truth:—"Quamquam non exigo ut excedas rei actæ modum. Nam nec historia debet egredi veritatem, et honeste factis veritas sufficit." One would have thought that Montaigne should, in justice to Pliny, have distinguished him from Cicero in this particular.

oblivion. But this exceeds all meanness of spirit in persons of such quality as they were to think to derive any glory from babbling and prating; even to the making use of their private letters to their friends, and so withal that, though some of them were never sent, the opportunity being lost, they nevertheless published them with this worthy excuse, that they were unwilling to lose their labour and have their lucubrations thrown away.[1] Was it not well becoming two consuls of Rome, sovereign magistrates of the republic that commanded the world, to spend their time in patching up elegant missives, in order to gain the reputation of being well versed in their own mother-tongue? What could a pitiful schoolmaster have done worse, who by it got his living? If the acts of Xenophon and Cæsar had not far transcended their eloquence, I don't believe they would ever have taken the pains to write them. They made it their business to recommend not their saying, but their doing. And could the perfection of eloquence have added any lustre proportionable to the merit of a great person, certainly Scipio and Lælius had never resigned the honour of their comedies, with all the luxuriances and delicacies of the Latin tongue, to an African slave; for that the work was theirs its beauty and excellency sufficiently prove: besides Terence himself confesses as much,[2] and I should take it ill in any one that would dispossess me of that belief.

Why Xenophon and Cæsar wrote their own histories.

'Tis an injurious mockery and impertinence to extol a man for qualities misbecoming his condition, though otherwise commendable in themselves, and for such as ought not to be his chief talent; as if a man should commend a king for being a good painter, a good architect, a good marksman, or a good runner at the ring. Commendations that add no honour unless in combination with, and in addition to, those that are befitting him, namely, justice and the knowledge how to govern his people both in peace and war. 'Tis in this way only that agriculture was an honour to Cyrus, and eloquence and the knowledge of letters to Charlemagne. I have, indeed, in my time, known some who, by a knack of writing, have got both title and fortune, yet disown their apprenticeship, purposely corrupt their style, and affect ignorance of so vulgar a quality (which also our nation observes to be rarely seen in very learned hands), carefully seeking a reputation by better qualities.

Qualities, which are not suitable to a man's rank in the world, cannot do him honour.

The companions of Demosthenes in the embassy to Philip, extolling that prince as handsome, eloquent, and a stout drinker, Demosthenes said, "That those were commendations more proper for a woman, an advocate, or a sponge, than for a king."[3]

Great men are not to be praised for common things.

> Imperet bellante prior, jacentem
> Lenis in hostem.[4]
>
> "First let his empire from his valour flow,
> And then from mercy on a prostrate foe."

'Tis not his profession to know either how to hunt or to dance well:

> Orabunt causas alii, cœlique meatus
> Describent radio, et fulgentia sidera dicent,
> Hic regere imperio populos sciat.[5]
>
> "Let others
> Plead better at the bar, describe the skies,
> And when the stars descend, and when they rise,
> But, Rome! 'tis thine alone, with awful sway,
> To rule mankind, and make the world obey."

Plutarch says, moreover, that to appear so excellent in these less necessary qualities is to produce witness against a man's self, that he has spent his time, and applied his study ill, which ought to have been employed in the acquisition of more necessary and more useful things. Thus, Philip, King of Macedon, having heard the great Alexander, his son, sing at a feast, to the wonder and envy of the best musicians there:—"Art thou not ashamed," said he to him, "to sing so well?"[6] And to the same Philip, a musician with whom he was disputing about something concerning his art, said, "Heaven forbid, sir, that so great a misfortune should ever befal you as to understand these things better than I."[7] A king should be able to answer, as Iphicrates did the orator, who pressed upon him in his invective after this manner: "And who art thou, that thou bravest it at this rate? Art thou a man-at-arms? Art thou an archer? Art thou a pikeman?" "I am none of all this, but I know how to command all these."[8] And Antisthenes took it for an argument of little valour in Ismenias that he was commended for playing excellently well upon a flute.[9] I know very well that when I hear any one insist upon the language of these Essays, I had rather a great deal he would say nothing. 'Tis not so much to elevate the style as to depress the sense, and so much the more offensively as they do it obliquely. I am much deceived if many other writers deliver more worth noting as to the matter; and, how well or ill soever, if any other writer has strewed

Great men should not excel in things not altogether necessary.

The merit of Montaigne's Essays.

[1] Montaigne is mistaken in supposing that the Letters of Cicero were written for the public. Cicero himself had only preserved seventy of them (ad Attic. xvi.); the rest were collected by Tiron. It is only necessary to read the letters of Atticus to be convinced that they were addressed to him alone. What Montaigne says applies only to Pliny the Younger.

them either with much more material, or thicker upon his paper, than myself. To bring the more in, I only put in the heads; were I to annex the sequels, I should vastly multiply this volume. And how many stories have I scattered up and down here that I only touch upon, which, should any one more curiously search into, they would find matter enough to produce infinite Essays. Neither these stories, nor my allegations, do always serve simply for example, authority, or ornament; I do not only regard them for the use I make of them; they carry sometimes, besides what I apply them to, the seed of a richer and a bolder matter, and sometimes, collaterally, a more delicate sound, both to me myself, who will say no more about it in this place, and to others who shall happen to be of my fancy.

But returning to the speaking virtue; I find no great choice betwixt not knowing to speak anything but ill, and not knowing any thing but speaking well. Non est ornamentum virile concinnitas.[1] "Neatness of style is no manly ornament." The sages tell us that, as to what concerns knowledge, there is nothing but philosophy; and to what concerns effects, nothing but virtue, that is generally proper to all degrees, and to all orders. There is something like this in these two other philosophers, for they also promise eternity to the letters they write to their friends; but 'tis after another manner, and by accommodating themselves for a good end, to the vanity of another; for they write to them, that if the concern of making themselves known to future ages, and the thirst of glory, do yet detain them in the management of public affairs, and make them fear the solitude and retirement to which they would persuade them; let them never trouble themselves more about it, forasmuch as they shall have credit enough with posterity to assure them that, were there nothing else but the very letters thus writ to them, those letters will render their names as known and famous as their own public actions themselves could do.[2] And besides this difference, these are not idle and empty letters, that contain nothing but a fine gingle of well-chosen words, and fine couched phrases, but replete and abounding with grave and learned discourses, by which a man may render himself not more eloquent, but more wise; and that instruct us not to speak, but to do well. Away with that eloquence that so enchants us with its harmony that we should more study it than things; unless you will affirm that of Cicero to be of so supreme a perfection as to form a complete body of itself. And of him I shall further add one story we read of him to this purpose, wherein his nature will much more manifestly be laid open to us. He was to make an oration in public, and found himself a little straitened in time, to fit his words to his mouth, as he had a mind to do; when Eros, one of his slaves, brought him word that the audience was deferred till the next day, at which he was so ravished with joy that he enfranchised him for the good news.[3]

Epicurus and Seneca set in opposition to Pliny and Cicero.

Upon this subject of letters, I will add, that it is a kind of writing wherein my friends think I can do something; and, I am willing to confess, I should rather have chosen to publish my whimsies that way than any other, had I had to whom to write; but I wanted such a settled correspondent as I once had, to attract me to it, to raise my fancy, and keep me to it. For to traffic with the wind, as some others have done, and to forge vain names to direct my letters to, in a serious subject, I could never do it but in a dream, being a sworn enemy to all manner of falsification. I should have been more diligent, and more confident, had I had a judicious and indulgent friend to whom to address, than thus to expose myself to various judgments of a whole people; and I am deceived if I had not succeeded better. I have naturally a comic and familiar style; but it is peculiar to myself, and not proper for public business, but, like the language I speak, too compact, irregular, abrupt, and singular. And as to letters of ceremony, that have no other substance than a fine contexture of courteous words, I am wholly to seek: I have no faculty nor relish for those tedious offers of service and affection; I don't much believe in them, and should not forgive myself, should I say more than I meant, which is very remote from the present practice; for there never was so abject and servile a prostitution of tenders of life, soul, of devotion, adoration, vassal, slave, and I know not what, as now; all which expressions are so common, and so indifferently used to and fro by every one, and to every one, that, when they would profess a greater and more respectful inclination upon more just occasions, they have not wherewithal to express it.

Montaigne's account of himself as a letter-writer.

I mortally hate all air of flattery, which is the cause that I naturally fall into a dry, rough, and crude way of speaking, which, to such as do not know me, may seem a little to smack of disdain. I honour those most to whom I show the least honour; and where my soul moves with the greatest cheerfulness, I easily forget the ceremonies of look and gesture; I offer

[1] Senec. Epist. cxv.

[2] When Epicurus wrote to Idomeneus, then the slave of rigid power, and who had great affairs in his hands, to persuade him from a gay life, to the pursuit of true and solid glory, "If," said he, "you are fond of glory, my epistles will make you more celebrated than all things that you admire, and for which you are admired." Seneca, (Epist. xxi.) who, in the same epistle, says to his friend, Lucilius, "The very thing which Epicurus could promise to his friend, I promise to you, Lucilius; I shall be in the favour of posterity: it is in my power to bring out names that shall be lasting."

myself faintly and bluntly to them whose I effectually am, tendering myself the least to him to whom I am the most devoted. Methinks they should read it in my heart, and that my expression would but injure the love I have conceived within. To welcome, take leave, give thanks, accost, offer service, and such verbal formalities as the laws of our modern civility enjoin, I know no man so stupidly unprovided of language as myself. And I have never been employed in writing letters of favour and recommendation but he in whose behalf it was did not think my mediation cold and imperfect. The Italians are great printers of letters. I do believe I have at least a hundred several volumes of them, of all which, those of Annibal Caro[1] seem to me to be the best.

If all the paper I have scribbled to the ladies at the time when my hand was really prompted by my passion were now in being, there might, peradventure, be found a page worthy to be communicated to our young inamoratos that are besotted that way. I always write my letters post-haste, and so precipitately that, though I write an intolerable bad hand,[2] I rather choose to do it myself than to employ another; for I can find none able to follow me, and I never transcribe. I have accustomed the great folks that know me to endure my blots and dashes, and paper without fold or margin. Those that cost me the most pains are the worst; when I once begin to draw them on, 'tis a sign my mind's not there. I fall to without premeditation or design, the first paragraph begets the second, and so to the end of the chapter. The letters of this age consist more in margin and prefaces than matter; whereas, just as I had rather write two letters than fold up one, and always assign that employment to another person, so, when the business of my letter is dispatched, I would, with all my heart, transfer it to another hand, to add those long harangues, offers, and prayers that we place at the bottom, and should be glad that some new custom would discharge us of that trouble altogether; as also superscribing them with a long ribble-row of qualities and titles, for fear of making mistakes in which I have several times omitted writing, and especially to men of the long robe and of finance. There are so many new offices, that 'tis hard to place so many titles of honour in their proper and due order, though, being so dearly bought, they are neither to be mistaken nor omitted without offence. I find the same fault likewise with loading the fronts and title-pages of the books we commit to the press with such a clutter of titles.

[1] The celebrated translator of the Æneid, born 1507, at Citta-Nuova, in the Marches of Ancona; died at Rome, 1566. The first part of his Letters appeared in 1572, and the second in 1574. They are reckoned among the models of Italian prose writing.

[2] Montaigne must not be believed altogether, when he talks of his bad hand-writing. I have seen the copy of his Essays, corrected by his own hand, from which Naigeon's edition was printed, and I can affirm that his hand-writing is very legible, straight, and, which is remarkable, exhibits but slight traces of the extreme vivacity of his character.—A. CHAPTER XL.

THAT THE RELISH OF GOOD AND EVIL IN A GREAT MEASURE DEPENDS UPON THE OPINION WE HAVE OF THEM.

Men (says an ancient Greek sentence[3]) are tormented with the opinions they have of things, and not by the things themselves. It would be a great victory obtained for the relief of our miserable human condition, could this proposition be established for certain and true throughout. For if evils have no admission into us but by the judgment we ourselves make of them, it should seem that it is then in our own power to despise them or to turn them to good. If things surrender themselves to our mercy, why do we not convert and accommodate them to our advantage? If what we call evil and torment is neither evil nor torment in itself, but only that our fancy gives it that quality, and makes it so, it lies in us to change and alter it; and it being in our own choice, if there be no constraint upon us, we must certainly be very strange fools to take arms for that side which is most offensive to us, and to give sickness, want, and contempt, a nauseous taste, if it be in our power to give them a more grateful relish, and if, fortune simply providing the matter, 'tis our business to give it its form.

What evil is and how it concerns us.

Now what we call evil is not so of itself, or at least that, be it what it may, it depends upon us to give it another taste or complexion (for all comes to one), let us examine how this can be maintained. If the original being of those things we fear had power to lodge itself in us by its own authority, it would then lodge itself alike and in like manner in all; for men are all of the same kind, and, saving in greater and less proportions, are all provided with the same utensils and instruments to conceive and to judge; but the diversity of opinions we have of those things does clearly evince that they only enter us by composition. One particular person, peradventure, admits them in their true being; but a thousand others give them a new and contrary being in them.

The different ideas of death.

We hold death, poverty, and grief, to be our principal enemies; now this death, which some repute the most dreadful of all dreadful things, who knows but that others call it the only secure harbour from the storms and tempests of life; the sovereign good of nature; the sole support of liberty; and the common and ready remedy for all evils? And, as the one expects it with fear and trembling, the others support

[3] Epictetus, Manual, c. 10.

it with greater ease than life. This fellow complains of its facility :—

> Mors, utinam pavidos vitæ subducere nolles,
> Sed virtus te sola daret ![1]
>
> "O death ! I wish thou wouldst the coward spare,
> That of thy gift the brave alone might share."

But let us leave this vaunting courage. Theodorus answered Lysimachus, who threatened to kill him, "Thou wilt do a brave feat," said he, "to arrive at the force of a cantharides."[2] The greatest portion of philosophers are observed to have either purposely anticipated, or hastened and assisted, their own death. How many ordinary people do we see led to execution, and that not to a simple death, but mixed with shame, and sometimes with grievous torments, who yet appear with such assurance, some through obstinacy, some from natural simplicity, that one can discover no change from their ordinary condition; settling their domestic affairs, commending themselves to their friends, singing, preaching, and talking with the people: nay, sometimes passing jokes to make the bystanders laugh, and drinking to their companions, just as well as Socrates. One that they were leading to the gallows, told them they must not carry him through such a street, lest a merchant that lived there should arrest him by the way for an old debt. Another told the hangman he must not touch his neck, for fear of making him laugh, he was so ticklish; another answered his confessor, who promised him that he should that day sup with our Lord, "Do you go then," said he, "in my room; for I for my part keep fast to-day." Another having called for drink, and the hangman having drunk first, said he would not drink after him, for fear of catching the pox. Everybody has heard the tale of the Picard, to whom, being upon the ladder, they presented a girl of the town, telling him (as our law does sometimes permit) that if he would marry her they would save his life; he having a while considered her, and perceiving that she halted, "Tie up, tie up," said he, "she limps." And they tell another story of the same kind, of a fellow in Denmark, who, being condemned to lose his head, and the like condition being proposed to him upon the scaffold, refused it, by reason the girl they offered him had hollow cheeks and too sharp a nose. A servant at Thonlouse being accused of heresy, for the sole ground of his belief referred himself to that of his master, a young student, prisoner with him, and chose rather to die than suffer himself to be persuaded that his master could err. We read of the inhabitants of Arras, when Louis the Eleventh took that city, that a great many let themselves be hanged, rather than they would say, "God save the king." And amongst that mean-souled race of men, the buffoons, there have been some who would not leave their fooling at the very moment of death. He that the hangman turned off the ladder cried, "Launch the galley," a slang saying of his; and another, who at the point of death was laid upon a pallet before the fire, the physician asking him where his pain lay, "Betwixt the bench and the fire," said he; and the priest, to give him extreme unction, groping for his feet, which his pain had made him pull up to him, "You will find them," said he, "at the end of my legs." To one that being present exhorted him to recommend himself to God, "Why? who's going there?" said he. And the other replying, "It will presently be yourself, if it be his good pleasure,"—"Would I were sure to be there by to-morrow night," said he. "Do but recommend yourself to him," said the other, "and you will soon be there." "I were best then," said he, "to carry my recommendations myself."

Merry jokes of some persons led to execution.

In the kingdom of Narsingua to this day the wives of their priests are buried alive with the bodies of their husbands; all other wives are burnt at their husbands' funerals, which they not only firmly, but cheerfully, undergo.[3] At the death of their king his wives and concubines, his favourites, all his officers and domestic servants, who make up a great number of people, present themselves so cheerfully to the fire where his body is burnt that they seem to take it for a singular honour to accompany their master in death. During our late war of Milan, where there happened so many takings and retakings of towns, the people, impatient of so many various changes of fortune, took such a resolution to die that I have heard my father say he there saw a list taken of five and twenty masters of families that made themselves away in one week's time. A misfortune somewhat resembling that of the Zanthians, who being besieged by Brutus precipitated themselves, men, women, and children, into such a furious appetite of dying that nothing can be done to evade death which these did not put in practice to avoid life; insomuch that Brutus with all his endeavours could save but a very small number.[4]

Women that bury or burn themselves alive with the dead bodies of their husbands.

Death fondly coveted.

Even opinion is of force enough to make itself to be espoused at the expense of life. The first article of that valiant oath that Greece took and observed, in the Median war, was that every one should sooner exchange life for death than their own laws for those of Persia.[1] What a world of people do we see, in the wars betwixt the Turks and the Greeks, rather embrace a cruel death than to uncircumcise themselves to admit of baptism! An example of which no sort of religion is incapable. The Kings of Castile having banished the Jews out of their dominions, John, King of Portugal, in consideration of eight crowns a-head, sold them a retirement into his for a certain limited time, he undertaking to furnish them with shipping to transport them into Africa. The limited day being come, which, once lapsed, they were given to understand that such as were afterwards found in the kingdom should remain slaves, vessels were very slenderly provided, and those who embarked in them were rudely and villanously used by the seamen, who, besides other indignities, kept them cruising upon the sea, one while forwards, and another backwards, till they had consumed all their provisions, and were constrained to buy of them at so dear a rate, and for so long a time, that they set them not on shore till they were all stripped to their very shirts. The news of this inhuman usage being brought to those who remained behind, the greater part of them resolved upon slavery, and some made a shew of changing their religion. Emanuel, the successor of John, being come to the crown, first set them at liberty; and afterwards, altering his mind, ordered them to depart his country, assigning three ports for their departure;—hoping (says the Bishop Osorius, no contemptible Latin historian of these latter times,) that the favour of the liberty he had given them having failed of converting them to Christianity, yet the aversion to commit themselves to the outrages of the mariners, and to abandon a country they were now habituated to, and were grown very rich in, to go and expose themselves in strange and unknown regions, would certainly do it. But, finding himself deceived in his expectation, and that they were all resolved upon the voyage, he cut off two of the ports he had promised them, to the end that the length and incommodity of the passage might reduce some; or that he might have opportunity, by crowding them all into one place, the more conveniently to execute what he had designed; which was to force all the children under fourteen years of age from the arms of their fathers and mothers, to transport them from their sight and conversation into a place where they might be instructed and brought up in our religion.[2] He says that this produced a most horrid spectacle: the natural affections betwixt the parents and their children, and, above all, their zeal to their ancient belief, contending against this violent decree, fathers and mothers were commonly seen making themselves away, and, by a still sadder and sterner example, precipitating, out of love and compassion, their young children into wells, to avoid the severity of this law. As to the remainder of them, the time that had been prefixed being expired, for want of means to transport them, they again returned into slavery. Some turned Christians, upon whose faith, or rather that of their posterity, even to this day, which is a hundred years after, few Portuguese rely, or believe them to be real converts: though custom, and length of time, are much more powerful counsellors in such changes than any constraint whatever. In the town of Castlenau-Darry, fifty heretics, Albigenses, at one time suffered themselves to be burnt alive in one fire, rather than they would renounce their opinions. Quoties non modò ductores nostri (says Cicero), sed universi etiam exercitus, ad non dubiam mortem concurrerunt?[3] "How oft have not only our leaders, but whole armies, run to certain death!" I have seen an intimate friend of mine, with a real affection that was rooted in his heart by divers plausible arguments, which I could never dispossess him of, ardently seek death, and, upon the first honourable occasion that offered itself, precipitate himself into it; and that, too, without any manner of visible reason, with an obstinate and ardent desire of dying. We have several examples in our own times of those, even among little children, who, for fear of a whipping, or some such little thing, have dispatched themselves. And what shall we not fear (says one of the ancients), if we dread that which cowardice itself has chosen for its refuge?[4]

Cruel treatment of Jews by the King of Castile.

Jews that out of zeal for their religion killed themselves and children.

Albigenses heretics chose rather to be burnt than recant their opinions.

To produce here a catalogue of those of all sexes, and conditions, and sects, even in the most happy ages, who have either with great constancy looked death in the face, or voluntarily sought it; and sought it not only to avoid the evils of this life, but some purely to avoid the satiety of living, and others, for the hope of a better condition elsewhere; I should never

[2] Mariana, the celebrated Jesuit, says, in his history of Spain, tom. ii. xxvi. 13, that, by an edict of this prince, those children were baptised by force: a cruel edict, says the good Jesuit, altogether contrary to the Christian laws and institutes. What! he adds, shall violence be used to force men to embrace Christianity, and, in the most important affair of the world, to rob those whom God has been pleased to leave to their own discretion, of that heavenly present, LIBERTY! To proceed so far is a horrible crime, as well as to force children with this view from the arms of their parents. The Portuguese nation, however, committed sin in these two points, having dragged the children to baptism by force, and without the consent of their parents, and having engaged those more advanced in years to make profession of Christianity, by loading them with reproaches and injuries, and especially by fraudulently depriving them of the means of retiring elsewhere, which they had expressly obliged themselves to grant them.

have done. Nay, the number is so infinite that in truth I should have a better bargain on't to reckon up those who have feared it. This one, therefore, shall serve for all. Pyrrho, the philosopher, being one day in a boat, in a very great tempest, shewed to those he saw the most affrighted about him, and encouraged them by the example of, a hog that was there, nothing at all concerned at the storm.[1] Shall we then dare to say that this advantage of reason, of which we so much boast, and upon the account of which we think ourselves masters and emperors over all other creatures, was given us for a torment? To what end serves the knowledge of things, if it renders us more unmanly; if, with it, we lose the tranquillity and repose we should enjoy without it, and if it puts us into a worse condition than Pyrrho's hog? Shall we employ the understanding that was conferred upon us for our greatest good to our own ruin; setting ourselves against the design of nature, and the universal order of things, which intend that every one should make use of the faculties, members, and means he has, to his own best advantage? But it may peradventure be objected against me:—Your rule is true enough as to what concerns death; but what will you say of indigence? What will you say of pain, which Aristippus, Hieronymus, and almost all the wise men, have reputed the worst of evils? And those who have denied it by word of mouth have confessed it in effects. Possidonius being extremely tormented with a sharp and painful disease, Pompeius came to visit him, excusing himself that he had taken so unseasonable a time to come to hear him discourse of philosophy: "The gods forbid," said Possidonius, "that pain should ever have the power to hinder me from talking of it;" and thereupon fell immediately upon a discourse of the contempt of pain. But, in the mean time, pain was playing its part, and plagued him incessantly; on which he cried out, "Do thy worst, pain, thou shalt never make me say thou art an evil."[2] This story, that they make such a clutter about, what is there in it of the contempt of pain? It only fights it with words, and, in the mean time, if its shootings did not move him, why did he let it interrupt his discourse? Why did he fancy he did so great a thing in refusing to call it an evil? All does not here consist in the imagination; our fancies may work upon other things. But this is a certain knowledge that is playing its part, and of which our senses themselves are judges.

To what use the knowledge of things should be applied.

Qui nisi sunt veri, ratio quoque falsa sit omnis.[3]

"Which, if not true, even reason itself must be false."

Shall we persuade our skins that the lashes of a whip tickle us? Or our palates, that a potion of aloes is vin de Grave? Pyrrho's hog is here in the same predicament with us; he is not afraid of death, 'tis true, but, if you beat him, he will cry out to some purpose. Shall we force the general law of nature, which in every living creature under heaven is seen to tremble under pain? The very trees seem to groan under the blows they receive. Death is only felt by reason, forasmuch as it is but the movement of an instant:

Aut fuit, aut veniet; nihil est præsentis in illa,
Morsque minus pœnæ, quam mora mortis, habet.[4]

"Still past or future, here no present tense
Submits the fleeting object to our sense;
Death cuts so quick the thread of life in twain,
The thought is far more dreadful than the pain."

A thousand beasts, a thousand men, are dead ere they are threatened. That also which we principally pretend to fear in death is pain, the ordinary forerunner of it; yet, if we may believe a holy father, Malam mortem non facit, nisi quod sequitur mortem.[5] "Nothing makes death evil but what follows it." And I should say, yet more probably, that neither that which goes before, nor that which follows after, are at all the appurtenances of death. We excuse ourselves falsely, and I find, by experience, that it is rather our impatience at the imagination of death that makes us impatient of pain; and that we find it doubly grievous, as it threatens us with death. But reason, accusing our cowardice for fearing a thing so sudden, so unavoidable, and so insensible, we take the other as the more excusable pretext. All ills that carry no other danger along with them, but simply the evils themselves, we despise as things of no danger. The tooth-ache, or the gout, painful as they are, being yet not reputed mortal, who reckons them in the catalogue of diseases?

Now let us suppose that in death we principally regard the pain; so, also, there is nothing to be feared in poverty but the miseries it brings along with it, thirst, hunger, cold, heat, watching, and the other inconveniences it makes us suffer; here, still, we have nothing to do but with pain. I will grant, and very willingly, that it is the worst misfortune of our being; (for I am the man upon earth that the most hates and avoids it, considering that hitherto, I thank God, I have had so little to do with it,) but still, it lies in us, if not to annihilate, at least to lessen it by patience; and, though the body should mutiny, to maintain the soul and reason, nevertheless, in good temper. And were it not so, who would ever have given any reputation to virtue,

Pain, the worst accident of our being, how it may be mitigated.

valour, strength, magnanimity, and resolution? Where were their parts to be played, if there were no pain to be defied? Avida est periculi virtus.[1] "Virtue is greedy of danger." Were there no lying upon the ground, no enduring, armed at all points, the meridian heat, no feeding upon the flesh of horses and asses, no seeing ourselves hacked and hewed to pieces, no having a bullet pulled out from amongst the shattered bones, no stitching up, cauterizing, and searching of wounds, by what means were the advantage we covet to have over the vulgar to be acquired? 'Tis very far from flying evil and pain, what the sages say, that of actions equally good, a man should most covet to perform that wherein there is greatest labour and pain. Non enim hilaritate, nec lascivià, nec risu, aut joco comite levitatis, sed sæpè etiam tristes firmitate et constantiâ sunt beati.[2] "For men are not always happy by mirth and wantonness, nor by laughter and jesting, the companions of levity, but very often the graver and more melancholy sort of men reap felicity from their steadiness and constancy." And for this reason it ever was impossible to persuade our forefathers but that the victories obtained by dint of force, and the hazard of war, were still more honourable than those gained in security, by stratagem or wiles.

Lætius est, quoties magno sibi constat honestum.[3]

"A noble act more noble does appear
By how much more it costs the doer dear."

Besides, this ought to be our comfort, that naturally, Si gravis, brevis: si longus, levis.[4] "If the pain be violent, 'tis short; and if long, not violent." Thou wilt not feel it long, if thou feelest it much, it will either put an end to itself, or to thee, which comes to the same thing; if thou canst not support it, it will export thee. Memineris maximos morte finiri; parvos multa habere intervalla requietis: mediocrium nos esse dominos: Ut si tolerabiles sint, feramus; sin minùs, è vita, quum ea non placeat, tanquam è theatro, exeamus.[5] "Remember that great pains are terminated by death, that small ones have many intermissions of repose, and that we are masters of the moderate sort: so that, if tolerable, we may bear them, if not, we can go out of life as from a theatre, where the entertainment does not please us." That which makes us suffer pain with so much impatience is the not being accustomed to repose our chiefest contentment in the soul, that we do not enough rely upon her who is the sole and sovereign mistress of our condition. The body, saving in greater or less proportion, has but one and the same bent and bias; whereas, the soul is variable into all sorts of forms, and subjects to herself, and to her own empire, all things whatsoever; both the senses of the body, and all other accidents. And therefore it is that we ought to study her, to enquire into her, and to rouse up all her powerful faculties. There is neither reason, form, nor prescription, that can anything prevail against her inclination and choice. Of so many thousands of biasses that she has at her disposal, let us give her one proper to our repose and conversation, and then we shall not only be sheltered and secured from all manner of injury and offence, but moreover gratified and obliged, if she will it, with evils and offences. She makes her profit indifferently of all things. Error and dreams serve her to good use, as lawful matter, to lodge us in safety and contentment. 'Tis plain enough to be seen that 'tis the sharpness of our mind that gives the edge to our pains and pleasures. Beasts, that have no such things, leave to their bodies their own free and natural sentiments, and are consequently, in every kind, very near the same, as appears by the resembling application of their motions. If we should not disturb, in our members, the jurisdiction that appertains to them in this, 'tis to be believed it would be the better for us, and that nature has given them a just and moderate temper, both to pleasure and pain; neither can it fail of being just, being equal and common. But seeing we have enfranchised ourselves from her rules, to give ourselves up to the rambling liberty of our own fancies, let us, at least, help to incline them to the most agreeable side. Plato[6] fears our too vehemently engaging ourselves with grief and pleasure, forasmuch as these too much knit and ally the soul to the body: whereas I rather, on the contrary, by reason it too much separates and disunites them. As an enemy is made more fierce by our flight, so pain grows proud to see us truckle under her. She will surrender upon much better terms to them who make head against her: a man must oppose, and stoutly set himself against her. In retiring and giving ground, we invite, and pull upon ourselves, the ruin that threatens us. As the body is more firm in an encounter, the more stiffly and obstinately it applies itself to it; so it is with the soul. But let us come to examples, which are the proper commodity for fellows of such feeble reins as myself; where we shall find that it is with pain, as with stones, that receive a brighter or duller lustre, according to the foil they are set upon, that it has no more room in us than we are pleased to allow it: Tantùm doluerunt, quantùm doloribus se inseruerunt.[7] "The more they gave way to pain, the more it pained them." We are more sensible of one little touch of a surgeon's lancet than of twenty sword-cuts in the heat of fight.

The pains of child-bearing supported with ease.

The pains of child-bearing, said by the physician, and even by God himself,[8] to be very great, and which our women keep so great a clutter about, there are whole nations that make nothing of them. To say nothing of the Lacedæmonian women, what alteration can you see in the Swiss wives of our foot soldiers, saving, as they trot after their husbands, you see them to-day with the child hanging at their backs that they carried yesterday in their bellies? And the counterfeit gypsies we have amongst us, go themselves to wash their infants as soon as they come into the world, in the first river they meet. Besides the many wenches that daily steal their children out of their womb, as before they stole them in; that fair and noble wife of Sabinus, a patrician of Rome, for another's interest alone, without help, without crying out, or so much as a groan, endured the bearing of twins.[1] A poor simple boy of Lacedæmon, having stolen a fox (for they more feared the shame of bungling in a theft, than we do the punishment of our knavery), and having got him under his coat, chose rather to endure the beast's tearing out his bowels than he would discover his theft.[2] And another, offering incense at a sacrifice, suffered himself to be burnt to the bone by a coal that fell into his sleeve, rather than disturb the ceremony.[3] And there have been a great number who, only for a trial of virtue, following their institutions, have at seven years old endured to be whipped to death, without changing their countenance. And Cicero has seen them fight in parties, with fists, feet, and teeth, till they have fainted and sunk down, rather than confess themselves overcome. Nunquam naturam mos vinceret; est enim ea semper invicta: sed nos umbris, deliciis, otio, languore, desidiâ, animum infecimus; opinionibus maloque more delinitum mollivimus.[4] "Custom would never conquer Nature, for she is ever invincible, but we have infected the mind with shadows, delights, wantonness, negligence and sloth; and with vain opinions, and corrupt manners, rendered it effeminate and mean." Every one knows the story of Scævola, who, having slipped into the enemies' camp to kill their general, and missing his blow, to repair his fault by a more strange invention, and to deliver his country, boldly confessed to Porsenna (who was the king he had an intent to kill,) not only his design, but moreover added that there were then in his camp a great number of Romans, his accomplices in the enterprise, as good men as he, and, to show what he himself was, having caused a pan of burning coals to be brought, he saw and endured his arm to broil and roast, till the king himself, conceiving horror at the sight, commanded the pan to be taken away.[5] What would you say of him that would not vouchsafe to respite his reading of a book, whilst he was under incision?[6] And of the other that persisted to mock and laugh, in contempt of the pains inflicted upon him; so that the irritated cruelty of the executioners that had him in handling, and all the inventions of tortures redoubled upon him, one after another, spent in vain, only added to his triumph?[7] A gladiator of Cæsar's endured, laughing all the while, his wounds to be probed and laid open. Quis mediocris gladiator ingemuit? Quis vultum mutavit unquam? Quis non modò stetit, verùm etiam decubuit, turpiter? Quis, cum decubuisset, ferrum recipere jussus, collum contraxit?[8] "What common gladiator ever so much as gave a groan? Which of them ever so much as changed his countenance? Which of them, standing or falling, did either with shame? Which of them, when he was down, and commanded to receive the stroke of the sword, ever shrunk in his neck?" Let us bring in the women, too. Who has not heard, at Paris, of her who caused her face to be flea'd, merely for the sake of getting the fresher complexion of a new skin? There are some who have drawn good and sound teeth to make their voices more soft and sweet, or to range the rest in better order. How many examples of the contempt of pain have we in that sex? What can they not do? What do they fear to do, for never so little hopes of an addition to their beauty?

> Vellere queis cura est albos à stirpe capillos,
> Et faciem, dempta pelle, referre novam.[9]
>
> "Who by the roots pluck their grey hairs, and try
> With a new skin an old face to supply."

I have seen some of them swallow sand, ashes, and do their utmost to destroy their stomachs, to get pale complexions. To make a fine Spanish, slender waist, what racks will they not endure in tightening and bracing, till they have notches in their sides, cut to the quick, aye, sometimes to death? It is an ordinary thing with several nations at this day to wound themselves in good earnest, to gain credit to what they profess; of which our king relates notable examples of what he has seen in Poland and had done towards himself.[10] But besides this, which I know to have been imitated by some in France, when I came from that famous Assembly of the Estates at Blois, I had a little before seen a girl in Picardy who, to manifest the sincerity of her promises, and also her constancy, gave herself, with a bodkin she wore in her hair, four or five good stabs in the arm, till the blood gushed out to some purpose

10 M. de Thou says expressly that Henry III. ran away privately from Poland, to return to his kingdom of France.

Turks make on themselves great scars in honour of their mistresses, and, to the end they may the longer remain, they presently clap fire to the wound, where they hold it an incredible time, to stop the wound and form the cicatrice. People that have been eye-witnesses of it have both writ and sworn it to me. But for ten aspers[1] there are there every day fellows to be found that will give themselves a good deep slash in the arms or thighs. I am willing, however, to have the testimonies nearest to us, where we have most to do with them, for Christendom furnishes us enough. And, after the example of our blessed Guide, there have been many who from devotion would bear the cross. We learn by testimony, very worthy of belief, that King St. Louis wore a hair shirt, till in his old age his confessor gave him a dispensation to leave it off; and that every Friday he caused his shoulders to be drubbed by his priest with five small chains of iron, which were always carried about amongst his night accoutrements for that purpose. William, our late Duke of Guienne, the father of that Eleanor who transmitted this duchy into the houses of France and England, continually, for ten or twelve years before he died, wore a suit of armour under a religious habit, by way of penance. Fulk, Count of Anjou, went as far as Jerusalem, to cause himself to be whipped there by two of his servants, with a rope about his neck, before the sepulchre of our Lord. But do we not, moreover, every Good Friday, in several places, see great numbers of men and women beat and whip themselves till they lacerate and cut the flesh to the very bones? I have often seen this, and without any enchantment in the matter; and it was said there were some amongst them (for they go disguised), who for money undertook by this means to save harmless the religion of others; showing herein a contempt of pain so much the greater, as the incentives of devotion are more effectual than those of avarice. Q. Maximus buried his son when he was a consul, and M. Cato his when prætor elect; and L. Paulus both his, within a few days one after the other, with such countenances as expressed no manner of grief. I said once merrily of a certain person that he had disappointed the divine justice: for the violent death of three grown-up children of his being one day sent him for a severe scourge, as it is to be supposed, he was so far from being afflicted that he rather took it for a particular grace and favour of heaven. I do not follow these monstrous humours, though I lost two or three at nurse, if not without grief, at least [illegible] repining; and yet there is hardly any [illegible] that pierces nearer to the quick. I [illegible] other occasions of sorrow [illegible] to me, I should hardly feel; and have despised some, when they have befallen me, to which the world has given so terrible a figure that I should blush to boast to people of my firmness therein. Ex quo intelligitur, non in naturâ, sed in opinione, esse ægritudinem.[2] "By which it is understood that the grievance is not in nature, but opinion." Opinion is a powerful body, bold and without measure. Who ever so greedily hunted after security and repose as Alexander and Cæsar did after disquiet and difficulties? Terez, the father of Sitalces, was wont to say that when he had no war in hand he fancied there was no difference betwixt him and his groom.[3] Cato, when consul, to secure some cities of Spain from revolt, merely interdicting the inhabitants from wearing arms, a great many killed themselves. Ferox gens nullam vitam rati sine armis esse.[4] "A fierce people, who thought there was no life without war." How many do we know who have forsaken the calm and sweetness of a quiet life, at home amongst their acquaintance, to seek out the horror of uninhabitable deserts; and, having precipitated themselves into so abject a condition as to become the scorn and contempt of the world, have hugged themselves with the conceit, even to affectation. Cardinal Borromeo,[5] who died lately at Milan, in the midst of all the jollity that the air of Italy, his youth, birth, and great riches invited him to, kept himself in so austere a way of living that the same robe he wore in summer served him for winter too: he had only straw for his bed, and his hours of vacation from the affairs of his charge he continually spent in study upon his knees, having a little bread and water set by his book, which was all the provision for his repast, and all the time he spent in eating. I know some who consentingly have acquired both profit and advancement from their own cuckoldom, of which the bare name affrights so many people.

If the sight be not the most necessary of all our senses, 'tis at least the most pleasant. But, at once, the most pleasant and the most useful of all our members seem to be those of generation; and yet a great many people have conceived a mortal hatred against them only for this, that they were too delightful; and have deprived themselves of them only for their value. As much thought he of his eyes that put them out. The generality and most solid sort of men look upon abundance of children as a great blessing; I, and some others, think it as great a benefit to be without them. And when you ask Thales why he does not marry, he tells you because he has no mind to leave any posterity behind him.[6]

That our opinion gives the value to things is very manifest in the great number of those which we do not so much regard for themselves, but on our own account; never considering either their virtues or their use, but only how dear they cost us, as though that were a part of their substance, and reputing for value in them, not what they bring to us, but what we add to them. By which I understand that we are great managers of our expense. As it weighs, it serves for so much as it weighs; our opinion will never suffer it to want of its value. The price gives value to the diamond, difficulty to virtue, suffering to devotion, and griping to physic. One man,[1] to be poor, threw his money into the same sea which so many others, in all parts of the world, rummage and rifle for riches. Epicurus says that to be rich is no advantage, but only an alteration of affairs.[2] In plain truth it is not want, but rather abundance, that creates avarice. Let me give my own experience in this matter.

Montaigne's account of three conditions in which he had lived.

I have, since my childhood, lived in three sorts of conditions: the first, which continued for nearly twenty years, I passed over without any other means but what were accidental, and depending upon the allowance and assistance of others, without stint, but without certain revenue. I then spent my money so much the more cheerfully, and with so much the less care how it went, as it wholly depended upon my confidence in fortune; and I never lived more at my ease. I never found the purse of any of my friends shut against me, having enjoined myself this necessity above all other necessities whatever, by no means to fail of payment at the appointed time: which they have a thousand times respited, seeing how anxious I was to satisfy them; so that I made my good faith both a matter of thrift, and, withal, a kind of allurement. I naturally feel a kind of pleasure in paying, as if I eased my shoulders of a troublesome weight and an image of slavery; besides that, I have a great satisfaction in pleasing another and doing a just action. I except that kind of payment where reckoning and round-about settlements are required; and in such cases where I can meet with nobody to ease me of that hateful torment, I avoid them, how scandalously and injuriously soever, all I possibly can, for fear of any altercation, for which both my humour and way of speaking are so totally unfit. There is nothing I hate so much as driving a bargain; 'tis a mere traffic of cozenage and impudence; where, after an hour's cheapening and dodging, both parties abandon their word and oath for five halfpence advance or abatement. And yet I always borrowed at great disadvantage, for, wanting the confidence to speak to the person myself, I committed my request to the persuasion of a letter, which usually is no very successful advocate, and gives very great opportunity to him who has a mind to deny. I, in those days, more jocundly and freely referred the conduct of my affairs to the stars than I have since done to my own providence and judgment. Most good managers look upon it as a horrible thing to live always thus in uncertainty; not considering, in the first place, that the greatest part of the world live so, and how many worthy men have wholly slighted and abandoned the certainty of their own estates, and still daily do it, to trust to the inconstant favour of princes and fortune. Cæsar ran in debt above a million of gold more than he was worth, to become Cæsar; and how many merchants have begun their traffic by the sale of their farms, which they sent to the Indies?

Tot per impotentia freta?[3]

"Over so many stormy seas."

In so great a dearth of devotion as we see in these days, we have a thousand and a thousand convents, that go on comfortably enough, expecting every day their dinner from the liberality of heaven. Secondly, they do not take notice that this certitude, upon which they so much rely, is not much less uncertain and hazardous than hazard itself. I see misery as near, beyond two thousand crowns a-year, as if it stood close by me; for, besides that it is in the power of chance to make a hundred breaches to poverty through the greatest strength of our riches, there being very often no mean betwixt the highest and the lowest fortune,

Fortuna vitrea est: Tum, quum splendet, frangitur;[4]

"Fortune is glass, the brighter it doth shine
More frail; and soonest broken when most fine;"

and to turn all our barricades and bulwarks topsy-turvy, I find that, by divers causes, indigence is as frequently seen to inhabit with those who have property as with those that have none; and, peradventure, it is then far less grievous, when alone, than when accompanied with riches; which flow more from good management than income. Faber est suæ quisque fortunæ.[5] "Every one is the maker of his own fortune;" and an uneasy, necessitous, busy man, seems to me more miserable than he that is simply poor. In divitiis inopes, quod genus egestatis gravissimum est. "Poor in the midst of riches, which is the most insupportable kind of poverty."[6] The greatest and most wealthy princes are by poverty and want driven to the most extreme necessity: for can there be any more extreme than to become tyrants and unjust usurpers of their subjects' goods and estates?

My second condition of life was to have money of my own: wherein I so ordered the matter that I had soon laid up a notable sum out of so mean a fortune; considering with myself that that only was to be reputed having which a man reserved from his ordinary expense, than a man could not absolutely rely upon revenue to be received, how clear soever his estate might be. For what, said I, if I should be surprised by such or such an accident; and, after such like vain and vicious imaginations, would very learnedly, by this hoarding of money, provide against all inconveniences; and could moreover answer such as objected to me that the number of them was too infinite, that if I could not lay up for all, I could do it at least for some and for many. Yet was not this done without a great deal of solicitude and anxiety of mind. I kept it very close, and, though I dare talk so boldly of myself, never spoke of my money but falsely, as others do who, being rich, pretend to be poor, and being poor, pretend to be rich, dispensing their consciences from ever telling sincerely what they have. A ridiculous and shameful prudence. Was I going a journey? methought I was never enough provided; and the more I loaded myself with money, the more also was I loaded with fear, one while of the danger of the roads, another of the fidelity of him who had the charge of my baggage, of whom, as of some others that I know, I never felt secure, if I had him not always in my eye. Did I leave my box behind me—what suspicions and anxiety of mind did I enter into? and, which was worse, without daring to acquaint any body with it. My mind was eternally taken up with such things, so that, all considered, there is more trouble in keeping money than in getting it. And if I did not altogether so much as I say, or was not effectually so scandalously solicitous of my money as I have made myself out, yet it cost me something at least to govern myself from being so. I reaped little or no advantage by what I had, and my expenses seemed nothing less to me for having the more to spend; for, as Bion said, "hairy men are as angry as the bald to be pulled;"[1] and after you are once accustomed to it, and have once set your heart upon your heap, it is no more at your service; you cannot find in your heart to break it: 'tis a building that you fancy must of necessity all tumble down in ruins, if you stir but the least pebble. Necessity must first take you by the throat, before you can prevail upon yourself to touch it; and I would have pawned any thing I had, or sold a horse, with much less constraint upon myself than have made the least breach in that beloved purse I had laid by. But the danger was that a man cannot easily prescribe certain limits to this desire (they are hard to find in things that a man conceives to be good), and to stint economy so that it may not degenerate into avarice. Men are still intent upon adding to the heap, and increasing the stock from sum to sum till at last they vilely deprive themselves of the enjoyment of their own proper goods, deriving their whole gratification from hoarding their treasures, without making any use of them at all. According to this rule, they are the richest people in the world who have charge of the gates and walls of a wealthy city. All monied men I take to be covetous. Plato places corporal or human riches in this order: health, beauty, strength, wealth; and wealth, says he, is not blind, but very clear-sighted when illuminated by prudence.[2] Dionysius the son[3] did a very sensible thing upon this subject. He was informed that one of the Syracusans had hid a treasure in the earth, and thereupon sent to the man to bring it to him, which he accordingly did, privately reserving a small part of it only to himself, with which he went to another city, where, being cured of his appetite of hoarding, he began to live at a more liberal rate; which Dionysius hearing, caused the rest of his treasure to be restored to him, saying that, since he had learnt how to use it, he very willingly returned it back to him.

How Montaigne regulated his expenses.

I continued some years in this hoarding humour, when I know not what good genius fortunately put me out of it, as he did the Syracusan, and made me throw abroad all my reserve. The pleasure of a certain voyage I took at very great expense[4] having made me spurn this absurd fancy under foot, by which means I am now fallen into a third way of living (I speak what I think of it), doubtless much more pleasant and better regulated, which is that my expenses run level with my revenue; sometimes, indeed, the one, sometimes the other, may perhaps exceed, but 'tis very little that they differ at all. I live from hand to mouth, and content myself in having sufficient for my present and ordinary expense; for as to extraordinary occasions, all the laying up in the world would never suffice; and 'tis the greatest folly imaginable to expect that fortune should ever sufficiently arm us against herself. 'Tis with our own arms that we are to fight her, accidental ones will betray us in the pinch of the business. If I lay up, 'tis for some near and designed expense, and not to purchase lands, of which I have no need, but to purchase pleasure. Non esse cupidum pecunia est; non esse emacem, vectigal est.[5] "Not to be covetous is money; not to be a purchaser is a revenue." I neither am in any great apprehension of wanting, nor in any desire of getting more: Divitiarum fructus est in copiâ; copiam declarat satietas.[6] "The fruits of riches lie in abundance; satiety declares abundance." And I am very well pleased with myself, that this reformation in me has fallen out in an age naturally inclined to avarice, and that I see myself freed of a folly so common to old men, and the most ridiculous of all human follies.

A fine instance of the contempt of riches.

Feraulez, a man who had run through both fortunes, and found that the increase of substance was no increase of appetite, either to eating or drinking, sleeping, or the enjoyment of his wife; and who, on the other hand, felt the care of his economy lie heavy upon his shoulders, as it does on mine; was resolved to please a poor young man, his faithful friend, who panted after riches, by making him a gift of all his, which were excessively great, and moreover of all he was in the daily way of getting by the liberality of Cyrus, his good master, and by war; conditionally that he should take care handsomely to maintain and to entertain him as his guest and friend, and they afterwards lived very happily together, both of them equally content with the change of their condition.[1]

Another instance to the same purpose.

An example that I could imitate with all my heart, and I very much approve the fortune of an ancient prelate, whom I see to have so absolutely stripped himself of his purse, his revenue, and expenditure, committing them one while to one trusty servant, and another while to another, that he has spun out a long succession of years, as ignorant by this means of his domestic affairs as a mere stranger. The confidence in another man's virtue is no light evidence of a man's own, and God is pleased to favour such a confidence. As to him of whom I am speaking, I see nowhere a better governed family, nor a house more nobly and uniformly maintained than his; happy in this, to have regulated his affairs to so just a proportion that his estate is sufficient to do it without his care or trouble, and without any hindrance, either in the spending or laying it up, to other more suitable and quiet employments, and more to his liking.

What renders a man contented or indigent.

Plenty then and indigence depend upon the opinion every one has of them; and riches, no more than glory or health, have no more either beauty or pleasure than he is pleased to invest them with by whom they are possessed. Every one is well or ill at ease, according as he finds himself: not he whom the world believes, but he who believes himself to be so, is content; and therein alone belief gives itself being and reality. Fortune does us neither good nor hurt; she only presents us the matter and the seed, which our soul, more powerfully than she, turns and applies as she best pleases, being the sole cause and sovereign mistress of her own happy or unhappy condition. All external accessions receive taste and colour from the internal constitution, as clothes warm us not with their heat, but our own, which they are adapted to cover and keep in; and who would cover a cold body would do the same service for the cold, for so snow and ice are preserved. And after the same manner that study is a torment to a sluggard, abstinence from wine to a drunkard, frugality to the spendthrift, and exercise to a lazy, tender-bred fellow, so it is of all the rest. The things are not so painful and difficult of themselves, but our weakness or cowardice makes them so.[2] To judge of great and high matters requires a suitable soul, otherwise we attribute the vice to them which is really our own. A straight oar seems crooked in the water: it does not only import that we see a thing, but how and after what manner we see it.

The notion of pain, on what it is founded.

But after all this, why amongst so many discourses, that by so many arguments persuade men to despise death and endure pain, can we not find out one that makes for us? And of so many sorts of imaginations as have prevailed upon others, why does not every one apply some one to himself, the most suitable to his own humour? If he cannot digest a strong working drug to eradicate the evil, let him at least take a lenitive to ease it. Opinio est quædam effeminata ac levis, nec in dolore magis quam eadem in voluptate: qua quum liquescimus, fluimusque mollitia, apis aculeum sine clamore ferre non possumus. . . . Totum in eo est ut tibi imperes!"[3] "There is a certain frivolous and effeminate opinion, and that not more in pain than it is even in pleasure itself, by which, whilst we wallow in ease and wantonness, we cannot endure so much as the sting of a bee without crying out. The whole secret is this, to command thyself." For the rest, a man does not escape philosophy by permitting the acrimony of pains and human frailty to prevail beyond measure; for they constrain it to these invincible replies: "If it be ill to live in necessity, at least there is no necessity to live in necessity."[4] "No man continues in discomfort long, but by his own fault." He who has neither the courage to die, nor the heart to live, who will neither resist nor fly, what should one do with him?

CHAPTER XLI.

NOT TO COMMUNICATE A MAN'S HONOUR OR GLORY.

The vanity of a passion for honour.

Of all the foolish dreams of the world, that which is most universally received is the solicitude of reputation and glory, which we are fond of to that degree as to abandon riches, peace, life, and health, which are effectual and substantial good, to pursue this vain phantom and empty word, that has neither body nor hold to be taken of it.

> La fama, ch' invaghisce a un dolce suono
> Gli superbi mortali, et par si bella,
> E un eco, un sogno, anzi del sogno un ombra
> Ch' ad ogni vento si dilegua et sgombra.[1]
>
> "Glory, whose sweet and captivating sound
> Enchants proud mortals all the world around,
> Is but an echo, dream, or phantom fair,
> Mov'd and dispers'd by ev'ry breath of air."

And of all the irrational humours of men, it should seem that the philosophers themselves have the most ado, and do the least disengage themselves from this the most restive and obstinate of all follies.[2] Quia etiam bene proficientes animos tentare non cessat.[3] "Because it ceases not to tempt the wisest minds." There is not any one vice of which reason does so clearly accuse the vanity as that; but it is so deeply rooted in us that I doubt whether any one ever clearly freed himself from it or no. After you have said all, and believed all that has been said to its prejudice, it creates so intestine an inclination in opposition to your best arguments that you have little power and firmness to resist it; for, as Cicero says,[4] even those who controvert it would yet that the books they write should appear before the world with their names in the title-page, and seek to derive glory from seeming to despise it. All other things are communicable and fall into commerce; we lend our goods and stake our lives for the necessity and service of our friends; but to communicate one's honour, and to robe another with one's own glory, is very rarely seen.

And yet we have some examples of that kind. Catulus Luctatius, in the Cymbrian war, having done all that in him lay to make his flying soldiers face about upon the enemy, ran himself at last away with the rest, and counterfeited the coward, to the end his men might rather seem to follow their captain than to fly from the enemy;[5] which was to abandon his own reputation to palliate the shame of others. When Charles the Fifth came into Provence, in the year 1537, 'tis said that Antonio de Leva, seeing the emperor positively resolved upon this expedition, and believing it would redound very much to his honour, did nevertheless very stiffly oppose it in the council, to the end that the entire glory of that resolution should be attributed to his master; and that it might be said his wisdom and foresight had been such as that, contrary to the opinion of all, he had brought about so great an enterprize: which was to do him honour at his own expense.[6]

The Thracian ambassadors, coming to comfort Archielonida, the mother of Brasidas, upon the death of her son, and commending him to that height as to say he had not left his like behind him, she rejected this private and particular commendation to attribute it to the public: "Tell me not that," said she; "I know the city of Sparta has several citizens greater and more valiant than he."[7] In the battle of Crecy, the Prince of Wales, being then very young, had the van-guard committed to him; the main stress of the battle happened to be in that place, and the lords that were with him, finding themselves well-nigh overmatched, sent to King Edward to advance to their relief; who thereupon inquiring what condition his son was in, and being answered that he was living and on horseback, "I should then do him wrong," said the king, "now to go and deprive him of the honour of winning this battle he has so long and so bravely disputed; what hazard soever he runs, it shall be entirely his own." And accordingly would neither go nor send, knowing that, if he went, it would be said all had been lost without his succour, and that the honour of the victory would be wholly attributed to him:[8] Semper enim quod postremum adjectum est, id rem totam videtur traxisse.[9] "For the last stroke to a business seems always to draw along with it the merit of the performance of the whole action." Many at Rome thought, and 'twas commonly said, that the greatest of Scipio's acts were, in part, due to Lelius, whose constant practice it was still to advance and promote Scipio's grandeur and renown, without any care of his own.[10] And Theopompus, king of Sparta, to him who told him the republic could not miscarry, since he knew so well how to command, "'Tis rather," answered he, "because the people know so well how to obey."

Private or particular praise refused.

Edward III. chooses to leave all the honour of the victory to his son.

As women succeeding to peerages had, notwithstanding their sex, the right to assist, and give their votes in the causes that appertained to the jurisdiction of peers, so the ecclesiastical peers, notwithstanding their profession, were obliged to assist our kings in their wars, not only with their friends and servants, but in their own persons. A Bishop of Beauvais did so, who being with Philip Augustus at the battle of Bouvines,[11] took a gallant share in that action, but did not think it fit for him to participate in the fruit and glory of that violent and bloody trade. He with his own hand reduced several of the enemy that day to his mercy, whom he delivered to the first gentleman he met, either to kill, or to receive them to quarter, referring this part to another hand. As also did William, Earl of Salisbury, to Messire John de Nesle. With a like subtlety of conscience to the other, he would kill, but not wound, him, and for that reason, fought only with a mace. And a certain person in my time, being reproached by the king that he had laid hands on a priest, stiffly and positively denied it. The case was, he had cudgelled and kicked him.

CHAPTER XLII.

OF THE INEQUALITY AMONGST US.

PLUTARCH says somewhere[1] that he does not find so great a difference betwixt beast and beast, as he does betwixt man and man; which is said in reference to the internal qualities, and the perfection of the soul. And, in truth, I find, according to my poor judgment, so vast a distance betwixt Epaminondas and some that I know, who are yet men of common sense, that I would willingly enhance upon Plutarch, and say that there is more difference betwixt such and such a man than there is betwixt such a man and such a beast:

Hem, vir viro quid præstat![2]

"How much, alas,
One man another doth surpass!"

and that there are as many and as innumerable degrees of mind, as there are cubits betwixt this and heaven. But touching the estimate of men, 'tis strange that, ourselves excepted, no other creature is esteemed beyond its proper qualities. We commend a horse for his strength and sureness of foot,

Volucrem
Sic laudamus equum, facili cui plurima palma
Fervet, et exultat rauco victoria circo;[3]

"'Tis thus we praise the horse that mocks our eyes,
While to the goal with lightning's speed he flies;
Whom many a well-earn'd palm and trophy grace,
And the cirque hails, unrivalled in the race;"

and not for his rich caparisons; a greyhound for his speed, not for his fine collar; a hawk for her wing, not for her jesses and bells.

A man to be valued for what he has in him, and not what he has about him.

Why, in like manner, do we not value a man for what is properly his own? He has a great train, a beautiful palace, so much credit, so many thousand pounds a-year: all these are about him, not in him. You will not buy a pig in a poke. If you cheapen a horse you will see him stripped of his housing clothes, you will see him naked and open to your eye; or if he be clothed, as they anciently were wont to present them to princes to sell, 'tis only on the less important parts, that you may not so much consider the beauty of his colour, or the breadth of his crupper, as principally to examine his limbs, eyes, and feet, which are the members of greatest use:

Regibus hic mos est: ubi equos mercantur, opertos
Inspiciunt; ne, si facies, ut sæpe, decora
Molli fulta pede est, emptorem inducat hiantem,
Quod pulchræ clunes, breve quod caput, ardua cervix.[4]

"When kings steeds cloth'd, as 'tis their manner, buy,
They straight examine very curiously,
Lest a short head, a thin and well-raised crest,
A broad spread buttock, and an ample chest,
Should all be propt with an old beaten hoof,
To gull the buyer when they come to proof."

Why, in giving your estimate of a man, do you value him wrapt and muffled up in clothes? He then discovers nothing to you but such parts as are not in the least his own; and conceals those by which alone one may rightly judge of his worth. 'Tis the price of the blade that you enquire into, and not of the scabbard. You would not, peradventure, bid a farthing for him if you saw him stripped. You are to judge him by himself, and not by what he wears. And as one of the ancients very pleasantly said, "Do you know why you repute him tall? You reckon withal the height of his clogs," whereas the pedestal is no part of the statue. Measure him without his stilts, let him lay aside his revenues and his titles, let him present himself in his shirt; then examine if his body be sound and sprightly, active, and disposed to perform its functions. What soul has he? Is she beautiful, capable, and happily provided with all her faculties? Is she rich of what is her own, or of what she has borrowed? Has fortune no hand in the affair? Can she, without winking, stand drawn swords? Is she indifferent whether her life expire by the mouth or through the throat? Is she settled, even, and content? This is what is to be examined, and by that you are to judge of the vast differences betwixt man and man. Is he kingdoms and duchies; he is an absolute monarch in and to himself.

Sapiens . . . . . pol ipse fingit fortunam sibi.[1]

"The wise man his own fortune makes."

What remains for him to desire?

——— "Nonne videmus,
Nil aliud sibi naturam latrare, nisi ut, quoi,
Corpore sejunctus dolor absit, mente fruatur
Jucundo sensu, cura semotu, metuque?[2]

"We see that nature only seeks for ease,
A body free from pains, free from disease,
A mind from cares and jealousies at peace."

Compare with such a one the common rabble of mankind, stupid, mean-spirited, servile, instable, and continually floating with the tempest of various passions, that tosses and tumbles them to and fro, all depending upon others, and you will find a greater distance than betwixt heaven and earth; and yet the blindness of common usage is such that we make little or no account of it. Whereas, if we consider a peasant and a king, a nobleman and a clown, a magistrate and a private man, a rich man and a poor, there appears a vast disparity, though they differ no more (as a man may say) than in their breeches.

Wherein the kings of Thrace distinguished themselves from their subjects.

In Thrace the king was distinguished from his people after a very pleasant and rare manner. He had a religion by himself, a god of his own, whom his subjects might not presume to adore, which was Mercury; whilst, on the other side, he disdained to have any thing to do with theirs, Mars, Bacchus, and Diana.[3] And yet they are no other than pictures, that make no essential dissimilitude; for as you see actors in a play representing a duke or an emperor upon the stage, and immediately after, in the tiring-room, return to their true and original condition: so the emperor, whose pomp so dazzles you in public,

Scilicet et grandes viridi cum luce smaragdi
Auro includuntur, teriturque Thalassina vestis, Assidue, et Veneris sudorem exercita potat.[4]

"Great emeralds richly are in gold enchast,
To dart green lustre; and the sea-green vest
Continually is worn and rubb'd to frets,
While it imbibes the juice that Venus sweats."

Kings subject to the same passions and accidents as other men.

Do but peep behind the curtain, and you'll see nothing but an ordinary man, and peradventure more contemptible than the meanest of his subjects. Ille beatus introrsum est; istius bracteata felicitas est.[5] "True happiness lies within, the other is but a counterfeit felicity." Cowardice, irresolution, ambition, spite, and envy, work in him as in another.

Non enim gazæ, neque consularis
Summovet lictor miseros tumultus
Mentis, et curas laqueata circum
Tecta volantes.[6]

"For neither wealth, honours, nor offices,
Can the wild tumults of the mind appease,
Nor chase those cares that, with unwearied wings,
Hover about the palaces of kings."

Cares and fears attack him even in the centre of his armies.

Re veraque metus hominum, curæque sequaces
Nec metuunt sonitus armorum, nec fera tela;
Audacterque inter reges, rerumque potentes
Versantur, neque fulgorem reverentur ab auro.[7]

"For fears and cares warring with human hearts,
Fear not the clash of arms, nor points of darts;
But with great kings and potentates make bold,
Maugre their purple and their glitt'ring gold."

Do fever, head-ache, and the gout, spare them any more than one of us? When old age hangs heavy upon a prince's shoulders, can the archers of his guard ease him of the burthen? When he is transfixed with the apprehension of death, can the gentlemen of his bed-chamber re-assure him? When jealousy, or any other caprice, swims in his brain, can our compliments and ceremonies restore him to his good humour? The canopy embroidered with pearl and gold he lies under has no virtue against a violent fit of the stone or cholic.

Nec calidæ citius decedunt corpore febres,
Textilibus si in picturis, ostroque rubenti
Jactaris, quàm si plebeia in veste cubandum est.[8]

Nor sooner will a bed superb assuage
The dreadful symptoms of a fever's rage
Than if the homely couch were meanly spread
With poorest blankets of the coarsest thread.

Alexander and Antigonus scorn their flatterers.

The flatterers of Alexander the Great possessed him that he was the son of Jupiter: being one day wounded, and looking at the blood streaming from his wound—"What say you now!" exclaimed he. "Is not this blood of a crimson colour, and purely human? This is not of the complexion with that which Homer makes to issue from the wounded gods!"[9] The poet Hermodorus had writ a poem in honour of Antigonus, wherein he called him the son of the Sun. "He that has the emptying of my close-stool," said Antigonus, "will find 'tis no such thing."[10] He is but a man at best, and if he be deformed, or ill qualified from his birth, the empire of the universe can neither mend his shape nor his nature;

what of all that, if he be a fool? Even pleasure and good fortune are not relished without vigour and understanding.

Hæc perinde sunt ut illius animus, qui ea possidet,
Qui uti scit ei bona; illi qui non utitur recte, mala.[1]

"Things to the souls of their possessors square,
Goods, if well us'd, if ill, they evils are.

Whatever the benefits of fortune are, they require a palate fit to relish them. 'Tis enjoyment, and not possession, that renders us happy.

Non domus et fundus, non æris acervus, et auri,
Ægroto domini deduxit corpore febres,
Non animo curas. Valeat possessor oportet,
Qui comportatis rebus bene cogitat uti:
Qui cupit, aut metuit, juvat illum sic domus, aut res,
Ut lippum pictæ tabulæ, fomenta podagram.[2]

"Nor house, nor lands, nor heaps of laboured ore
Can give their fev'rish lord one moment's rest,
Or drive one sorrow from his anxious breast.
The fond possessor must be blest with health
Who rightly means to use his hoarded wealth.
Houses and riches gratify the breast
For lucre lusting, or with fear depress'd,
As pictures glowing with a vivid light,
With painful pleasure charm a blemish'd sight,
As chafing soothes the gout."

Is he a sot, his taste palled and flat?—he no more enjoys what he has than one that has a cold relishes the flavour of Canary; or than a horse is sensible of his rich caparison. Plato is in the right when he tells us that health, beauty, vigour, and riches, and all the other things called goods, are equally evil to the unjust, as good to the just; and the evil on the contrary the same.[3] And therefore, where either the body or the mind are in disorder, to what use serve these external conveniences? seeing that the least prick with a pin, or the least passion of the soul, is sufficient to deprive us of the pleasure of being sole monarch of the world. At the first twitch of the gout, it signifies much, truly, to be called "sire," and "your majesty;"

Totus et argento conflatus, totus et auro,[4]

"Altho' his chests are cramm'd, whilst they will hold,
With untold sums of silver coin and gold,"

does he not forget his palaces and grandeurs? If he be angry, can his being a prince keep him from looking red, and looking pale, and grinding his teeth like a madman? If he be a man of parts, and well born, royalty adds very little to his happiness:

Si ventri bene si lateri est, pedibusque tuis, nil
Divitiæ poterunt regales addere majus.[5]

"If thou art well and sound from head to foot,
A king's revenue can add nothing to't.

He discerns 'tis nothing but counterfeit and gullery. Nay, perhaps he would be of King Seleucus's opinion, "That he that knew the weight of a sceptre would not deign to stoop to take it up, though he saw it lying on the ground;"[6] which he said in reference to the great and painful duty incumbent upon a good king. Assuredly it can be no easy task to rule others, when we find it so hard a matter to govern ourselves. And as to the thing, command, that seems so sweet and charming, considering the imbecility of human judgment, and the difficulty of choice in things that are new and doubtful to us, I am very much of opinion that it is far more pleasant to follow than to lead; and that it is a great settlement and satisfaction of mind to have one path to walk in, that's traced out for us, and to have none to answer for but one's self;

Ut satius multo jam sit parere quietum,
Quam regere imperio res velle.[7]

"So that 'tis better calmly to obey
Than in the storms of state a sceptre sway."

To which we may add that saying of Cyrus, That no man ought to rule but he who, in his own worth, was better than all those he has to govern. But King Hiero, in Xenophon,[8] says farther, That in the enjoyment even of pleasure itself they are in a worse condition than private men; forasmuch as the facility they have of commanding those things at will takes off from the delight; which we, who find the matter more difficult, experience in fruition.

Kings not in such a condition to taste pleasures as private men.

Pinguis amor, nimiumque potens, in tædiæ nobis
Vertitur, et, stomacho dulcis ut esca, nocet.[9]

"Excessive love in loathing ever ends,
As highest sauce the stomach most offends."

Can we think that the singing-boys of the choir take any great delight in their own music? The satiety does rather render it troublesome and tedious to them. Feasts, balls, masquerades, tiltings, delight such as rarely see, and who have long desired to see, them: but having been frequently at such entertainments, the relish of them grows flat and insipid; nor do women so much delight those who make a common practice of the sport. He who will not give himself leisure to be thirsty can never find the true pleasure of drinking. Farces and tumbling tricks are pleasant to the spectators, but mere drudgery to those by whom they are performed. And that this is so we see that princes divert themselves sometimes in disguising their qualities, awhile to depose themselves, and to stoop to the poor and ordinary mode of life of the meanest of their people.

Though no rich hangings grace the rooms,
Or purple wrought in Tyrian looms,
Have smooth'd a wrinkled brow and calmed a ruffled breast."

Nothing is so distasteful and disappointing as abundance. What appetite would not be checked to see three hundred women at its command, as the Grand Seignior has in his seraglio? And what enjoyment of the sport did that ancestor of the Turks reserve to himself, who never went a hawking without seven thousand falconers? And besides this, I fancy that this lustre of grandeur brings with it no little disturbance and uneasiness upon the enjoyment of the most charming pleasures: they are too conspicuous, and lie too open to every one's view. Neither do I know to what end they should any more than us be required to conceal their faults, since what is only reputed indiscretion in us the people brand with the names of tyranny and contempt of the laws in them; and besides their proclivity to vice, it would seem they held it as a heightening pleasure to insult over the laws and to trample upon public observances. Plato, indeed, in his Gorgias, defines a tyrant to be one who in a city has license to do whatever his own will leads him to. And by reason of his impunity, the publication of their vices does oft-times more mischief by its example than the vice itself.[1] Every one fears to be pryed into and overseen; but princes are so, e'en to their very gestures, looks, and thoughts, the people conceiving they have right and title to censure and be judges of them: besides, that faults appear greater, according to the eminency and lustre of the place where they are seated; as a mole or a wart appears greater on the forehead than a wide gash elsewhere. And this is the reason why the poets feign the amours of Jupiter to be performed in the disguises of so many borrowed shapes; and amongst the many amorous practices they lay to his charge there is only one, as I conceive, where he appears in his own majesty and grandeur.

Why great men ought to be more careful of concealing their faults than others.

But let us return to Hiero, who further complains of the inconveniences he found in his royalty, in that he could not go abroad and travel the world at liberty, being as it were a prisoner to the bounds and limits of his own dominion, and that in all his actions he was evermore surrounded with a troublesome crowd. And in truth to see our kings sit all alone at table, environed with so many people prating about them, and so many strangers staring upon them, as there always are, I have often been moved rather to pity than to envy their condition. King Alphonsus was wont to say that in this asses were in a better condition than kings, their masters permitting them to feed at their own ease and pleasure; a favour that kings cannot obtain of their servants; and it would never come into my head that it could be of any great advantage in the life of a man of sense to have twenty people about him when he is at stool; or that the services of a man of ten thousand livres a year, or that has taken Casal or defended Siena, should be either more commodious or more acceptable to him than those of a good groom of the chamber that understands his business. The advantages of sovereignty are little better than imaginary. Every degree of fortune has in it some image of principality. Cæsar calls all the lords of France, having jurisdiction within their own demesnes, kinglets.[2] And, in truth, the title of sire excepted, they go pretty far towards kingship; for do but look into the provinces remote from court, as Brittany for example, take notice of the train, the vassals, the officers, the employments, service, ceremony, and state, of a lord that lives retired amidst his own estates and his own tenants, and observe withal the flight of his imagination, there is nothing more royal: he hears talk of his master once a-year as of the king of Persia, and only recognizes him from some remote cousinship his secretary keeps note of in some musty record. And, to speak the truth, our laws are easy enough, so easy that a gentleman of France scarce feels the weight of sovereignty pinch his shoulders above twice in his life. Real and effectual subjection only concerns such amongst us as voluntarily thrust their necks under the yoke, and who design to get wealth and honour by such services. Any man that loves his own fire-side, and can govern his house without falling by the ears with his neighbours, or engaging in suits of law, is as free as the Duke of Venice. Paucos servitus, plures servitutem tenent.[3] "Servitude seizes on few, but many seize on her."

Kings confined in the limits of their own country.

The condition of country gentlemen in France in Montaigne's time.

But that which Hiero is most concerned at is that he finds himself stripped of all friendship and deprived of all mutual society, wherein the true and most perfect fruition of human life consists. For what testimony of affection and good will can I extract from him that owes me, whether he will or no, all that he is able to do? Can I form any assurance of his real respect to me from his humble way of speaking and submissive behaviour, which, when they are ceremonies, it is not in his choice to deny? The honour we receive from those that fear us is not honour; those respects are paid to my royalty, and not to me.

[2] As Cæsar does not say anything of the sort respecting the Gauls, M. Coste imagines that our author, by inadvertence, applied to the Gauls what Cæsar wrote of the Germans, Bello Gall., vi. 23, where he says:—"In pace nullus communis est magistratus; sed principes regionum atque pagorum inter suos jus dicunt, controversiasque minunt." Montaigne, however, may have had in his mind that passage of a letter of Cæsar's which Cicero has preserved (Epist. Fam., vii. 5.), where the great general says: "M. Orium, quem mihi commendas, vel regem Gallice factam, vel hunc septæ delega."

> "'Tis the great benefit of kings that they
> Who are by law subjected to their sway
> Are bound, in all their princes say or do,
> Not only to submit, but praise it too."

Do I not see that the wicked and the good king, he that is hated and he that is beloved, has the one as much reverence paid him as the other? My predecessor was, and my successor shall be, served with the same ceremony and state. If my subjects do me no offence, 'tis no evidence of any good affection; why should I look upon it as such, seeing it is not in their power if they would? No one follows me, or obeys my commands, upon the account of any friendship betwixt him and me; there can be no contracting of friendship where there is so little relation and correspondence. My own height has put me out of the familiarity of, and intelligence with, men; there is too great disparity and disproportion betwixt us. They follow me upon the account of appearance and custom; or rather my fortune and me, to increase their own. All they say to me, or do for me, is forced and dissembled, their liberty being on all parts restrained by the great power and authority I have over them. I see nothing about me but what is dissembled and disguised.

The Emperor Julian being one day applauded by his courtiers for his exact justice, "I should be proud of these praises," said he, "did they come from persons that durst condemn or disapprove the contrary, in case I should do it."[2] All the real advantages of princes are common to them with men of moderate condition ('tis for the gods to mount winged horses and feed upon ambrosia): they have no other sleep nor other appetite than we; the steel they arm themselves withal is of no better temper than that we also use; their crowns do neither defend them from the rain nor sun.

Diocletian, who wore a crown so fortunate and revered, resigned it to retire himself to the felicity of a private life. And some time after, the necessity of public affairs requiring that he should re-assume his charge, he made answer to those who came to solicit him to it: "You would not offer to persuade me to this, had you seen the fine condition of the trees I have planted in my orchard, and the fair melons I have sowed in my garden."[3]

In the opinion of Anacharsis, the happiest state of government would be where, all other things being equal, precedency should be regulated to the virtues, and repulses to the vices, of men.

When King Pyrrhus prepared for his expedition into Italy, his wise counsellor Cyneas, to make him sensible of the vanity of his ambition: "Well, sir," said he, "to what end do you make all this mighty preparation?" "To make myself master of Italy," replied the king. "And what after that is done?" said Cyneas. "I will pass over into Gaul and Spain," said the other. "And what then?" "I will then go to subdue Africa; and lastly, when I have brought the whole world to my subjection, I will sit down and live content at my ease." "For God's sake, sir!" replied Cyneas, "tell me what hinders you, if you please, from being now in the condition you speak of? Why do you not now at this instant settle yourself in the state you say you aim at, and spare the labour and hazard you interpose?"[4]

The vain ambition of Pyrrhus.

> Nimirum, quia non bene norat quæ esset habendi
> Finis, et omnino quoad crescat vera voluptas.[5]
>
> "The end of being rich he did not know, > Nor to what height felicity should grow."

I will conclude with an old versicle that I think very pat to the purpose.

> Mores cuique sui fingunt fortunam.[6]
>
> "Himself, not fortune, ev'ry one must blame, > Since men's own manners do their fortune frame."

CHAPTER XLIII.

OF SUMPTUARY LAWS.

THE way by which our laws attempt to regulate idle and vain expenses in meat and clothes, seems to be quite contrary to the end designed. The true way would be to beget in men a contempt of silks and gold, as vain, frivolous, and useless; whereas, we augment to them the honours, and enhance the value of such things, which is a very absurd mode of creating a disgust. For to enact that none but princes shall eat turbot, shall wear velvet, or gold lace, and to interdict these things to the people, what is it but to bring them into a greater esteem, and to set every man more agog to eat and wear them? Let kings leave off these ensigns of grandeur, they have others enough besides; these excesses are more excusable in any other than a prince. We may learn, by the example of several nations, many better ways of exterior distinction of quality, (which, truly, I conceive to be very requisite in a state) without fostering up for this purpose this corruption and inconvenience. 'Tis strange how suddenly, and with how much ease, custom, in these indifferent things, establishes itself, and becomes authority. We had scarce worn cloth a year, at court, for the mourning of Henry the Second, but that silks were already grown into such contempt with every one that a man so clad was presently concluded a cit. Silks were left in share betwixt the physicians and surgeons, and though all other people almost went dressed alike, there was, notwithstanding, in one thing or other, sufficient distinction of the calling and condition of men. How suddenly do greasy chamois doublets become the fashion in our armies, whilst all neatness and richness of habit fall into reproach and contempt? Let kings but take the lead, and begin to leave off this expense, and in a month the business will be done throughout the kingdom without edict or ordinance; we shall all follow. It should be rather proclaimed, on the contrary, that no one should wear scarlet, or goldsmith's work, but whores and tumblers.

Gold and silver more to be despised by a prince than the subjects.

When silk clothes first began to be despised in France.

Zeleucus, with such an invention, reclaimed the corrupted manners of the Locrians. His laws were, That no free woman should be allowed more than one maid to follow her, unless she was drunk: nor was to stir out of the city by night, wear jewels of gold about her, or go in an embroidered robe, unless she was a professed public woman. That, pandars excepted, no man was to wear a gold ring, nor be habited in fine cloth, such as that woven in the city of Miletum.[1] By which ignominious exceptions he ingeniously diverted his citizens from superfluities and pernicious pleasures; it was a most useful mode of attracting men by honour and ambition, to their duty and obedience.

The laws of Zeleucus.

Our kings can do what they please in such external reformations; their own inclinations stand in this case for a law: Quidquid principes faciunt, præcipere videntur.[2] "What princes themselves do, they seem to enjoin others to do." Whatever is done at court passes for a rule through the rest of France. Let the courtiers but fall out with these abominable breeches, that discover so much of those parts which should be concealed; these unwieldy doublets, that make us look like I know not what; and are so unfit to admit of the use of arms; these long effeminate tresses of hair; this foolish custom of kissing what we present to our equals, and our hands in saluting them; a ceremony in former times only due to princes: and that a gentleman shall appear in a place where he owes respect, without his sword, unbuttoned and untrussed, as though he came from the house-of-office; and that, contrary to the custom of our forefathers, and the particular privilege of the noblesse of this kingdom, we shall stand a long time bare-headed before our princes, in what place soever, and the same to a hundred others, so many tiercelets and quartelets of kings have we got now-a-days; and so with other like degenerate innovations; they will see them all presently vanished and cried down. These are, 'tis true, but superficial errors, but still, of ill consequence; 'tis enough to inform us that the fabric itself is crazy and tottering, when we see the rough-cast of our walls to cleave and split.

The court practice is a rule for the French nation.

Plato, in his laws,[3] esteems nothing of more pestiferous consequence to his city than to give young men the liberty of introducing any change in their habits, gestures, dances, songs and exercises, from one form to another; shifting from this to that, hunting after novelties, and applauding the inventors; by which means manners are corrupted, and old institutions come to be nauseated and despised. In all things, saving only in those that are evil, a change is to be feared; even the change of seasons, winds, viands, and humours. And no laws are in their true credit, but such to which God has given so long a continuance that no one knows their beginning, or that there ever was any other.

New fashions fatal to youth.

CHAPTER XLIV.

OF SLEEP.

Reason directs that we should always go the same way, but not always the same pace. And consequently, though a wise man ought not to give the reins to human passions, so as to let them deviate him from the right path; he may, notwithstanding, without prejudice to his duty, leave it to them to hasten or to slacken his speed, and not fix himself like a motionless and insensible Colossus. Could virtue itself put on flesh and blood, I believe the pulse would beat faster going on to an assault than in going to dinner: that is to say, there is a necessity she should beat, and be moved. I have taken notice, as of an extraordinary thing, of some great men who, in the highest enterprizes and greatest dangers, have kept themselves in so settled a calm as not at all to hinder their usual serenity, or break their sleep. Alexander the Great, on the day assigned for that furious battle betwixt him and Darius, slept so profoundly, and so late in the morning, that Parmenio was fain to enter his chamber, and, coming to his bed-side, to call him several times by name, the time to go to fight being come.[1] The Emperor Otho, having put on a resolution to kill himself, the same night, after having settled his domestic affairs, divided his money amongst his servants, and set a good edge upon a sword he had made choice of for the purpose, and now staying only to be satisfied whether all his friends were retired in safety, he fell into so sound a sleep that the gentlemen of his chamber heard him snore.[2] The death of this emperor has in it many circumstances resembling that of the great Cato, and particularly this; for Cato being ready to dispatch himself, whilst he only stayed his hand in expectation of the return of a messenger he had sent, to bring him news whether the senators he had sent away were put out from the port of Utica, he fell into so sound a sleep that they heard him snore in the next room; and he whom he had sent to the port, having awaked him to let him know that the tempestuous weather had hindered the senators from putting to sea; he dispatched another messenger, and, composing himself again in the bed, settled again to sleep, and did so till, by the return of the last messenger, he had certain intelligence they were gone.[3] We may here further compare him with Alexander, too, in that great and dangerous storm that threatened him by the sedition of the tribunē, Metellus, who, wishing to renew the decree for the calling in of Pompey with his army into the City, at the time of Catiline's conspiracy, was only, and that stoutly, opposed by Cato, so that very sharp language, and bitter menaces, passed between them in the senate about that affair; but it was the next day, in the great square, that the matter was to be decided; where Metellus, besides the favour of the people, and of Cæsar (at that time of Pompey's faction), was to appear, accompanied with a rabble of foreign slaves and fencers; and Cato, only fortified with his own courage and firmness; so that his relations, domestics, and many good people were in great apprehension for him, and to that degree that some there were who passed over the whole night without sleep, eating, or drinking, for the manifest danger they saw him running into; at which his wife and sisters did nothing but weep and torment themselves in his house; whereas he, on the contrary, comforted every one, and, having supped after his usual manner, went to bed, and slept so profoundly till morning that one of his fellow tribunes roused him to go to the encounter.[4] The knowledge we have of the greatness of this man's courage, by the rest of his life, may warrant us surely to judge that his indifference proceeded from a soul so much elevated above such accidents that he disdained to let it take any more hold of his imagination than any other ordinary affair.

Cato's tranquillity just before a popular commotion.

In the naval engagement which Augustus won against Sextus Pompeius in Sicily, just as they were to begin the fight he was so fast asleep that his friends were compelled to wake him to give the signal of battle.[5] And this it was that gave Mark Antony afterwards occasion to reproach him that he had not the courage so much as with open eyes to behold the order of his own squadrons, and that he had not dared to present himself before the soldiers till first Agrippa had brought him news of the victory obtained. But, as to the business of young Marius, who did much worse (for the day of his last battle against Sylla, after he had ordered his army, and given the word and signal of battle, he laid him down under the shade of a tree to repose himself, and fell so fast asleep that the rout and flight of his men could hardly awake him, having seen nothing of the fight), he is said to have been at that time so extremely spent and worn out with labour and want of sleep that nature could hold out no longer.[6] Upon this matter the physicians may determine whether sleep be so necessary that our lives depend upon it: for we read that they killed King Perseus of Macedon, a prisoner at Rome, by keeping him from sleep; but Pliny instances some who have lived long without sleep.[7] Herodotus speaks of nations where the men sleep and wake by half years;[8] and they who write the life of the sage Epimenides affirm that he slept seven and fifty years together.[9]

Profound sleep of Augustus just before a battle.

CHAPTER XLV.

OF THE BATTLE OF DREUX.

Our battle of Dreux[10] was full of extraordinary accidents: but such men as have no great kindness for M. de Guise, nor much favour his reputation, are willing to have him thought to blame, and say that his making a halt, and delaying time with the forces he commanded, whilst Monsieur the Constable, who was general of the army, was raked through and through with the enemies' artillery, is not to be excused; and that he had much better have run the hazard of charging the enemy in flank than staying for the advantage of falling in upon the rear, to suffer so great a loss. But, besides what the event demonstrated, he who will consider it without passion or prejudice will easily be induced to confess that the aim and design not of a captain only, but of every private soldier, ought to look at the victory in general; and that no particular occurrences, how nearly soever they may concern his own interest, should divert him from that pursuit. Philopœmen, in an encounter with Machanidas, having sent before a good strong party of his archers to begin the skirmish, the enemy having routed these pursued them post haste in the heat of victory, and in that pursuit passing by the place where Philopœmen was, though his soldiers were impatient to fall on, yet he did not think fit to stir from his post, nor to present himself to the enemy to relieve his men, but, having suffered them to be chased about the field, and cut in pieces before his face, charged in upon their body of foot, when he saw them left naked by their horse; and, notwithstanding that they were Lacedæmonians, yet taking them in the nick, when, thinking themselves secure of the victory, they began to disorder their ranks, he did his business with great facility, and then put himself in pursuit of Machanidas.[1] Which case is very like that of Monsieur de Guise.

Battle of Agesilaus with the Bœotians.

In that fierce battle betwixt Agesilaus and the Bœotians, which Xenophon, who was present at it, reports to be the roughest he had ever seen, Agesilaus waved the advantage that fortune presented to him, to let the Bœotians' battalion pass by, and then to charge them in the rear, how certain soever he made himself of the victory, judging it would rather be an effect of conduct than valour to proceed that way. And therefore, to show his prowess, rather chose, with a wonderful ardour of courage, to charge them in the front; but he was well beaten, and wounded for his pains, and constrained at last to disengage himself and to take the course he had at first neglected, opening his battalion to give way to this torrent of Bœotians, and being past by, taking notice that they marched in disorder, like men that thought themselves out of danger, he then pursued and charged them in flank, yet could not prevail so far as to bring it to so general a rout, but that they leisurely retreated, still facing about upon him, till they were retired into safety.[2]

CHAPTER XLVI.

OF NAMES.

WHAT variety of herbs soever are put together in the dish, yet the whole is called by the one name of a salad. In like manner, under the consideration of names, I will here make a hodge-podge of different articles.

Every nation has certain names that, I know not why, are taken in no good part: as with us John, William,[3] and Benedict. Item, in the genealogy of princes, also, there seem to be certain names fatally affected, as the Ptolemies of Egypt, the Henrys of England, the Charleses of France, the Baldwins of Flanders, and the Williams of our ancient Aquitaine, from whence 'tis said the name of Guienne has its derivation; which would seem far-fetched, were there not as crude derivations in Plato himself.[4]

Some names disliked: others fatally affected in the genealogies of some princes.

Item, 'tis a frivolous thing in itself, but nevertheless worthy to be recorded for the strangeness of it, which is writ by an eye-witness, that Henry Duke of Normandy, son of Henry the Second, King of England, making a great feast in France, the concourse of nobility and gentry was so great that being, for sport's sake, divided into troops, according to their names, in the first troop, which consisted of Williams, there were found an hundred and ten knights sitting at the table of that name, without reckoning the simple gentlemen and their servants.

Nobility placed at different tables at a feast, by a resemblance of names.

It is as pleasant to distribute the tables by the names of the guests as it was in the Emperor Geta to distribute the several courses of his meat by the first letters of the meats themselves, where those that began with b were served up together, as brawn, beef, bream, bustards, and beccaficos, and so of others.[5]

Dishes of meat served up according to the order of the alphabet.

Item, there is a saying that it is a good thing to have a good name, that is to say, credit and a good repute. But besides this, it is convenient to have a well-sounding name, such as is at the same time easy of pronunciation, and easy to be remembered, by reason that kings and other great persons do by that means the more easily know and the more hardly forget us; and, indeed, of our own servants, we more frequently call and employ those whose names are most ready upon the tongue. I myself have seen that Henry the Second could not for his heart hit of a gentleman's name of our country of Gascony; and moreover was fain to call one of the queen's maids of honour by the general name of her family, her own being so difficult to pronounce or remember. And Socrates thinks it worthy a father's care to give fine names to his children.

It is good to have a name easy to be pronounced.

[1] Plutarch, in vitâ.
[2] Id., Life of Agesilaus.
[3] William, says the Dictionary of Trevoux, was once applied by way of contempt to persons who were thought slightingly of.

[4] The name of Guienne derives not from Guillaume, but from Aquitania, Aquitaine, whence, first, Aquienne, then Guienne.

[5] Spartian, Life of Geta, c. 5.

Item, tis said that the foundation of Nostre Dame la Grande, at Poictiers, took its original hence: that a debauched young fellow, formerly living in that place, having picked up a wench, and, at her first coming in, asking her name, and being answered that it was Mary, he felt himself so suddenly darted through with the awe of religion, and the reverence to that sacred name of the blessed Virgin, that he not only immediately sent the girl away, but became a reformed man, and so continued the remainder of his life. And that, in consideration of this miracle, there was erected upon the place where this young man's house stood, first a chapel dedicated to our Lady, and afterwards the church that we now see standing there. This auricular reproof wrought upon the conscience, and that right into the soul. This that follows insinuated itself merely by the senses. Pythagoras being in company with some wild young fellows, and perceiving that, heated with the feast, they complotted to go violate an honest house, commanded the singing-wench to alter her wanton airs; and by a solemn, grave, and spondaick music, gently enchanted and laid asleep their ardour.[1]

The origin of the foundation of Notre Dame la Grande, at Poictiers.

Item, will not posterity say that our modern reformation has been wonderfully exact, in having not only scuffled with and overcome errors and vice, and filled the world with devotion, humility, obedience, peace, and all sorts of virtue; but to have proceeded so far as to quarrel with the ancient baptismal names of Charles, Louis, and Francis, to fill the world with Methusalems, Ezekiels, and Malachis, of a far more spiritual sound? A gentleman, a neighbour of mine, a great admirer of antiquity, and who was always preferring the excellency of preceding times in comparison with this present age of ours, did not (amongst the rest) forget to magnify the lofty and magnificent sound of the gentlemen's names of those days, Don Grumedan, Quadregan, Agesilan, &c., which but to hear named he conceived to be other kind of men than Pierre, Guillot, and Michel.

Superb and magnificent names of the ancient noblesse.

Item, I am mightily pleased with Jaques Amiot for leaving, throughout a whole French oration, the Latin names entire, without varying and dissecting them, to give them a French termination. It seemed a little harsh and rough at first; but already custom, by the authority of his Plutarch, has overcome that novelty. I have often wished that such as write chronicles in Latin would leave our names as they find them, for in making of Vaudemont Vallemontanus, and metamorphosing names to dress them out in Greek or Latin, we know not where we are, and with the persons of the men lose the benefit of the story.

To conclude, 'tis a scurvy custom, and of very ill consequence, which we have in our kingdom of France, to call every man by the name of his manor or seigneury: 'tis the thing in the world that does the most confound families and descents. A younger brother of a good family, having a manor left him by his father, by the name of which he has been known and honoured, cannot handsomely leave it; ten years after his decease it falls into the hand of a stranger, who does the same. Do but judge whereabouts we shall be concerning the knowledge of these men. We need look no farther for examples than our own royal family, where every partition creates a new surname, whilst in the mean time the original of the family is totally lost. There is so great a liberty taken in these mutations that I have not in my time seen any one advanced by fortune to any extraordinary grandeur, who has not presently had genealogical titles added to him, new, and unknown to his father, and who has not been engrafted upon some illustrious stem; and, by good luck, the obscurest families are the most proper for falsification. How many gentlemen have we in France, who, by their own talk, are of royal extraction? More, I think, than of those that will confess they are not.

A custom in France for gentlemen to go by the name of their estates; why blameable.

The obscurest families most liable to be falsified.

Was not this a pleasant passage of a friend of mine? There were a great many gentlemen assembled together about the dispute of one seigneur with another; which other had, in truth, some pre-eminence of titles and alliances above the ordinary run of nobility. Upon the debate of this priority, every one standing up for himself, to make himself equal to him, alleged, one one extraction, another another; one the near resemblance of name; another of arms; another an old worm-eaten patent; and the least of them made himself out great-grandchild to some foreign king. When they came to sit down to dinner, my friend, instead of taking his place amongst them, retiring with the most profound congees, entreated the company to excuse him for having hitherto lived with them at the sancy rate of a companion; but, being now better informed of their quality, he would begin to pay them the respect due to their birth and grandeur, saying it would ill become him to sit down among so many princes. After jesting with them for some time, he made them a thousand reproaches: "Let us, in God's name, satisfy ourselves with what our fathers were contented with, and with what we are. We are great enough, if we rightly understand how to maintain it. Let us not disown the fortune and condition of our ancestors, but lay aside these ridiculous imaginations, that can never be wanting to any one that has the impudence to allege them."

[1] Sextus Empiricus, adversus Mathem. vi.

Arms offer no more security than surnames. I bear Azur semé de trefles d'or, à une patte de lyon de même, armée de gueules, mise en face. What privilege has this to continue particularly in my house and name? A son-in-law will transport it into another family; or some paltry purchaser will make them his first arms. There is nothing wherein there is more change and confusion.

The uncertainty of coats of arms.

But this consideration leads me perforce into another subject. Let us look a little narrowly into, and, in God's name, examine upon what foundation we erect this glory and reputation, for which the world is turned topsy-turvy. Wherein do we place this renown that we hunt after with such infinite anxiety and trouble? It is, in the end, Peter or William that bears it, takes it into his possession, and whom it only concerns. O, what a valiant faculty is hope, that in a mortal subject, and in a moment, makes nothing of usurping infinity, immensity, eternity, and of supplying her master's indigence, at her pleasure, with all things he can imagine or desire! Nature has here given us a pretty toy to play withal. And this Peter or William, what is it but a sound, when all is done? Or three or four dashes with a pen, so easy to be varied that I would fain know to whom is to be attributed the glory of so many victories, to Guesquin, to Glesquin, or to Gueaquin?[1] And yet there would be something more in the case than in Lucian, that Sigma should serve Tau with a process;[2] for

> Non levia aut ludicra petuntur
> Præmia;[3]
> "He seeks no mean rewards;"

the quest is here in good earnest. The point is, which of these letters is to be rewarded for so many sieges, battles, wounds, imprisonments, and services done to the crown of France by this famous constable.

Nicholas Denisot[4] never concerned himself farther than the letters of his name, of which he has altered the whole contexture to build up by anagram the Count d'Alsinois, whom he has endowed with the glory of his poetry and painting. And the historian Suetonius looked only to the meaning of his; and so cashiering his father's surname, Lenis, left Tranquillus successor to the reputation of his writings. Who would believe that the Captain Bayard should have no honour but what he derives from the great deeds of Peter Terrail;[5] and that Antonio Escalin should suffer himself to his face to be robbed of the honour of so many navigations and commands at sea and land by Captain Poulin and the Baron de la Garde?[6]

Secondly, these are dashes of the pen, common to a thousand people. How many are there in every race of the same name and surname? And how many in several races, ages, and countries? History tells us of three Socrateses, five Platos, eight Aristotles, seven Xenophons, twenty Demetriuses, twenty Theodores; and how many more she was not acquainted with, we may imagine. Who hinders my groom from calling himself Pompey the Great? But, after all, what virtue, what springs are there that convey to my deceased groom, or the other Pompey, who had his head cut off in Egypt, this glorious renown, and these so much honoured flourishes of the pen, so as to be of any advantage to them?

> Id cinerem et manes credis curare sepultos.[7]
> "Can we believe the dead regard such things?"

What sense have the two companions in the greatest esteem of men,—Epaminondas, of this glorious verse, that has been so many ages current in his praise;

> Consiliis nostris laus est attrita Laconum;[8]
>
> "One Sparta by my counsels is o'erthrown;"

and Africanus, of this other,

> A sole exoriente, supra Mæoti' Paludes,
> Nemo est qui factis me æquiparare queat.[9]
>
> "From early dawn unto the setting sun,
> There's none can match the deeds that I have done."

The survivors, indeed, tickle themselves with these praises, and, by them incited to jealousy or desire, inconsiderately and according to their own fancy, attribute to the dead this their own feeling; vainly flattering themselves that they shall one day in turn be capable of the same. God knows, however,

> Ad hæc se
> Romanus, Grajusque, et Barbarus induperator
> Erexit; causas discriminis atque laboris
> Inde habuit: tanto major famæ sitis est, quam
> Virtutis![10]

[1] In Froissart's History, where we find all the most memorable actions of this great man, both before and after his advancement to the dignity of constable, and to his death, he is not named Guesquin, nor Glesquin, nor Gueaquin, but Guesclin. It is true that the same Froissart (tom. II. book 3,) long after, having mentioned his death, tells us that having called him by the name of Glesquin, in presence of William d'Ancenis, a gentleman of Britanny, that gentleman said to him, "That Glay Aquis was the right surname of this famous constable," which he proved to him by a very pleasant story, which has, however, all the air of romance. Menage, however, mentions no fewer than fourteen different ways of spelling the name.

CHAPTER XLVII.

OF THE UNCERTAINTY OF OUR JUDGMENT.

Whether a conquered enemy should be pursued to extremity. Reasons for and against it.

It was well said by the poet,

Ἐπέων δὲ πολὺς νόμος ἔνθα καὶ ἔνθα.[1]

"There is every where liberty of talking enough, and enough to be said on both sides."

For example:

Vince Annibal, e non seppe usar poi
Ben la vittoriosa sua ventura.[2]

"The Carthaginian, though renown'd in fight, Improv'd not all his victories as he might."

Such as would take this side, and condemn the oversight of our leaders, in not pushing home the victory at Moncontour; or accuse the King of Spain[3] of not knowing how to make his best use of the advantage he had against us at St. Quentin, may conclude these oversights to proceed from a soul drunk with success, or from a courage which, being full and over-gorged with this beginning of good fortune, had lost the appetite of adding to it, having already enough to do to digest what it had taken in: he has his arms full, and can embrace no more. Unworthy of the benefit fortune had put into his hands: for what utility does he reap from it, if, notwithstanding, he gives his enemy time to rally? What hope is there that he will dare at another time to attack an enemy re-united and re-composed, and armed anew with despite and revenge, who did not dare to pursue him when routed and unmanned by fear?

Dum fortuna calet, dum conficit omnia terror.[4]

"Whilst Fortune's in a heat, and terror throws
A dismal gloom, confounding all their foes."

But, withal, what better opportunity can he expect than that he has lost? 'Tis not here, as in fencing, where the most hits win: for so long as the enemy is on foot, the game is new to begin; that is not to be called a victory that does not put an end to the war. In the encounter where Cæsar had the worse, near the city of Oricum, he reproached Pompey's soldiers that he had been lost, had their general known how to overcome;[5] and afterwards showed him a very different trick, when he beat him in his turn.

But why may not a man also argue, on the contrary, that it is the effect of a precipitous and insatiate spirit not to know how to restrain its ardour; that it is to abuse the favour of God to exceed the measure he has prescribed them; and that again to throw a man's self into danger, after a victory obtained, is again to expose himself to the mercy of fortune; and that it is one of the highest rules in the art of war not to drive an enemy to despair? Sylla and Marius, in the social war, having defeated the Marsians, seeing yet a body of reserve that, prompted by despair, was coming on like furious beasts to charge in upon them, thought it not convenient to await them. Had not Monsieur De Foix's ardour transported him so precipitously to pursue the remains of the victory of Ravenna, he had not obscured it by his own death. And yet the recent memory of his example served to preserve Monsieur d'Anguien from the same misfortune at the battle of Serisoles. 'Tis dangerous to attack a man you have deprived of all means to escape but by his arms: for necessity teaches violent resolutions: Gravissimi sunt morsus irritatæ necessitatis.[6] "Enraged necessity bites deep."

Vincitur haud gratis, jugulo qui provocat hostem.[7]

"The foe that meets the sword sells his life dear."

This it was that made Pharax withhold the King of Lacedæmon, who had won a battle of the Mantineans, from going to charge a thousand Argians, who were escaped in an entire body from the defeat; but rather let them steal off at liberty, that he might not encounter valour whetted and enraged by misehance.[8] Clodomir, King of Aquitaine, after a victory pursuing Gondemar, King of Burgundy, beaten and flying, compelled him to face about, and make head; and his obstinacy deprived him of the fruit of his conquest, for he there lost his life.

Whether soldiers should be richly armed.

In like manner, if a man were to choose whether he would have his soldiers richly accoutred and armed, or armed only for necessary defence; this argument would step in in favour of the first (of which opinion were Sertorius, Philopœmen, Brutus, Cæsar, and others), that it is to a soldier an enflaming of courage, and a spur to glory, to see himself bravely apparelled, and withal affords occasion to be more obstinate in fight, having his arms, which are in a manner his estate and inheritance, to defend; which is the reason, says Xenophon, why those of Asia carried their wives, concubines, with their choicest jewels and greatest wealth, along with them to the wars.[9] But then these arguments would offer on the other side: that a general ought rather to lessen than increase, in his soldiers, their solicitude of preserving themselves: that by this means they will be in a double fear of hazarding their persons; as also that it will be a double temptation to the enemy to fight for a victory where so rich spoils are to be obtained. And this very thing has been observed, in former times, notably to encourage the Romans against the Samnites. Antiochus shewing Hannibal the army he had raised, wonderfully splendid, and rich in all sorts of equipage, asked him—"Will the Romans be satisfied with that army?" "Satisfied!" replied the other; "yes, doubtless, were their avarice never so great."[1] Lycurgus not only forbad his soldiers all manner of sumptuousness in their equipage, but moreover to strip their conquered enemies, because, he said, he would have poverty and frugality shine with the rest of the battle.[2]

Whether soldiers should be suffered to brave and insult the enemy.

At sieges, and elsewhere, where occasion draws us near to the enemy, we readily suffer our men to brave, rate, and affront the enemy with all sorts of injurious language; and not without some colour of reason; for it is of no little consequence to take from them all hopes of mercy and composition, in representing to them that there is no fair quarter to be expected from an enemy they have incensed to that degree, nor other remedy remaining, but in victory. And yet Vitellius found himself out in this way of proceeding; for having to do with Otho, weaker in respect of his soldiers, long unaccustomed to war, and effeminated with the delights of the city; he so nettled them at last, with stinging language, reproaching them with cowardice, and the regret of the mistresses and entertainments they had left behind at Rome, that by this means he inspired them with such resolution as no exhortation would have had the power to have done; and himself made them fall upon him, with whom their own captains before could by no means prevail. And, indeed, when they are injuries that touch to the quick, it may very well fall out that he who went but sluggishly to work in the behalf of his prince will fall to it with another sort of mettle, when the quarrel is his own.

Whether generals ought to disguise themselves before a battle.

Considering of how great importance is the preservation of the general of an army, and that the universal aim of an enemy is levelled directly at the head upon which all others depend; the advice seems to admit of no dispute, which we know has been taken by many great captains, of changing their dress, and disguising their persons, upon the point of going to engage. Nevertheless, the inconvenience a man, by so doing, runs into, is not less than that he thinks to avoid: for the captain, by this means, being concealed from the knowledge of his own men, the courage they should derive from his presence and example comes by degrees to cool and to decay; and not seeing the wonted marks and ensigns of their leader,[3] they presently conclude him either dead, or that, despairing of the business, he is gone to shift for himself. Experience shows us that both these ways have been both successful and otherwise. What befel Pyrrhus in the battle he fought against the consul Levinus, in Italy, will serve us to both purposes: for though, by shrouding his person under the arms of Megacles, and making the latter wear his, he undoubtedly preserved his own life, yet by that very means he was withal very near running into the other mischief of losing the battle. Alexander, Cæsar, and Lucullus, loved to make themselves known in battle, by rich accoutrements and arms of a particular lustre and colour. Agis, Agesilaus, and that great Gilippus,[4] on the contrary, used to fight obscurely armed, and without any imperial attendance or distinction.

Whether it is best to fall upon an enemy, or wait for an attack.

Amongst other oversights Pompey is charged withal, at the Battle of Pharsalia, he is condemned for making his army stand still to receive the enemy's charge;[5] "by reason that" (I shall here steal Plutarch's own words, that are better than mine,) "he, by so doing, deprived himself of the violent impression the motion of running adds to the first shock of arms, and hindered the impetus of the combatants, which was wont to give great impetuosity and fury to the first encounter; especially when they come to rush in with their utmost vigour, their courages increasing by the shouts and the career; thereby rendering his soldiers' animosity and ardour, as a man may say, more reserved and cold." This is what Plutarch says;[6] but if Cæsar had come by the worse, why might it not as well have been urged that, on the contrary, the strongest and most steady posture of fighting is that wherein a man stands planted firm, without motion; and they who make a halt upon their march, closing up, and reserving their force within themselves for the push of the business, have a great advantage against those who are disordered, and who have already spent half their breath in running on precipitously to the charge. Besides, that an army

[4] It is my opinion, observes M. Coste, that one who has been forced to fly his country from a sentence of death, for having robbed the public, can never deserve the title of a great man. As to the infamous robbery committed by this Gilippus, see Diodorus of Sicily. His father, whose name was Clearchus, was in the same scrape. Being cast for his life, he fled, says Diodorus, before the sentence. Thus, adds the historian, did these two personages, who in other respects were both reputed excellent men, throw a scandal upon the rest of their lives and actions, by suffering themselves to be corrupted with sordid avarice.
[5] It is Cæsar himself that lays this blame on Pompey.—De Bello Civili, iii. 17.

being a body made up of so many members, it is impossible for it to move in this fury with so exact a motion as not to break the order of battle, and that the readiest are engaged before their fellows can come up to relieve them. In that disgraceful battle betwixt the two Persian brothers, the Lacædemonian, Clearchus, who commanded the Greeks of Cyrus's party, led them on gently, and without precipitation, to the charge; but coming within fifty paces, put them to full speed, hoping, in so short a career, both to preserve their order, to husband their breath, and, at the same time, to give the advantage of impetuosity both to their persons and their missive arms.[1] Others have regulated this question in charging, thus; "if your enemy come running upon you, stand firm to receive him; if he stand to receive you, run full drive upon him."[2]

Whether it is best for a prince to wait for his enemy in his own territory, or to go and attack him upon his.

In the expedition of the Emperor, Charles the Fifth, into Provence, King Francis was put to choose whether to go meet him in Italy, or to await him in his own dominions; and though he well considered of how great advantage it was to preserve his own territories entire, and clear from the troubles of war, to the end that, being unexhausted of her stores, it might continually supply men and money at need; that the necessity of war requires at every turn to spoil and lay waste the country before them, which cannot very well be done upon one's own; besides which, the country people do not so easily digest such havoc by those of their own party as from an enemy, so that seditions and commotions might by such means be kindled amongst us; that the license of pillage and plunder, which is not to be tolerated at home, is a great ease and refreshment against the fatigues and sufferings of war; and that he who has no other prospect of gain than his bare pay will hardly be kept from running home, being but two steps from his wife and his own house; that he who lays the cloth is ever at the charge of the feast; that there is more alacrity in assaulting than defending: and that the shock of the loss of a battle in our own bowels is so violent as to endanger the disjointing of the whole body, there being no passion so contagious as that of fear, that is so easily believed, or that so suddenly diffuses itself; and that the cities that should hear the rattle of this tempest, that should take in their captains and soldiers, still trembling and out of breath, would be in danger, in this heat and hurry, to precipitate themselves upon some untoward resolution: notwithstanding all this, he chose to recal the forces he had beyond the mountains, and to suffer the enemy to c[illegible]m.

For he might, on the other hand, imagine that, being at home, and amongst his friends, he could not fail of plenty of all manner of conveniences; the rivers and passes he had at his devotion would bring him in both provisions and money in all security, and without the trouble of convoy; that he should find his subjects by so much the more affectionate to him, by how much their danger was more near and pressing; that having so many cities and barriers to secure him, it would be in his power to give battle at his own opportunity and best advantage; and, if it pleased him to delay the time, that under covert, and at his own ease, he might see his enemy founder and defeat himself with the difficulties he was certain to encounter, being engaged in an enemy's country, where before, behind, and on every side, war would be upon him; no means to refresh himself, or to enlarge his quarters, should disease infest them, or to lodge his wounded men in safety. No money, no victuals, but all at the point of the lance; no leisure to repose and take breath; no knowledge of the ways or country, to secure him from ambushes and surprises; and, in case of losing a battle, no possible means of saving the remains.[3] Neither is there want of example in both these cases.

Scipio thought it much better to go and attack his enemy's territories in Africa than to stay at home to defend his own, and fight him in Italy, where he then was; and it succeeded well with him. But, on the contrary, Hannibal, in the same war, ruined himself, by abandoning the conquest of a strange country, to go and defend his own. The Athenians, having left the enemy in their own dominions, to go over into Sicily, were not favoured by fortune in their design; but Agathocles, King of Syracuse, found her favourable to him, when he went over into Africa, and left the war at home.

Thus we are wont to conclude, and with reason, that events, especially in war, do for the most part depend upon fortune, who will not be governed by, nor submit unto, human reason or prudence, according to the poet,

> Et male consultis pretium est; prudentia fallax.
> Nec fortuna probat causas, sequiturque merentes,
> Sed vaga per cunctos nullo discrimine fertur.
> Scilicet est aliud, quod nos cogatque regatque
> Majus, et in proprias ducat mortalia leges.[4]
>
> "Prudence deceitful and uncertain is,
> Ill counsels sometimes hit, where good ones miss;
> Though Fortune sometimes the best cause approves,
> Adverse and wildly she as often roves.
> To that some greater and more constant cause
> Rules and subjects all mortals to its laws."

But, to take the thing right, it should seem that our counsels and deliberations depend as much upon fortune as anything we do, and that she engages our very reason in her uncertainty and confusion. "We argue rashly and adventurously," says Timæus in Plato, "because, as well as ourselves, our reason has a great share in the temerity of chance."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

OF DESTRIERS.

HERE am I become a grammarian—I, who never learned any language but by rote, and who do not yet know adjective, conjunctive, or ablative. I think I have read that the Romans had a sort of horses, by them called Funales, or Dextrarios,[1] which were either led-horses, or relay-horses, to be taken fresh upon occasions; and thence it is that we call our horses of service Destriers: and our romances commonly use the phrase of Adestrer for Accompagner, to accompany. They also called those horses Desultorios Equos, which were taught to run full speed side by side, without bridle or saddle, so as that the Roman gentlemen, armed at all points, would shift and throw themselves from the one to the other. The Numidian men-at-arms had always a led-horse in one hand, besides that they rode upon, to change in the heat of battle. Quibus, desultorum in modum, binos trahentibus equos, inter acerrimam sæpe pugnam in recentem equum, ex fesso, armatis transsultare mos erat: tanta velocitas ipsis, tamque docile equorum genus.[2] "Whose custom it was, leading along two horses, after the manner of the Desultorii, armed as they were, in the heat of fight, to vault from a tired horse to a fresh one; so active were the men, and the horses so doeile." There are many horses trained to help their riders, so as to run upon any one that presents a drawn sword, to fall both teeth and heels upon any that front or oppose them. But it often falls out that they do more harm to their friends than their enemies; besides that you cannot reduce them again into order, when they are once engaged and grappled; so that you remain at the mercy of their quarrel. It happened very unfortunately to Artybius, general of the Persian army, fighting man to man with Onesilus, King of Salamis, to be mounted upon a horse taught in this school; for it was the occasion of his death; the squire of Onesilus cleaving him down with a scythe betwixt the shoulders, as the horse was reared up upon his master.[3] And what the Italians report, that, in the battle of Fornuova, King Charles's horse, with kicks and plunges, disengaged his master from the enemy that pressed upon him, without which he had been slain, seems a strange effect of chance, if it be true.[4] The Mamelukes make their boast that they have the most adroit horses of any cavalry in the world; that by nature and custom they are taught to know and distinguish the enemy, whom they are to fall foul upon with mouth and heels, according to a word or sign given; as also to gather up, with their teeth, darts and lances scattered upon the field, and present them to their riders, according as he orders. 'Tis said of Cæsar, and also of the great Pompey, that, amongst their other excellent qualities, they were both excellent horsemen, and particularly of Cæsar, that, in his youth, being mounted on the bare back of a horse, without saddle or bridle, he could make him run, stop, and turn, with his hands behind him.[5] As Nature designed to make of this personge, and of Alexander, two miracles of military art, you may say she did her utmost to arm them after an extraordinary manner. For every one knows that Alexander's horse, Bucephalus, had a head inclining to the shape of a bull, that he would suffer himself to be mounted nor accoutred by none but his master, and that he was so honoured after his death as to have a city erected to his name. Cæsar had also another, that had fore-feet like the hands of a man, his hoof being divided in the form of fingers, which likewise was not to be ridden by any but Cæsar himself; who, after his death, dedicated his statue to the goddess Venus.[6]

I do not willingly alight when I am once on horseback; for it is the place where, whether well or sick, I find myself most at ease. Plato recommends it for health,[7] and also Pliny says it is good for the stomach and the joints.[8] Let us pursue the matter a little further, since we have entered upon it.

Riding a very wholesome exercise.

We read, in Xenophon, a law forbidding any one, who was master of a horse, to travel on foot.[9] Trogus and Justin say,[10] that the Parthians were wont to perform all offices and [4] In the narrative which Philip de Comines has given of this battle (viii. 6.), in which he himself was present, he tells us of wonderful performances by the horse on which the king was mounted. The name of the horse was Savoy, and it was the most beautiful horse he had ever seen. During the battle the king was personally attacked, when he had nobody near him but a valet de chambre, a little fellow, and not well armed. "The king," says Philip de Comines, "had the best horse under him in the world, and therewith he stood his ground bravely, till a number of his men, not a great way from him, arrived at the critical minute, when the Italians ran away." This does not seem very contradictory to what the [illegible], that, had it not been for his horse, King Charles [illegible] been lost.

ceremonies, not only in war, but also all affairs, whether public or private, make bargains, confer, entertain, take the air, and all on horseback; and that the greatest distinction betwixt freemen and slaves amongst them was that the one rode on horseback and the other went on foot: an institution of which King Cyrus was the founder.

There are several examples in the Roman History (and Suetonius more particularly remarks it in Cæsar[1]) of captains who, in pressing occasions, commanded their cavalry to alight, both by that means to take from them all hopes of flight, as also for the advantage they hoped for in this sort of fight. Quo, haud dubie, superat Romanus: "Wherein the Romans did, questionless, excel;" says Livy.[2] The first thing they did to prevent insurrections in the nations of new conquest was to take from them their arms and horses: and therefore it is that we so often meet in Cæsar: Arma proferri, jumenta produci, obsides dari jubet.[3] "He commanded the arms to be produced, the horses brought out, and hostages to be given." The Grand Seignior, to this day, suffers not a Christian or a Jew to keep a horse of his own throughout his empire.

Inconvenience of fighting on horseback.

Our ancestors, particularly at the time they had war with the English, in all their greatest engagements and pitched battles fought for the most part on foot, that they might have nothing but their own strength and courage to trust to in a quarrel of so great concern as life and honour. You stake (whatever Chrysanthes in Xenophon says to the contrary) your valour and your fortune upon that of your horse; his wound or death brings you into the same danger; his fear or fury shall make you rash or cowardly; if he have an ill mouth, or will not answer to the spur, your honour must answer it.[4] And, therefore, I do not think it strange that those battles were more firm and furious than those that are fought on horseback:

> Cedebant pariter, pariterque ruebant
> Victores victique; neque his fuga nota, neque illis:[5]
>
> "By turns they quit their ground, by turns advance,
> Victors and vanquished, in the various field,
> Nor wholly overcome, nor wholly yield:"

their battles were much better contested: now-a-days there are nothing but routs;—Primus clamor atque impetus rem decernit.[6] "The first shout, or the first charge, settles the business." And the arms we make use of in so great a hazard should be as much as possible at our own command; wherefore I should advise to choose them of the shortest, and such of which we are able to give the best account. A man may repose more confidence in a sword he holds in his hand than in a bullet he discharges out of a pistol, wherein there must be a concurrence of several executions to make it perform its office, the powder, the stone, and the wheel, if any of which fail, it endangers your fortune. The blow a man strikes himself, is much surer than that which the air carries for him:

> Et quo ferre velint, permittere vulnera venfis:
> Ensis habet vires; et gens quæcumque virorum est,
> Bella gerit gladiis.[7]
>
> "Far off with bows
> They shoot, and where it lists the wind bestows
> Their wounds; but the sword-fight does strength require,
> All manly nations the sword-fight desire."

But of that weapon I shall speak more fully when I come to compare the arms of the ancients with our own; the astonishment of the ear excepted, which every one grows familiar with in a little time, I look upon it as a weapon of very little execution, and hope we shall one day lay it aside. That missile weapon which the Italians formerly made use of, both with fire and without, was much more terrible. They called a certain kind of javelin, armed at the point with an iron three feet long, that it might pierce through and through an armed man, phalarica, which they sometimes in the field threw by hand, sometimes from engines, for the defence of beleagured places; the shaft whereof being rolled round with flax, wax, rosin, oil, and other combustible matter, took fire in its flight, and, lighting upon the body of a man, or his target, took away all the use of arms and limbs. And yet, coming to close fight, I should think they would also endamage the assailant, and that the field being covered with these flaming truncheons, would produce a common inconvenience to the whole crowd:

The use of the phalarica, a weapon of the ancient Italians.

> Magnum stridens contorta phalarica venit,
> Fulminis acta modo.[8]
>
> "A knotted lance, large, heavy, strong,
> Which roared like thunder as it whirled along."

They had, moreover, other devices which custom made them perfect in, but which seem incredible to us who have not used them, by which they produced the effects of our powder and shot. They darted their heavy spears with so great force as oft-times transfixed two targets, and two armed men at once, and pinned them together. Neither was the effect of their slings less certain or speedy. Saxis globosis... funda, mare apertum incessentes... caronas modici circuli, magno ex intervallo loci, assueti trajicere, non capita modo hostium vulnerabant, sed quem locum destinassent.[9] "Culling round stones from the shore for their slings, and with them practising at a great distance to throw through a circle of very small circumference, they would not only wound an enemy in the head, but hit any other part at pleasure." Their pieces of battery had not only the execution, but the thunder of our cannon:—Ad ictus mœnium cum terribili sonitu editos, pavor et trepidatio cepit.[1] "At the battering of the walls, which is performed with a dreadful noise, the defenders began to fear and tremble." The Gauls, our kinsmen, in Asia, abominated these treacherous missile arms, it being their use to fight with greater bravery, hand to hand. Non tam patentibus plagis moventur . . . ubi latior quam altior plaga est, etium gloriosius se pugnare putant: iidem, quum aculeus sagittæ aut glandis abditæ introrsus tenui vulnere in speciem urit . . . tum in rabiem et pudorem, tam parvo perimentis pestis versi, prosternunt corpora humi.[2] "They are not so much concerned at large wounds; when a wound is wider than deep, they think they have fought with greater glory; but when they find themselves tormented with a slight wound with the point of a dart, or some concealed glandulous body, then, transported with fury and shame, to perish by so mean a messenger of death, they fall to the ground;" a representation something very like a musket-shot. The ten thousand Greeks, in their long and famous retreat, met with a nation who very much galled them with great and strong bows, carrying arrows so long that, taking them up, one might return them back like a dart, and with them pierce a buckler and an armed man through and through.[3] The engines that Dionysius invented at Syracuse, to shoot vast massy darts, and stones of a prodigious size, with impetuosity,[4] and at a great distance, came very near to our modern inventions.

But don't let us forget the pleasant posture of one Maistre Pierre Pol, a doctor of divinity, whom Monstrelet reports always to have rode through the streets of Paris, aside upon his mule, like a woman. He says also, elsewhere, that the Gascons had terrible horses that would wheel in their full speed, which the French, Picards, Flemings, and Brabanters looked upon as a miracle, "having never seen the like before;" these are his very words.[5] Cæsar speaking of the Suabians:[6] "in the charges they make on horseback," says he, "they often throw themselves off to fight on foot, having taught their horses not to stir in the mean time from the place, to which they presently run again upon occasion; and, according to their custom, nothing is so unmanly and so base as to use saddles or pads, and they despise such as make use of them; insomuch that, though but a very few in number, they fear not to attack a great many." That which I have formerly wondered at, to see a horse made to perform all his airs with a switch only, and the reins upon his neck, was common with the Massilians, who rode their horses without saddle or bridle.

The Massilians, a people of Africa, ride on horses without saddle or bridle.

> Et gens, quæ nudo residens Massylia dorso,
> Ora levi flectit, frænorum nescia, virga.[7]
> Et Numidæ infræni cinguntⁿ.[8]
>
> "Massilians, who unsaddled horses ride,
> And with a switch, not knowing bridles, guide
> The rapid steed; and fierce Numidians, too,
> That use no rein, begirt us round."

Equi sine frœnis; deformis ipse cursus, rigida cervice, et extento capite currentium.[9] "The career of a horse without a bridle must needs be ungraceful, his neck being extended stiff, and his nose thrust out."

King Alphonso,[10] he who first instituted the order of the Chevaliers de la Bande, or, de l' Escharpe, amongst other rules of the order, gave them this, That they should never ride mule or mulet, upon a penalty of a mark of silver, which I read lately in Guevara's letters, of which, whoever gave them the title of Golden Epistles, had another kind of opinion than I have. "The Courtier"[11] says that, till his time, it was a disgrace to a gentleman to ride one of those creatures. But the Abyssinians, on the contrary, as they are nearer advanced to the person of Prester John, their prince, affect to ride large mules for the greater dignity and grandeur.

To ride on mules honourable or dishonourable in different countries.

Xenophon tells us[12] that the Assyrians were fain to keep their horses fettered in the stable, they were so fierce and vicious; and that it required so much time to loose and harness them that, to avoid any disorder this tedious preparation might bring upon them, in case of surprise, they never sat down in their camp till it was first well fortified with ditches and ramparts. His Cyrus, who was so great a master of equestrian exercises, made his horses pay their shot, and never suffered them to have anything till first they had earned it by the sweat of some kind of work. The Scythians, when in the field, and in scarcity of provisions, used to let their horses'

Those of Crete, being besieged by Metellus, were in so great necessity for drink that they were fain to quench their thirst with their horses' urine.[2]

How the Turkish armies subsist.

And to show how much cheaper the Turkish armies support themselves than ours do, 'tis said that, besides that the soldiers drink nothing but water and eat nothing but rice and salt flesh pulverised (of which every one may easily carry about with him a month's provision), they can feed upon the blood of their horses as well as the Muscovites and Tartars, and salt it for their use.

Horses as much esteemed by the Americans as by the Spaniards themselves.

These new discovered Indians, when the Spaniards first landed amongst them, had so great an opinion both of the men and horses that they looked upon them equally as gods, or at least animals ennobled above their own nature: insomuch that some of them, after they were subdued, coming to the soldiers to sue for peace and pardon, and to bring them gold and provisions, failed not to offer the same to the horses, with the same kind of harangue to them which they had made to the men, interpreting their neighing for a language of truce and friendship.

In the other Indies to ride upon an elephant was anciently the highest honour; the second to ride in a coach with four horses; the third to ride upon a camel, and the last and lowest to be carried or drawn by one horse only.[3] One of our late writers tells us that he has been in a country in those parts where they ride upon oxen with pads, stirrups, and bridles, and that he found this equipage very much to his ease.

Quintus Fabius Maximus Rutilianus,[4] in a battle with the Samnites, seeing his cavalry, after three or four charges, had failed of breaking into the enemies' main body, took this course—to make them unbridle all their horses, and spur their horses with all their might, so that, having nothing to check their career, they might through weapons and men open the way for his foot, who by that means gave them a bloody defeat. The same command was given by Quintus Fulvius Flaccus against the Celtiberians: Id cum majore vi equorum facietis, si effrœnatos in hostes equos immittitis; quod sæpè Romanos equites cum laude fecisse suâ memoriæ proditum est. . . . . Détractisque frœnis, bis ultro citroque cum magna strage hostium, infractis omnibus hastis, transcurrerunt.[5] "You will do your business with greater advantage of your horses' strength if you spur them unbridled upon the enemy, as it is recorded the Roman horse to their great glory have often done. . . . . And their bits being pulled off without breaking a lance, they charged through and through with great slaughter of the enemy."

Mare's milk the delight of the Tartars.

The Duke of Muscovy was anciently obliged to pay this reverence to the Tartars, that when they sent any embassy to him he went out to meet the ambassadors on foot, and presented them with a goblet of mare's milk (a beverage of greatest esteem among them); and if, in drinking, a drop fell by chance upon the horse's mane, he was bound to lick it off with his tongue.[6] The army that Bajazet had sent into Russia was overwhelmed with so dreadful a tempest of snow that, to shelter and preserve themselves from freezing, many ripped up and embowelled their horses, to creep into their bellies and enjoy the benefit of that vital heat. Bajazet, after that furious battle wherein he was overthrown by Tamerlane,[7] was in a hopeful way of securing his own person by the fleetness of an Arabian mare he had under him, had he not been constrained to let her drink her fill at the ford of a river in his way, which rendered her so heavy and indisposed that he was afterwards easily overtaken by those that pursued him. They say, indeed, that to let a horse stale takes him off his mettle; but I should rather have thought that drinking would have refreshed her and revived her spirits.

Crœsus, marching his army over a common near Sardis, met with an infinite number of serpents, which the horses devoured with great appetite, and which Herodotus says[8] was a bad omen to his affairs.

We call a horse cheval entier that has his mane and ears entire, and no other will pass muster. The Lacedæmonians having defeated the Athenians in Sicily, returning triumphant from the victory into the city of Syracusa, amongst other bravadoes caused all the horses they had taken to be shorn and led in triumph.[9] Alexander fought with a nation called Dahæ; a people whose discipline it was to march two and two together, armed and on horseback, to the war; but being in fight, one always alighted, and so they fought one while on horseback and another on foot, one after another, by turns.[10]

Horses clipped to be led in triumph.

I do not think that for good and graceful riding any nation excels the French, though a good horseman, according to our way of speaking, seems rather to respect the courage of the man than his horsemanship and address in riding. The most knowing in that art that ever I knew, that had the best seat and the best method in taming a horse, was Monsieur de Carnavalet, who served our King Henry the Second in this respect. I have seen a man ride with both his feet upon the saddle, take off the saddle, and at his return take it up again, refit and remount it, riding all the while full speed; having gallopped over a cap, make at it very good shots backward with his bow, take up anything from the ground, setting one foot down and the other in the stirrup, with twenty other apes' tricks, which he got his living by.

Instances of the wonderful dexterity of riders.

There has been seen in my time at Constantinople two men upon a horse, who, in the height of his speed, would throw themselves off and into the saddle again by turn; and one who bridled and saddled his horse with nothing but his teeth. Another, who betwixt two horses, one foot upon one saddle and another upon the other, carrying another man upon his shoulders, would ride full career; the other standing bolt upright upon him, making excellent shots with his bow. Several who would ride full speed with their heels upwards and their heads upon the saddle, betwixt the rows of scimitars fixed in the harness. When I was a boy the Prince of Sulmona, riding a rough horse at Naples to all his airs, held reals under his knees and toes as if they had been nailed there, to shew the firmness of his seat.

CHAPTER XLIX.

OF ANCIENT CUSTOMS.

I SHOULD willingly pardon our people for admitting no other pattern or rule of perfection than their own peculiar manners and customs, it being a common vice not of the vulgar only, but almost of all men, to look upon their own country's fashions as the best. I am content when they see Fabricius or Lælius, that they look upon their countenance and behaviour as barbarous, seeing they are neither clothed nor fashioned according to our mode. But I find fault with their especial indiscretion in suffering themselves to be so imposed upon and blinded by the authority of the present custom, as every month to alter their opinion, if custom so require, and that they should so vary their judgment in their own particular concern. When they wore the belly-pieces of their doublets as high as their breast, they stiffly maintained that they were in their proper place. Some years after they were slipped down between their thighs, and then they laughed at the former fashion as uneasy and intolerable. The new fashion in use makes them absolutely condemn the old with so great a warmth, and so universal a contempt, that a man would think there was a kind of madness crept in amongst them, that infatuates their understandings to this strange degree. Now seeing that our change of fashions is so prompt and sudden that the inventions of all the tailors in the world cannot furnish out new whim-whams enough, there will often be a necessity that the old despised ones must again come in vogue, and again fall into contempt; and that the same judgment must, in the space of fifteen or twenty years, take up not only different, but contrary, opinions, with an incredible lightness and inconstancy. There is not any of us so discreet that suffers not himself to be gulled with this contradiction, and both in external and internal sight to be insensibly blinded.

The French very changeable in their dress.

I will here muster up some old customs that I have in memory; some of them the same with ours, others different, to the end that, bearing in mind this continual variation of human things, we may have our judgments clearer and more firmly settled.

The use amongst us of fighting with rapier and cloak, was in practice amongst the Romans also: Sinistras sagis involvunt, gladiosque distringunt,[1] "They wrapped their cloaks round the left arm, and wielded the sword with the right," says Cæsar; and he mentions an old vicious custom of our nation, which continues yet amongst us, which is to stop passengers we meet upon the road, to compel them to give an account who they are, and to take it for an injury and just cause of quarrel if they refuse to do it.[2]

The practice of the ancient Romans to fight with rapier and cloak.

At the bath, which the ancients made use of every day before they went to dinner, and, indeed, as frequently as we wash our hands, they at first only bathed their arms and legs,[3] but afterwards, and by a custom that has continued for many ages in most nations of the world, they bathed stark naked in mixed and perfumed water, so that it became a mark of great simplicity of life to bathe in pure water. The most delicate and affected perfumed themselves all over three or four times a day. They often caused all their hair to be pulled out, as the women of France have some time since taken up a fancy to do their foreheads,

The ancients bathed every day before dinner.

Quod pectus, quod crura tibi, quod brachia vellis,[4]
"How dost thou twitch thy breast, thy arms and thighs," though they had ointments proper for that purpose.

Psilotro nitet, aut acida latet oblita creta;[5]

Her rank pores up in a dry crust of chalk."

They delighted to lie soft, and allowed it for a great testimony of hardiness to lie upon a mattrass;[1] they all lying upon beds, much after the manner of the Turks in this age.

Inde toro pater Æneas sic orsus ab alto.[2]

"Then thus Æneas from his bed of state."

And 'tis said of the younger Cato, that, after the battle of Pharsalia, being entered into a melancholic disposition at the ill posture of the public affairs, he took his food always sitting, assuming a strict and austere course of life.[3] It was also their custom to kiss the hands of great persons by way of honouring and caressing them: and meeting with their equals, they always kissed in salutation, as do the Venetians:

Gratatusque darem cum dulcibus oscula verbis;[4]

"And kindest words I would with kisses mix."

In petitioning or saluting any great man, they used to lay their hands upon his knees. Pasicles, the philosopher, brother of Crates, instead of laying his hand upon the knee, laid it upon the private parts, and being roughly repulsed by him to whom he addressed himself, "What!" said he; "is not that part your own, as well as the other?"[5] They used to eat their fruit as we do, after dinner. They cleaned themselves after stool with a sponge, which is the reason that spongia is a smutty word in Latin; which sponge was also fastened to the end of a stick, as appears by the story of him who, as he was led along to be thrown to the wild beasts in the sight of the people, asked leave to do his business, and, having no other way to dispatch himself, forced the sponge and stick down his own throat, and choaked himself.[6] They used to terge after coition with perfumed wool:—

At tibi nil faciam; sed lota mentula lana.[7]

They placed in the streets of Rome certain vessels and little tubs for passengers to make water in:

Puri sæpe lacum propter, se, ac dolia curta,
Somno devincti, credunt extollere vestem.[8]

They had collation betwixt meals. There were in summer persons who made a business of selling snow to cool the wine; and some there were who made use of snow in winter, not thinking their wine cool enough even at that season of the year. The men of quality had their cup-bearers and carvers, and their buffoons to make them sport; they had their meat served up in winter upon a sort of chafing dishes which were set upon the table, and had portable kitchens (of which I myself have seen some), wherein all their service was carried after them.

They cooled their wine with snow.

They had portable kitchens;

Has vobis epulas habete, lauti:
Nos offendimur ambulante cœna.[9]

"Those feasts to you may pleasure be,
But walking suppers suit not me."

In summer they had a contrivance to bring fresh and clear rills through their lower rooms, wherein were great store of living fish which the guests took out with their own hands to be dressed, every man according to his own liking.[10] Fish has ever had this pre-eminence, and keeps it still, that even great men pretend to be cooks in their favour; and indeed, the taste is more delicate than that of flesh, at least to me. But in all sorts of magnificence, debauchery, and voluptuous inventions of effeminacy and expense, we do, in truth, all we can to equal them (for our wills are as corrupt as theirs), but we want power to reach them; we are no more able to parallel them in their vicious, than in their virtuous, qualities; for both the one and the other proceed from a vigour of soul which was, without comparison, greater in them than in us; and souls by how much the weaker they are, by so much have they less power to do very well, or very ill.

The place of honour amongst them was the middle. The name going before or following after, either in writing or speaking, had no signification of grandeur, as is evident by their writings. They as readily said "Oppius and Cæsar," as "Cæsar and Oppius;" and "me and thee" indifferently with "thee and me." This is the reason that made me formerly take notice in the life of Flaminius, in our French translation of Plutarch, of one passage, where it seems as if the author, speaking of the jealousy of glory betwixt the Ætolians and Romans, as to the winning of a battle they had with their joint forces obtained, made it of some importance that in the Greek songs they had put the Ætolians before the Romans; if there be no amphibology in the words of the French version.

The most honourable place among the Romans.

The ladies in their baths made no scruple of admitting men amongst them, and moreover made use of their serving-men to rub and anoint them:

The men and women bathed together.

Inguina succinctus nigra tibi servus aluta
Stat, quoties calidis nuda foveris aquis.[1]

"Whene'er her body in the bath she laves,
Her naked limbs are 'nointed by men slaves."

They powdered themselves with a certain powder, to moderate perspiration.

The ancient Gauls, says Sidonius Apollinaris,[2] wore their hair long before, and quite short behind, a fashion that begins to be revived by this vicious and effeminate age.

The Romans paid their watermen at embarking.

The Romans used to pay the watermen their fare at their first stepping into the boat, which we never do till after landing:

Dum æs exigitur, dum mula ligatur,
Tota abit hora.[3]

"Whilst the fare's paying, and the mule is tied,
A whole hour's time, at least, away doth slide."

The women used to lie on that side the bed next the wall; and for that reason they called Cæsar, Spondam Regis Nicomedis.[4]

They took breath in their drinking, and watered their wine:

Quis puer ocius
Restinguet ardentis falerni
Pocula prætereunte lympha?[5]

"To cool our wine, the boy shall bring Fresh water from the limpid spring."

And the roguish looks and gestures of our lacqueys were also in use amongst them.

O Jane! a tergo quem nulla ciconia pinsit,
Nec manus auriculas imitata est mobilis altas,
Nec linguæ, quantum sitiat canis Appula, tantum.[6]

"O Janus! happy in thy double face!
Safe and protected from unseen grimace!
From pecking finger, and from gibes and sneers,
Provok'd by wagging hands, like asses' ears,
From lolling tongue, such as the Appulian hound,
Panting with thirst, drops almost to the ground."

The Argian and Roman ladies always mourned in white,[7] as ours did formerly; and should do still, were I to govern in this point. But there are whole books might be made on this subject.

CHAPTER L.

OF DEMOCRITUS AND HERACLITUS.

The judgment active in every thing.

The judgment is an utensil proper for all subjects, and will have an oar in every thing: which is the reason that, in these Essays, I take hold of all occasions. If I light on a subject I do not very well understand, I try, however, sounding it at a distance; and, if I find it too deep for my stature, I keep me on the firm shore. And this knowledge, that a man can proceed no further, is one effect of its virtue; aye, and one on which it prides itself the most. Sometimes, in an idle and frivolous subject, I try to find out matter whereof to compose a body, and then to prop and support it. Another while I employ it in a noble subject, one that has been tossed and tumbled by a thousand hands, wherein a man can hardly possibly introduce any thing of his own, the way being so beaten on every side that he must of necessity walk in the steps of another. In such a case, 'tis the work of the judgment to take the way that seems best, and, of a thousand paths, to determine that this or that was the best chosen. I leave the choice of my arguments to Fortune, and take that she first presents me; they are all alike to me; I never design to go through any of them; for I never see all of any thing: neither do they who so largely promise to shew it others. Of a hundred members and faces that every thing has, I take one—one while to look it over only, another while to ripple up the skin, and sometimes to pinch it to the bones; I give a stab, not so wide, but as deep as I can; and most frequently like to take it in hand by some less-used light. Did I know myself less, I might, perhaps, venture to handle something or other to the bottom, and to be deceived in my own inability, but sprinkling here one word, and there another, patterns cut from several pieces, and scattered without design, and without engaging myself too far, I am not responsible for them, or obliged to keep close to my subject, without varying it at my own liberty and pleasure, and giving up myself to doubt and uncertainty, and to my own governing method, ignorance.

The mind is discovered in all its motions.

All motion discovers us. The very same soul of Cæsar, that made itself so conspicuous in marshalling and commanding the battle of Pharsalia, was also seen as solicitous and busy in the softer affairs of love. A man judges of a horse not only by seeing him caracol and exhibit airs in the riding-school, but by his walk, nay, and by seeing him stand in the stable.

Amongst the functions of the soul there are some of a lower and meaner form, and he who does not see her in those inferior offices, as well as those of nobler note, is never fully acquainted with her; and peradventure she is best discovered where she moves her own natural pace. The winds of the passions take most hold of her in her highest flights; and the rather, by reason that she wholly applies herself to, and exercises her whole virtue upon, each particular subject, and never handles more than one thing at a time, and that not according to it, but according to herself. Things in respect to themselves have peradventure their weight, measure, and condition; but when we once take them into us, the soul forms them as she pleases. Death is terrible to Cicero, coveted by Cato, and indifferent to Socrates. Health, conscience, authority, knowledge, riches, beauty, and their contraries, do all strip themselves at their entering into us, and receive a new robe, and of another fashion, from the soul; brown, bright, green, dark; sharp, sweet, deep, or superficial, as best pleases each particular soul, for they are not agreed upon any common standard of forms, rules, or proceedings; every one is a queen in her own dominions. Let us therefore no more excuse ourselves upon the external qualities of things, it belongs to us to give ourselves an account of them. Our good or ill has no other dependence but on ourselves. 'Tis there that our offerings and our vows are due, and not to fortune: she has no power over our manners; on the contrary, they draw and make her follow in her train, and cast her in their own mould. Why should not I judge Alexander, roaring and drinking at the rate he sometimes used to do? Or, if he played at chess, what string of his soul was not touched by this idle and childish game? I hate and avoid it because it is not play enough—that it is too grave and serious a diversion; and I am ashamed to lay out as much thought and study upon that as would serve to much better uses. He did not more pump his brains about his glorious expedition into the Indies; and another, that I will not name, took not more pains to unravel a passage upon which depends the safety of all mankind. To what a degree then does this ridiculous diversion molest the soul, when all her faculties shall be summoned together upon this trivial account? And how fair an opportunity she herein gives every one to know, and to make a right judgment of, himself? I do not more thoroughly sift myself in any other posture than this. What passion are we exempted from in this insignificant game? Anger, spite, malice, impatience, and a vehement desire of getting the better in a matter wherein it were more excusable to be ambitious of being overcome: for to be eminent, and to excel above the common rate in frivolous things, is nothing becoming in a man of quality and honour. What I say in this example may be said in all others. Every particle, every employment of man, does exhibit and accuse him equally with any other.

It gives things what shape and colour it pleases.

Montaigne's opinion of chess.

The game may help us to know ourselves.

Democritus and Heraclitus were two philosophers, of which the first, thinking human condition ridiculous and vain, never appeared abroad but with a jeering and laughing countenance: whereas Heraclitus, commiserating that condition of ours, appeared always with a sorrowful look and tears in his eyes.

Democritus and Heraclitus, their different humours.

> Alter
> Ridebat, quoties à limine moverat unum
> Protuleratque pedem; flebat contrarius alter.[1]
>
> "One always, when he o'er his threshold stept, > Laugh'd at the world, the other always wept."

I am clearly for the first humour; not because it is more pleasant to laugh than to weep, but because it is more contemptuous, and expresses more condemnation than the other; for I think we can never be sufficiently despised to our desert. Compassion and bewailing seem to imply some esteem of, and value for, the thing bemoaned: whereas the things we laugh at are by that expressed to be of no moment. I do not think that we are so unhappy as we are vain, or have in us so much malice as folly: we are not so full of mischief as inanity, nor so miserable as we are vile and mean. And therefore Diogenes, who passed away his time in rolling himself in his tub, and made nothing of the great Alexander, esteeming us no better than flies, or bladders puffed up with wind, was a sharper and more penetrating, and consequently, in my opinion, a juster judge than Timon, surnamed the Man-hater; for what a man hates he lays to heart. This last was furious against mankind, passionately desired our ruin, and avoided our conversation as dangerous, and proceeding from wicked and depraved natures: the other valued us so little that we could neither trouble nor infect him by our contagion, and left us to herd with one another, not out of fear, but contempt of our society, concluding us as incapable of doing good as ill.

Diogenes and Timon the Man-hater.

Of the same strain was Statilius's answer when Brutus courted him to the the conspiracy against Cæsar:— "He was satisfied that the enterprise was just, but he did not think mankind so considerable as to deserve a wise man's concern."[2] According to the doctrine of Hegesias, who said, "a wise man ought to do nothing but for himself, forasmuch as he only is worthy of it;"[3] and to that of Theodorus, "That it is not reasonable a wise man should hazard himself for his country, and endanger wisdom for a set of fools."[4] Our condition is as ridiculous as risible.

Why Statilius would not enter into the conspiracy against Cæsar.

CHAPTER LI.

ON THE VANITY OF WORDS.

A RHETORICIAN of times past said, That his profession was to make little things appear

[3] Laertius, in vitâ.

great. This also a shoemaker can do; he can make a great shoe for a little foot.[1] They would, in Sparta, have sent such a fellow to be whipped for making profession of a lying and deceitful art; and I fancy that Archidamus, who was king of that country, was a little surprised at the answer of Thucydides, when enquiring of him which was the better wrestler, Pericles or he, he replied, "That is hard to affirm; for when I have thrown him, he always persuades the spectators that he had no fall, and carries away the prize.[2]" They who paint and plaister up women, filling up their wrinkles and deformities, are less to blame, for it is no great loss not to see them in their natural complexion. Whereas these make it their business to deceive not our sight only, but our judgments, and to adulterate and corrupt the very essence of things. The republics that have maintained themselves in a regular and well-modelled government, such as those of Lacedæmon and Crete, had orators in no very great esteem.[3] Aristo did wisely define rhetoric to be "a science to persuade the people;[4]" Socrates and Plato[5] "an art to flatter and deceive." And those who deny it in the general description, verify it throughout in their precepts. The Mahometans will not suffer their children to be instructed in it, as being useless; and the Athenians, perceiving how pernicious the practice of it was, it being in their city of universal esteem, ordered the principal part, which is to move affections, to be taken away, with the exordiums and perorations. 'Tis an engine invented to manage and excite a disorderly and tumultuous rabble, and is never made use of but like physic, in a diseased state. In those governments where the vulgar or the ignorant, or both together, have been all-powerful, as in Athens, Rhodes, and Rome, and where the public affairs have been in a continual tempest of commotion, to such places have the orators always flocked. And, in truth, we find few persons in those republics who have pushed their fortunes to any great degree of eminence without the assistance of eloquence. Pompey, Cæsar, Crassus, Lucullus, Lentulus, and Metellus, have therein found their chiefest aid in mounting to that degree of authority to which they did at last arrive; making it of greater use to them than arms, contrary to the opinion of better times; for L. Volumnius, speaking publicly in favour of the election of Q. Fabius and Pub. Decius to the consular dignity:—"These are men," said he, "born for war, and great in execution; in the combat of the tongue altogether to seek; spirits truly consular. The subtle, eloquent, and learned are only good for the city to make prætors of, to administer justice."[6]

The art of rhetoric deceitful.

Eloquence flourished most at Rome, when the public affairs were in the worst condition, and the republic most disquieted with civil wars, as a free and untilled soil bears the worst weeds. By which it should seem that a monarchical government has less need of it than any other; for the stupidity and facility of the common people, which render them subject to be turned and twined, and led by the ears by this charming harmony of words, without weighing or considering the truth and reality of things by the force of reason;—this facility, I say, is not easily found in a single person, and it is also more easy, by good education and advice, to secure him from the impression of this poison. There never was any famous orator known to come out of Persia or Macedon.

When eloquence was most flourishing at Rome.

I have entered into this discourse upon the occasion of an Italian I lately received into my service, who was clerk of the kitchen to the late Cardinal Caraffa till his death. I put this fellow upon an account of his office; where he fell to discourse of this palate-science with such a settled countenance and magisterial gravity, as if he had been handling some profound point of divinity. He made a learned distinction of the several sorts of appetites, of that which a man has before he begins to eat, and of those after the second and third service; the means simply to satisfy the first, and then to raise and quicken the other two; the ordering of the sauces, first in general, and then proceeded to the qualities of the several ingredients and their effects. The difference of sallads, according to their seasons, which of them ought to be served up hot, and which cold; the manner of their garnishment and decoration, to render them yet more acceptable to the eye. After which he entered upon the order of the whole service, full of weighty and important considerations:

The palate-science pleasantly ridiculed.

Nec minimo sane discrimine refert,
Quo gestu lepores, et quo gallina secetur;[7]

"Nor with less criticism did observe
How we a hare, and how a hen, should carve."

And all this set out with lofty and magnificent words, the very same we make use of when we discourse of the government of an empire: which learned lecture of my man brought this of Terence to my memory:

Hoc salsum est, hoc adustum est, hoc lautum est parum:
Illud rectè; iterum sic memento: sedulo
Moneo, quæ possum, pro mea sapientia.
Postremo, tanquam in speculum, in patinas, Demea,
Inspicere jubeo, et moneo, quid facto usus sit.[8]

"This is too salt, this burnt; this is too plain,
That's well, remember to do so again.
Thus do I still advise to have things fit,
According to the talent of my wit.
And then, my Demea, I command my cook,
That into ev'ry dish he pry and look,
As if it were a mirror, and go on
To order all things as they should be done."

And yet even the Greeks themselves did very much admire and highly applaud the order and disposition that Paulus Æmilius observed in the feast he made for them at his return from Macedon.[1] But I do not here speak of effects; I speak of words only.

The language of architects.

I do not know whether it may have the same operation upon other men that it has upon me, but when I hear our architects thunder out their bombast words of pilasters, architraves, and cornices, of the Corinthian and Doric orders, and such like stuff, my imagination is presently possessed with the palace of Apollidonius;[2] when, after all, I find them but the paltry pieces of my own kitchen-door.

Of grammarians.

And to hear men talk of metonymies, metaphors, and allegories, and other grammar words, would not a man think they signified some rare and delicate and exotic form of speaking? yet these are terms which apply to the chatter of your chamber-maid.

Too lofty titles given to offices, and illustrious surnames misapplied to persons of mean talents.

And this other is a gullery of the same stamp, to call the offices of our kingdom by the lofty titles of the Romans, though they have no similitude of function, and still less authority or power. And this, also, which I doubt will one day turn to the reproach of our present age, unworthily and indifferently to confer upon any we think fit the most glorious surnames with which antiquity honoured but one or two persons in several ages.

Plato carried away the surname of Divine by so universal a consent that never any one repined at it, or attempted to take it from him. And yet the Italians, who pretend, and with good reason, to more sprightly wits and sounder judgments than the other nations of their time, have lately honoured Aretin with the same title; in whose writings, except it be a tumid phrase set out with some smart periods, ingenious indeed, but farfetched and fantastic, and some degree of eloquence, I see nothing above the ordinary writers of his time, so far is he from approaching the ancient divinity. And we make nothing of giving the surname of Great to princes that have nothing in them above a popular grandeur.

CHAPTER LII.

OF THE PARSIMONY OF THE ANCIENTS.

Attilius Regulus, general of the Roman army in Africa, in the height of all his glory and victories over the Carthaginians, wrote to the Republic to acquaint them that a certain peasant, whom he had left in charge of his estate, which was in all but seven acres of land, was run away with all his instruments of husbandry, entreating, therefore, that they would please to call him home, that he might take order in his own affairs, lest his wife and children should suffer. Whereupon the Senate appointed another to manage his business, caused his losses to be made good, and ordered his family to be maintained at the public expense.[3]

The elder Cato, returning consul from Spain, sold his war-horse, to save the money it would have cost in bringing him back by sea into Italy; and, being governor of Sardinia, made all his visitations on foot, without other attendant than one officer of the republic, to hold up the train of his gown, and carry a censer for sacrifices; and, for the most part, carried his mail himself. He bragged that he had never worn a gown that cost above ten crowns, nor had ever sent above ten-pence to the market for one day's provisions; and that, as to his country-houses, he had not one that was roughcast on the outside.[4]

Scipio Æmilianus, after two triumphs and two consulships, went an embassy with no more than seven servants in his train.[5] 'Tis said that Homer had never more than one, Plato three, and Zeno, founder of the sect of Stoics, none at all.[6] Tiberius Gracchus was allowed but fivepence-halfpenny a day when employed on a mission about the public affairs, and being at that time the greatest man of Rome.[7]

CHAPTER LIII.

OF A SAYING OF CÆSAR.

If we would sometimes bestow a little consideration upon ourselves, and employ that time in examining our own abilities which we spend in prying into other men's actions, and discovering things without us, we should soon perceive of how infirm and decaying materials this fabric of ours is composed. Is it not a singular testimony of imperfection that we cannot establish our satisfaction in any one thing, and that even our own fancy and desire should deprive us of the Man's imperfection demonstrated by the inconstancy of his desires.

[5] Val. Max. iv. 3, 13.

[6] Seneca, Consolat. ad Helviam, c. 12.

[7] Plutarch, in the Life of Tiberius Gracchus, cap. 4. But here Montaigne misemploys this passage, which makes nothing for his purpose; for Plutarch there says, expressly, that this little sum was allowed to Tiberius Gracchus purely to vex and mortify him.

power to choose what is most proper and useful for us? A very good proof of this is the great dispute that has ever been amongst the philosophers of finding out what is man's sovereign good—a dispute that continues yet, and will eternally continue, without solution or agreement.

Dum abest quod avemus, id exuperare videtur
Cætera; post aliud, cum contigit illud, avemus,
Et sitis æqua tenet.[1]

"Still with desire through Fancy's regions tost,
We seek new joys, and prize the absent most."

Whatever it is that falls within our knowledge and possession, we find it satisfies not, and we still pant after things to come, and unknown; and these because the present do not satiate us; not that, in my judgment, they have not in them wherewith to do it, but because we seize them with a weak and ill-regulated hold.

Nam cum vidit hic, ad victum quæ flagitat usus,
Et per quæ possent vitam consistere tutam,
Omnia jam ferme mortalibus esse parata;
Divitiis homines, et honore, et laude potentes
Affluere, atque bona natorum excellere fama;
Nec minus esse domi cuiquam tamen anxia corda,
Atque animum infestis cogi servire querelis:
Intellexit ibi vitium vas efficere ipsum,
Omniaque, illius vitio, corrumpere intus,
Quæ collata foris et commoda quæque venirent.[2]

"For when he saw all things that had regard
To life's subsistence for mankind prepar'd,
That men in wealth and honours did abound,
That with a noble race their joys were crown'd;
That yet they groan'd, with cares and fears oppress'd,
Each finding a disturber in his breast;
He then perceiv'd the fault lay hid in man,
In whom the bane of his own bliss began."

Our appetite is irresolute and fickle, it can neither keep nor enjoy any thing as it should. Man, concluding it to be the fault of the things he is possessed of, fills himself with, and feeds himself upon, the idea of things he neither knows nor understands, to which he devotes his hopes and his desires, paying them all reverence and honour, according to the saying of Cæsar: Communi fit vitio naturæ, ut invisis, latitantibus atque incognitis rebus magis confidamus, vehementiùsque exterreamur.[3] "'Tis the common vice of nature that we have the most confidence in and the greatest fear of, things unseen, concealed, and unknown."

CHAPTER LIV.

OF VAIN SUBTLETIES.

THERE are a sort of little knacks and frivolous subtleties from which men sometimes expect to derive reputation and applause; as the poets, who compose whole poems with every line beginning with the same letter. We see the shapes of eggs, globes, wings, and hatchets, cut out by the ancient Greeks by the measure of their verses, making them longer or shorter, to represent such or such a figure. Much in this manner did he spend his time who made it his business to compute into how many several ways the letters of the alphabet might be transposed, and found out that incredible number mentioned in Plutarch. I am mightily pleased with the humour of him who, having a man brought before him that had learned to throw a grain of millet with such dexterity as never to miss the eye of a needle; and being afterwards desired to give something for the reward of so rare an attainment, pleasantly, and in my opinion ingeniously, ordered several bushels of the same grain to be delivered to him, that he might not want wherewithal to exercise so famous an art.[4] 'Tis a strong evidence of a weak judgment when men approve of things for their being rare and new, or where virtue and usefulness are not conjoined to recommend them.

Poetry of an odd fancy.

I come just now from playing with my own family at who could find out the most things that were in use only in the two extremes: as Sire, which is a title given to the greatest person in the nation, the king, and also to the vulgar, as pedlars and mechanics, but never to any degree of men between. The women of great quality are all called Madam, inferior gentlewomen, Mademoiselle, and the meaner sort of women, Madam, as the first. The canopy of state over tables is not permitted but in the palaces of princes and in taverns. Democritus said that gods and beasts had sharper senses than men, who are of a middle form.[5] The Romans wore the same habit at funerals and at feasts.

Instances of things that are kept up by the two extremities.

It is certain that extreme fear and extreme ardour of courage do equally trouble and relax the stomach. The nickname of Trembling, with which they surnamed Sancho XII., King of Navarre, informs us that valour will cause a trembling in the limbs as well as fear. Those who were arming him or some other of a like nature, tried to compose him, by representing as less the danger he was going to engage himself in: "You understand me ill," said he; "for could my flesh know the danger my courage will presently carry it into, it would sink down to the ground." The faintness that surprises us from frigidity or dislike in the exercises of Venus are also occasioned by a too violent desire and an immoderate heat. Extreme cold and extreme heat boil and roast. Aristotle says that sows of lead melt and ran with cold in the extremity of winter as well as with a vehement heat.[6]

The very same effect produced by fear and by extraordinary courage.

Desire and satiety fill all the gradations above and below pleasure with pain. Stupidity and wisdom meet at the same centre of sentiment and resolution in the suffering of human mishaps: the wise control and triumph over ill, the others know it not. These last are, as a man may say, on this side of misfortune, the others are beyond them; who, after having well weighed and considered their qualities, measured and judged them what they are, by virtue of a vigorous soul, leap out of their reach. They disdain and trample them under foot, having a solid and well fortified soul, against which the darts of fortune coming to strike, they must of necessity rebound and blunt themselves, meeting with a body upon which they can fix no impression; the ordinary and middle conditions of men are lodged betwixt these two extremes, consisting of such who perceive evils, feel them, and are not able to support them. Infancy and decrepitude meet in the imbecility of the brain; avarice and profusion in the same thirst and desire of getting.

Wisdom and ignorance attain to the same ends.

A man may say, with some colour of truth, that there is an abecedarian ignorance that precedes knowledge, and a doctoral ignorance that comes after it; an ignorance which knowledge creates and begets, as she dispatches and destroys the first. Of simple understandings, little inquisitive, and little instructed, are made good Christians, who by reverence and obedience implicitly believe, and are constant in their belief. In the moderate understandings, and the middle sort of capacities, error of opinions is forgot. They follow the appearance of the first sense, and have some colour of reason on their side, to impute our walking on in the old beaten path to simplicity and stupidity,—I mean in us who have not informed ourselves by study. The higher and nobler souls, more solid and clear-sighted, make up another sort of true believers, who by a long and religious investigation have obtained a clearer and more penetrating light into the Scriptures, and have discovered the mysterious and divine secret of our ecclesiastical polity. And yet we see some who have arrived to this last stage in the second, with marvellous fruit and confirmation, as to the utmost limit of Christian intelligence, and enjoying their victory with great spiritual consolation, humble acknowledgment of the divine favour, exemplary reformation of manners, and singular modesty. I do not intend with these to rank some others, who, to clear themselves from all suspicion of their former errors, and to satisfy us that they are sound and firm to us, render themselves extremely indiscreet and unjust in the carrying on our cause, and by that means blemish it with infinite reproaches of violence and oppression. The simple peasants are good people, and so are the philosophers, or, as we call them now-a-days, men of strong and clear reason, whose souls are enriched with an ample provision of useful science. The mongrels, who have disdained the first form of the ignorance of letters, and have not been able to attain the other (sitting betwixt two stools, as I and a great many more of us do), are dangerous, foolish, and troublesome; these are they that disturb the world. And therefore it is that I, for my own part, retreat as much as I can towards my first and natural station whence I so vainly attempted to advance.

Two kinds of ignorance.

The fitness of plain understandings to Christianity.

Men of the greatest minds the completest Christians.

The mere peasant and the philosopher good men.

The vulgar and purely natural poetry has in it certain proprieties and graces, by which she may come into some comparison with the greatest beauty of poetry perfected by art; as is evident in our Gascon villanelles, and the songs that are brought us from nations that have no knowledge of any manner of science, nor so much as the use of writing. The indifferent and middle sort of poetry betwixt the two is despised, of no value, honour, or esteem.

Popular poetry comparable to the most perfect.

But seeing that the ice being once broke, and a path laid open to the fancy, I have found, as it commonly falls out, that what we make choice of for a rare and difficult subject, proves to be nothing so, and that after the invention is once warm it finds out an infinite number of parallel examples. I shall only add this one—that were these Essays of mine considerable enough to deserve a criticism, it might then, I think, fall out that they would not much take with common and vulgar capacities, nor be very acceptable to the rarer and more eminent; for the first would not understand them enough, and the last too well; and so they might hover in the middle region.

Middling poetry intolerable.

Montaigne's opinion of his Essays.

CHAPTER LV.

OF SMELLS.

It has been reported of others, as well as of Alexander the Great,[1] that their sweat exhaled an odoriferous smell, occasioned by some very uncommon and extraordinary constitution, of which Plutarch and others have been inquisitive into the cause. But the ordinary constitution of human bodies is quite otherwise, and their best condition is to be exempt from smells. Nay, the sweetness even of the purest breaths has nothing in it of greater perfection than to be without any Alexander's sweat had an agreeable smell.

[1] Plutarch, in vitâ, c. 1.

offensive smell, like those of healthful children; which made Plautus say,—

Mulier tum bene olet, ubi nihil olet [1]

"The best odour in a woman is not to smell at all."

Foreign perfumes create a suspicion.

And such as make use of exotic perfumes are with good reason to be suspected of some natural imperfection, which they endeavour by these odours to conceal.[2] Whence the ancient poets said that to smell well was to stink.

Rides nos, Coracine, nil olentes:
Malo, quam bene olere, nil olere.[3]

"Because thou, Coracinus, still dost go
With musk and ambergrease perfumed so,
We under thy contempt, forsooth, must fall;
I'd, rather than smell sweet, not smell at all."

And elsewhere,

Posthume, non bene olet, qui bene semper olet.[4]

"He does not, in reality, smell well
Who always of perfumes does smell."

I am, nevertheless, a great lover of pleasant smells, and as much abominate the ill ones, which also I reach at a greater distance, I think, than other men:

Namque sagacius unus odoror,
Polypus, an gravis hirsutis cubet hircus in alis,
Quam canis acer, ubi lateat sus.[5]

Of smells, the most simple and natural seem to me the most pleasing. And let the ladies look to this, for 'tis chiefly their concern. In an age of the darkest barbarism, the Scythian women, after bathing, were wont to powder and crust the face, and the whole body, with a certain odoriferous drug, growing in their country; which being washed off, when they were about to have familiarity with men, made them perfumed and sleek. 'Tis not to be believed how strangely all sorts of odours cleave to me, and how apt my skin is to imbibe them. He that complains of Nature, that she has not furnished mankind with a vehicle to convey smells to the nose, had no reason; for they convey it themselves; especially in me, for my very mustachios, which are large, perform that office; if I but touch them with my gloves or handkerchief, the smell will remain a whole day: they show where I have been. The close, luscious, devouring, glowing kisses of youthful ardour left, in my former days, a sweetness upon my lips for several hours after. And yet I have ever found myself very little subject to epidemic diseases, that are caught either by conversing with the sick, or bred by the contagion of the air; I have escaped from those of my time, of which there have been several sorts in our cities and armies. We read of Socrates that, though he never departed from Athens during the frequent plagues that infested that city, he was the only man that was never infected.[6]

Physicians might (I believe), if they would, extract more uses from odours than they do; for I have often observed that they cause an alteration in me, and work upon my spirits according to their several virtues; which makes me approve of what is said, namely, that the use of incense and perfumes in churches, so ancient, and so universally received in all nations and religions, was intended to cheer us, and to rouse and purify the senses, the better to fit us for contemplation.

The origin of the use of incense in churches.

I could have been glad, the better to judge of it, to have tasted of the culinary art of those cooks who had so rare a way of seasoning exotic odours with the relish of meats; as it was particularly observed in the service of the King of Tunis,[7] who, in our days, landed at Naples, to have an interview with Charles the emperor. His meats were stuffed with odoriferous drugs, to that degree of expense that the cookery of one peacock and two pheasants amounted to a hundred ducats, to dress them after their fashion. And when the carver came to cut them up, not only the dining-room, but all the apartments of his palace, and the adjoining streets, were filled with a fragrant vapour, which was some time dissipating.

Meat seasoned with odoriferous drugs.

My chief care in choosing my lodging is always to avoid a thick and stinking air; and those beautiful cities, Venice and Paris, very much lessen the kindness I have for them, the one by the offensive smell of her marshes, and the other of that of her dirt.

CHAPTER LVI.

OF PRAYERS.

I PROPOSE formless and undetermined fancies, like those who publish subtle questions to be after disputed upon in the schools, not to establish truth, but to seek it; I submit them to the better judgments of those whose office it is to regulate, not my writings and actions only, but moreover my very thoughts. Let what I here set down meet with correction or applause, it shall be of equal welcome and utility to me, myself before-hand condemning it for absurd and impious, if anything shall be found, through ignorance or inadvertency, set down in this rhapsody, contrary to the holy resolutions and prescripts of the Apostolical and Roman Catholic Church, in which I was born, and in which I will die.[1] And yet, always submitting to the authority of their censure, who have an absolute power over me, I thus temerariously venture at every thing, as upon this present subject.

I don't know whether I am deceived or not; but since, by a particular favour of the Divine bounty, a certain form of prayer has been prescribed and dictated to us, word for word, from the mouth of God himself, I have ever been of opinion that we ought to have it in more frequent use than we have, and, if I were worthy to advise, at sitting down to, and rising from, our tables, at our rising and going to bed, and in every particular act wherein prayer is wont to be introduced, I would have Christians always make use of the Lord's prayer; if not that prayer alone, yet, at least, that prayer always. The Church may lengthen or alter prayers according to the necessity of our instruction, for I know very well that it is always the same in substance, and the same thing. But yet such a preference ought to be given to that prayer that the people should have it continually in their mouths; for it is most certain that all necessary petitions are comprehended in it, and that it is infinitely proper for all occasions. 'Tis the only prayer I use in all places and circumstances, and what I still repeat instead of changing; whence it also happens that I have no other by heart but that.

Pa'er-noster, a prayer which Christians ought constantly to use.

It just now comes into my mind whence we should derive that error of having recourse to God in all our designs and enterprises, to call him to our assistance in all sorts of affairs, and in all places where our weakness stands in need of support, without considering whether the occasion be just, or otherwise; and to invoke his name and power, in what condition soever we are, or action we are engaged in, how vicious soever. He is, indeed, our sole and only protector, and can do all things for us: but, though he is pleased to honour us with his paternal care, he is, notwithstanding, as just as he is good and mighty, and does oftener exercise his justice than his power, and favours us according to that, and not according to our petitions.

Men ought not to call upon God indifferently upon all occasions.

Plato, in his Laws, makes out three sorts of belief injurious to the gods; "that there is none; that they concern not themselves about human affairs; and that they never reject or deny anything to our vows, offerings, and sacrifices." The first of these errors, according to his opinion, did never continue rooted in any man, from his infancy to his old age; the other two, he confesses, men might be obstinate in.

God's justice and his power are inseparable, and 'tis therefore in vain we invoke his power in an unjust cause. We must have our souls pure and clean, at that moment at least wherein we pray to him, and purified from all vicious passions, otherwise we ourselves present him the rods wherewith to chastise us. Instead of repairing any thing we have done amiss, we double the wickedness and the offence, when we offer to him, to whom we are to sue for pardon, an affection full of irreverence and hatred. Which makes me not very apt to applaud those whom I observe to be so frequent on their knees, if the actions nearest the prayer do not give me some evidence of reformation.

The soul must be quite pure when it prays to God.

Si, nocturnus adulter
Tempora Sanctonico velas adoperta cucullo.[2]

"With night-adulteries disgraced and foul,
Thou shad'st thy guilty forehead with a cowl."

And the practice of a man that mixes devotion with an execrable life seems in some sort even more to be condemned than that of a man conformable to his own propension, and dissolute throughout: and for that reason it is that our church denies admittance to, and communion with, men obstinate and incorrigible in any kind of wickedness. We pray only by custom, and for fashion's sake; or rather, we read and pronounce our prayers aloud, which is no better than a hypocritical show of devotion. And I am scandalized to see a man make the sign of the cross thrice at the benedicite, and as often at another's saying grace (and the more, because it is a sign I have in great veneration and constant use, even when I yawn), and to dedicate all the other hours of the day to acts of malice, avarice, and injustice: one hour to God, the rest to the devil, as if by commutation and consent. 'Tis a wonder to me actions so various in themselves succeed one another with such an uniformity of method as not to interfere nor suffer any alteration, even upon the very confines and passes from the one to the other. What a prodigious conscience must that be that can be at quiet within itself, whilst it harbours under the same roof, with so agreeing and so calm a society, both the crime and the judge!

Praying to God, only for fashion sake, blameable.

A man whose whole meditation is continually working upon nothing but lechery, which he knows to be so odious to God, what can he say when he comes to speak to him? He reforms, but immediately falls into a relapse. If the object of the divine justice, and the presence of his maker, did, as he pretends, strike and chastise his soul, how short soever the repentance might be, the very fear of offending that infinite majesty would so often present itself to his imagination that he would soon see himself master of those vices that are most natural and habitual in him. But what shall we say of those who settle their whole course of life upon the profit and emolument of sins which they know to be mortal! How many trades and vocations have we admitted and countenanced amongst us, whose very essence is vicious! And he that opening himself to me voluntarily told me that he had all his lifetime professed and practised a religion, in his opinion, damnable and contrary to that which he had in his heart, only to preserve his credit and the honour of his employments, how could his courage suffer so infamous a confession! What can men say to the divine justice upon this subject! Their repentance consisting in a visible and manifest reformation and restitution, they lose the colour of alleging it both to God and man. Are they so impudent as to sue for remission without satisfaction and without penitence? I look upon these as in the same condition with the first: but the obstinacy is not there so easy to be overcome. This contrariety and volubility of opinion, so sudden and violent as they pretend, is a kind of miracle to me. They present us with the state of an indigestible anxiety and doubtfulness of mind.

[1] Montaigne, in his life-time, was accused, on account of this chapter, of being touched with the heresy of Baius; but the Inquisition took no notice of the matter.

[2] Juvenal, viii. 144.

What we must think of the prayers of those who obstinately persist in vicious habits.

It seemed to me a fantastic and ridiculous imagination in those who, these late years past, used to reproach every man whom they knew to be of any extraordinary parts, and at the same time made profession of the Roman Catholic religion, that it was but outwardly; maintaining, moreover, to do him honour, forsooth, that, whatever he might pretend to the contrary, he could not but in his heart be of their reformed opinion. An untoward disease, that a man should be so rivetted to his own belief as to fancy that no man can believe otherwise than as he does; and yet worse in this, that they should entertain so vicious an opinion of such parts as to think that any man so qualified should prefer any present advantage of fortune before the hope of eternal happiness, or the fear of eternal damnation. They may believe me: could anything have tempted my youth, the ambition of the danger and difficulties in the late commotions had not been the least motives.

How, and by whom, David's Psalms ought to be sung.

It is not without very good reason, in my opinion, that the church interdicts the promiscuous, indiscreet, and irreverent use of the holy and divine Psalms, with which the Holy Ghost inspired King David. We ought not to mix God in our actions but with the highest reverence and caution. That poetry is too sacred to be put to no other use than to exercise the lungs and to delight our ears. It ought to come from the soul, and not from the tongue. It is not fit that a 'prentice in his shop, amongst his vain and frivolous thoughts, should be permitted to pass away his time, and divert himself with such sacred things. Neither is it decent to see the Holy Bible, the rule of our worship and belief, tumbled up and down a hall or a kitchen. They were formerly mysteries, but are now become sports and recreations. 'Tis a study too serious and too venerable to be cursorily or slightly turned over. The reading of the Scripture ought to be a temperate and premeditated act, and to which men should always add this devout preface, sursum corda, preparing even the body to so humble and composed a gesture and countenance as shall evidence their veneration and attention. Neither is it a book for every one to handle, but the study of select men set apart for that purpose, and whom Almighty God has been pleased to call to that office and sacred function: the wicked and ignorant blemish it. 'Tis not a story to tell, but a history to reverence, fear, and adore. Are not they then amusing persons who think they have rendered it palpable to the people by translating it into the people's tongue? Does the understanding of all therein contained only stick at words? Shall I venture to say, farther, that, by coming so near to understand a little, they are much wider of the whole scope than before? A total ignorance, and wholly depending upon the exposition of other and qualified persons, was more instructive and salutary than this vain and verbal knowledge, the nurse of temerity and presumption.

And I believe, farther, that the liberty every one has taken to disperse the sacred Writ into so many idioms, carries with it a great deal more of danger than utility. The Jews, Mahometans, and almost all others, have espoused and revere the language wherein their laws and mysteries were first conceived, and have expressly, and not without colour of reason, forbid the version or alteration of them into any other. Are we assured that in Biscay and in Brittany there are competent judges enough of this affair to establish this translation into their own language? The universal church has not a more difficult and solemn judgment to make. In preaching and speaking 'tis different; for here the interpretation is vague, unrestrained, variable, and disconnected.

One of our Greek historians does justly accuse the age he lived in for that the secrets of the Christian religion were dispersed into the hands of every mechanic, to expound and argue upon according to his own fancy; and that we ought to be much ashamed, we who by God's especial favour enjoy the purest mysteries of piety, to suffer them to be profaned by the ignorant rabble; considering that the Gentiles expressly forbade Socrates, Plato, and the other sages, to inquire into, or so much as to mention, the things committed only to the priests of Delphos; saying moreover that the factions of princes, upon theological subjects, are armed not with zeal, but with fury; that zeal springs from the divine wisdom and justice, and governs itself with prudence and moderation; but degenerates into hatred and envy, producing tares and nettles instead of corn and wine, when conducted by human passions. And it was truly said by another, who, advising the Emperor Theodosius, told him that disputes did not so much rock the schisms of the church asleep as it roused and animated heresies; that therefore all contentions and logical disputations were to be avoided, and men absolutely to acquiesce in the prescripts and formulas of faith established by the ancients. And the Emperor Andronicus[1] having overheard some great men at high words in his palace with Lapodius, about a point of ours of great importance, rebuked them severely, and even threatened to cause them to be thrown into the river if they did not desist. The very women and children, now-a-days, take upon them to school the oldest and most experienced men about the ecclesiastical laws: whereas the first of those of Plato forbids them to inquire so much as into the reason of civil laws, which were to stand instead of divine ordinances. And allowing the old men to confer amongst themselves, or with the magistrate, about those things, he adds, provided it be not in the presence of young or profane persons.

A bishop[2] has left, in writing, that, at the other end of the world, there is an island, by the ancients called Dioscorides, abundantly fertile in all sorts of trees and fruits, and of an exceeding healthful air, the inhabitants of which are Christians, having churches and altars adorned only with crucifixes, without any other images; great observers of fasts and feasts; exact payers of their tithes to the priest; and so chaste that none of them is permitted to have to do with more than one woman in his life. As to the rest, so content with their condition that, environed with the sea, they know nothing of navigation; and so simple that they understand not one syllable of the religion they profess, and wherein they are so devout. A thing incredible to such as do not know that the pagans, who are so zealous idolators, know nothing more of their gods than their bare names and their statues. The ancient beginning of Menalippus, a tragedy of Euripides, ran thus:

> Jupiter, for that name alone,
> Of what thou art, to me is known.

Theology stands best by itself.

I have seen also, in my time, some men's writings found fault with for being purely human and philosophical, without any mixture of divinity; and yet he would not be without reason on his side who should, on the contrary, say that divine doctrine, as Queen and Regent of the rest, better keeps her state apart; that she ought to be sovereign throughout, not subsidiary and suffragan; and that, peradventure, grammatical, rhetorical, and logical examples may elsewhere be more suitably chosen, and also the arguments for the stage, and public entertainments, than from so sacred a matter;[3] that divine reasons are considered with greater veneration and attention when by themselves, and in their own proper style, than when mixed with, and adapted to, human discourses; that it is a fault much more often observed, that the divines write too humanly, than that the humanists write not theologically enough. Philosophy, says St. Chrysostom, has long been banished the holy schools as a handmaid altogether useless, and thought unworthy to peep, so much as in passing by the door, into the sanctum of the divine doctrine; the human way of speaking is of a much lower form, and ought not to clothe herself with the dignity, majesty, and authority of divine eloquence. I leave him, verbis indisciplinatis,[4] to talk of fortune, destiny, accident, good, and evil, the gods, and other such like phrases, according to his own humour; I, for my part, propose fancies merely human and my own simply as human fancies, and separately considered, not as determined by an ordinance from heaven, incapable of doubt or dispute; matter of opinion, not matter of faith; things which I discourse of according to my own capacity, not what I believe according to God; after a laical, not clerical, and yet always a very religious, manner, as children propose their essays, instructable, not instructing.

And it were as rational to affirm that an edict enjoining all people but such as are public professors of divinity to be very reserved in writing of religion would carry with it a colour of utility and justice; and me, amongst the rest, to hold my prating. I have been told that even those who are not of our church do nevertheless, amongst themselves, expressly forbid the name of God to be used in common discourse; not so much as by way of interjection, exclamation, assertion of a truth, or comparison; and I think them in the right. And upon what occasion soever we call upon God to accompany and assist us, it ought always to be done with the greatest reverence and devotion.

God's name ought not to be used in common discourse.

There is, as I remember, a passage in Xenophon, where he tells us that we ought so much the more seldom to call upon God, by how much it is hard to compose our souls to God ought to be seldom prayed to, and why.

[1] Andronicus Comnena. See Nicetas, ii. 4., who, however, does not say a word about Lapodius.

[2] Osorius, Bishop of Silves, in Algarves, author of the work entitled de Rebus gestis Emmanuelis Regis Lusitaniæ. But it is from the Sieur Goulart, his translator, and not from Osorius himself, that Montaigne has quoted what he tells us about the inhabitants of the island Dioscorides. The first edition of the Essays, published in 1580, contains nothing upon the subject, for Goulart's translation did not appear till 1581. When our author says that the Dioscoridans "were so chaste that none of them were permitted to have to do with more than one woman in their lives," he misapprehends the meaning of Goulart, who says, conformably to the Latin of Osorius (unam tantum uxorem ducunt), that they marry only one wife, simply indicating that polygamy was not permitted among them, they being Christians. The modern name of this island is Socotora (in the Red Sea), a name which retains some vestiges of its ancient appellation. See Bayle's Dict., in the article Dioscorides.

such a degree of calmness, penitency, and devotion as it ought to be in at such a time, otherwise our prayers are not only vain and fruitless, but vicious in themselves. "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us;"—what do we mean by this, but that we present him a soul free from all rancour and revenge? And yet we make nothing of invoking God's assistance in our vices, and inviting him to our unjust designs.

Quæ, nisi seductis, nequeas committere divis.[1]

"Which only to the gods apart,
Thou hast the daring to impart."

The covetous man prays for the conservation of his vain and superfluous riches; the ambitious for victory, and the conduct of his fortune; the thief calls God to his assistance to deliver him from the dangers and difficulties that obstruct his wicked designs, or returns him thanks for the facility he has met with in robbing a poor peasant. At the door of a house they are going to scale, or break into by force of a petard, men fall to prayers for success, having their heads and hopes full of cruelty, avarice, and lust.

Hoc igitur, quo tu Jovis aurem impellere tentas,
Dic agendum Staio: proh Jupiter! ô bone, clamet,
Jupiter! at sese non clamet Jupiter ipse?[2]

"This, then, intended for Jove's private ear,
Take courage, and let honest Staius hear.
Defend us, mighty Jove! will he exclaim,
And will not Jove cry out in his own name?"

Marguerite, Queen of Navarre, tells of a young prince (whom, though she does not name, is easily enough, by his great quality, to be known), who, going upon an amorous assignation to lie with an advocate's wife of Paris, his way thither being through a church, he never passed that holy place, going to, or returning from, this godly exercise, but he always kneeled down to pray. In what he would implore the divine favour, his soul being full of such virtuous meditations, I leave others to judge. Yet this she instances for a testimony of singular devotion.[3] But this is not the only proof we have that women are not altogether fit to treat of theological matters.

A true prayer, and religious reconciling of ourselves to God, cannot enter into an impure soul, subjected at the time to the dominion of Satan. He who calls God to his assistance, whilst in the pursuit of vice, does as if a cutpurse should call a magistrate to help him, or like those who introduce the name of God to the attestation of a lie.

Tacito mala vota susurro
Concipimus.[4]

"In whispers oft we guilty prayers do make."

There are few men who durst publish to the world the prayers they make to God:[5]

Haud cuivis promptum est, murmurque, humilesque susurros
Tollere de templis, et aperto vivere voto.[6]

"Few are there in the temple's daily crowd
Who scorn such tricks, and think and wish aloud."

And this is the reason why the Pythagoreans would have them always public, to be heard by every one, to the end they might not prefer indecent or unjust petitions, as he did,

"Clare cum dixit, Apollo!
Labra movet, metuens audiri: "pulchra Laverna,
Da mihi fallere, da justum sanctumque videri;
Noctem peccatis, et fraudibus objice nubem."[7]

"Who with loud voice pronounc'd Apollo's name;
But when the following prayers he preferr'd,
Scarce moves his lips for fear of being heard.
'Beauteous Laverna, my petition hear;
Let me with truth and sanctity appear:
Oh! give me to deceive, and with a veil
Of darkness and of night, my crimes conceal!'"

The gods did severely punish the wicked prayers of Œdipus in granting them. He had prayed that his children might amongst themselves determine the succession to his throne by arms; and was so miserable as to see himself taken at his word. We should not pray that all things fall out as our will would have them, but that our will should subserve what is just and right.

We seem in truth to make use of our prayers as a kind of gibberish, and as those do who employ holy words in sorceries and magical operations; and as if we made account the benefit we are to reap from them depended upon the contexture, sound, and jingle of words, or upon the composing of the countenance. For having the soul contaminated with concupiscence, not touched with repentance, or comforted by any late reconciliation with Almighty God, we go to present him such words as the memory suggests to the tongue, and hope thence to obtain the remission of our sins. There is nothing so easy, so gentle, and so favourable, as the divine law: she calls and invites us to her, guilty and abominable as we are; extends her arms, and receives us into her bosom, foul and polluted as we at present are, and are for the future to be. But then, in return, we are to look upon her with a pleased eye, we are to receive this pardon with gratitude and submission, and, for that instant at least wherein we address ourselves to her, to have the soul angry with its faults, and at defiance with those passions that seduced her to offend. Neither the gods nor good men (says Plato[8]) will accept the present of a wicked man.

CHAPTER LVII.

OF AGE.

I CANNOT approve of the proportion we settle upon ourselves, and the space we allot to the duration of life; I see that the sages contract it very much, in comparison of the common opinion. "What," said the younger Cato to those who would stay his hand from killing himself, "am I now of an age to be reproached that I go out of the world too soon?" And yet he was but eight and forty years old.[2] He thought that to be a mature and competent age, considering how few arrive to it. And such as, soothing their thoughts with what they call the course of nature, promise to themselves some years beyond it, might have some reason to do so, could they be privileged from the infinite number of accidents to which they are by natural subjection exposed, and which may at any moment interrupt this natural course they look forward to. What an idle conceit it is to expect to die of a decay of strength, which is the last effect of the extremest age, and to propose to ourselves no shorter lease of life than that, considering it is a kind of death of all others the most rare, and very hardly seen? We call that only a natural death, as if it were contrary to nature, to see a man break his neck with a fall, be drowned in shipwreck, or snatched away with a pleurisy or the plague, and as if our ordinary condition of life did not expose us to these and many more inconveniences. Let us no more flatter ourselves with these fine-sounding words: we ought rather to call that natural which is common and universal.

Age of Cato when he killed himself.

To die of old age is a death rare, extraordinary, and singular, and therefore so much less natural than the others. 'Tis the last and extremest sort of dying, and the more remote the less to be hoped for. It is indeed the boundary of life, beyond which we are not to pass: which the law of nature has pitched for a limit not to be exceeded. But to last till then is withal a privilege she is rarely seen to give us. 'Tis a lease she only signs by particular favour, it may be, to one only, in the space of two or three ages; and then with a pass to boot, to carry him through all the traverses and difficulties she has strewed in the way of this long career. And therefore my opinion is that when once forty years old, we should consider it as an age to which very few arrive: for, seeing that men do not usually proceed so far, it is a sign that we are pretty well advanced; and since we have exceeded the ordinary bounds, which make the just measure of life, we ought not to expect to go much farther. Having escaped so many precipices of death, whereinto we have seen so many other men fall, we should acknowledge that so extraordinary a fortune as that which has hitherto rescued us from those imminent perils, and kept us alive beyond the ordinary term of living, is not likely to continue long.

To die of old age a thing singular and extraordinary.

'Tis a fault in our very laws to contain this error, that a man is not capable of managing his estate till he be five and twenty years old, whereas he will have much ado to manage his life so long. Augustus cut off five years from the ancient Roman standard, and declared that to be thirty years old was sufficient for a judge.[3] Servius Tullius relieved the knights of above seven and forty years of age from the fatigues of war;[4] Augustus dismissed them at forty-five. Though methinks men should hardly be sent to the fire-side till five and fifty, or sixty years of age. I should be of opinion that our employment should be as long as possible extended for the public good: I find the fault on the other side, that they do not employ us early enough. This emperor was arbiter of the whole world at nineteen, and yet would have a man to be thirty before he could decide a dispute about a gutter.

The defect of the laws, in making it so late in life before they admit men to the management of their estates.

For my part I believe our souls are adult at twenty as much as they are ever like to be, and as capable then as ever. A soul that has not by that time given evident earnest of its force and virtue will never after come to proof. Natural parts and excellences produce what they have of vigorous and fine within that term, or never:

Souls adult at twenty years of age.

Si l'espine nou picque quand nai,
A pene que picque jamai,[5]

as they say in Dauphiny. Of all the great human actions I ever heard or read of, of what sort soever, I have observed, both in former ages and our own, more performed before thirty than after; and oft-times in the lives of the same men. May I not confidently instance in those of Hannibal and his great competitor Scipio? The better half of their lives they lived upon the glory they had acquired in their youth; great men after, 'tis true, in comparison of others, but by no means in comparison of themselves. As to myself, I am certain that since that age both my understanding and my constitution have rather decayed than improved, retired rather than advanced. 'Tis possible that with those who make the best use of their time knowledge and experience may grow up and increase with their years; but the vivacity, quickness, steadiness, and other qualities, more our own, of much greater importance, and much more essential, languish and decay.

> Ubi jam validis quassatum est viribus ævi

> "When once the body's shaken by time's rage,

Sometimes the body first submits to age, sometimes the soul; and I have seen men enough who had got a weakness in their brains before either in their legs or stomach: and by how much the more it is a disease of no great pain to the infected party, and of obscure symptoms, so much greater the danger is.

And for this reason it is that I complain of our laws; not that they keep us too long to our work, but that they set us to work too late. Methinks, considering the frailty of life, and the many natural and ordinary wrecks to which it is exposed, we should not give so large a portion of it to idleness, either in childhood or in apprenticeship to the world.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE INCONSISTENCY OF OUR ACTIONS.

THOSE who make it their business to observe human actions never find themselves so much puzzled in any thing as how to reconcile and set them before the world in a self-consistent light and reputation; for they are generally such strange contradictions in themselves that it seems almost impossible they should proceed from one and the same person. One while we find young Marius the son of Mars, and another time the son of Venus.[1] Pope Boniface the Eighth, it is said, crept into the papal throne like a fox, reigned like a lion, and died like a dog. And who could believe it to be the same Nero, that perfect image of all cruelty, who, in the beginning of his reign, having the sentence of a condemned man brought to him to sign, cried out, "O, that I had never been taught to write!"[2] So much it went to his heart to condemn a man to death. The history of every nation is so full of such examples, and all men are able to produce so many to themselves, either from their own conduct or observation, that I often wonder to see men of sense give themselves the trouble of sorting these pieces, and endeavouring to reconcile such contradictions; especially when irresolution appears to me to be the most common and manifest vice of our nature; witness the famous verse of the comedian Publius:

Irresolution the most common vice of our nature.

> Malum consilium est, quod mutari non potest.[3]
>
> "That counsel's bad that will admit no change."

[1] Plutarch, in vitâ.
[2] Seneca, De clementiâ.

There seems indeed some possibility of forming a judgment of a man from the habitual features of his life, but, considering the natural instability of our manners and opinions, I have often thought even the best authors a little mistaken in so obstinately endeavouring to mould us into any consistent and solid contexture. They choose some general air, and according to that arrange and interpret all the actions of a man, of which, if some be so stiff and stubborn that they cannot bend or turn them to any uniformity to the rest, they then, without further ceremony, impute them to dissimulation. Augustus has, nevertheless, escaped those gentlemen; for there was in him so apparent, so sudden, and so continued a variety of action, throughout the whole course of his life, that he has slipt away clear from the boldest judges. For my part, I am with much more difficulty induced to believe in a man's consistency than in any other virtue in him; while there is nothing I so readily believe as his inconsistency: and whoso will meditate upon the matter closely and abstractedly will agree with me. Out of all antiquity 'twould be difficult to produce a dozen men who have formed their lives to one certain and fixed course, which is the principal design of wisdom; for, says one of the ancients,[4] to comprise it all in one word, and to contract all the rules of human life into one, "It is to will, and not to will, always the same thing: I shall not descend," continues he, "to add, provided the will be just, for, if it be not so, it is impossible it should be always one." I have, indeed, formerly learnt that vice is nothing but irregularity and want of measure, and therefore 'tis impossible to fix consistency to it. 'Tis a saying of Demosthenes,[1] "that the beginning of all virtue is consultation and deliberation; the end and perfection, consistency." If, by reason, we were to resolve on any certain course, we should pitch upon the best, but nobody has thought of it:

The difficulty of determining the characters of men in general.

[4] Seneca, Epist. 20.

Quod petiit, spernit; repetit, quod nuper omisit;
Æstuat, et vitæ disconvenit ordine toto.[2]

"He now despises what he late did crave,
And what he last neglected now would have:
He fluctuates, and flies from that to this,
And his whole life a contradiction is."

The inconsistency of our conduct, on what founded.

Our ordinary practice is to follow the inclinations of our appetite, which way soever they guide us, whether to the right or to the left, upwards or downwards, just according as we are wafted by the breath of occasion. We never meditate what we would have till the instant we have a mind to it; and change like that little creature which takes its colour from what it is laid upon. What we but just now proposed to ourselves, we immediately alter, and presently return to it again; 'tis nothing but shifting and inconstancy:

Ducimur, ut nervis alienis mobile lignum.[3]

"Like tops with leathern thongs we're whipped about."

We do not go, we are driven; like things that float, now leisurely, then with violence, according to the gentleness or fierceness of the current;

Nonne videmus,
Quid sibi quisque velit nescire, et quærere semper;
Commutare locum, quasi onus deponere possit?[4]

"Day after day we see men toil to find
Some secret solace to an anxious mind,
Shifting from place to place, if here or there
They might set down the burthen of their care."

Every day produces a new whim, and our humours keep motion with time:

Tales sunt hominum mentes, quali pater ipse
Jupiter auctiferas lustravit lumine terras.[5]

"Such are the motions of th' inconstant soul,
As are the days and weather fair or foul."

We fluctuate betwixt various notions; we will nothing freely, nothing absolutely, nothing constantly.[6] In any one that has prescribed and laid down determinate rules and laws to himself for his own conduct, we should perceive an equality of manners, an order, and an infallible relation of one thing or action to another, shine through his whole life (Empedocles[7] observed this contradiction in the Agregentines, that gave themselves up to delights as if every day was to be their last, and built as if they were to live for ever); and a judgment would not then be hard to make. And this is shown in the younger Cato: he who has touched one note, has touched all. 'Tis a harmony of very agreeing sounds, that cannot jar. But with us 'tis quite contrary, every particular action requires a particular judgment. The surest way, in my opinion, would be to take our measures from the nearest allied circumstances, without engaging in a longer inquisition, or without concluding any other consequence.

I was told, in the civil disorders of our unhappy kingdom, that a maid-servant, hard by the place where I then was, had thrown herself out of a window to avoid being forced by a ragamuffin soldier that was quartered in the house. She was not killed by the fall, and therefore, redoubling her attempt, would have cut her own throat, but was hindered; though not before she had wounded herself dangerously. She herself confessed that the soldier had not as yet importuned her otherwise than by courtship, solicitation, and presents; but that she was afraid that in the end he would have proceeded to violence: all which she delivered with such a countenance and language, and withal embrued in her own blood, the testimony of her virtue, that she appeared quite another Lucretia; and yet I have since been well assured that, both before and after, she was no very difficult piece. As in the tale,—"Be as handsome a man, and as fine a gentleman as you will, never build too much upon your mistress's inviolable chastity; for, having been repulsed by her, you do not know but she may have a much better stomach to your groom."[8]

Antigonus, having taken one of his soldiers into a degree of favour and esteem for his virtue and valour, gave his physicians strict charge to cure him of an inward distemper which had a long time tormented him; and observing that after his cure he went much more coldly to work than before, he asked him what had so altered and cowed him? "You, yourself, sir," replied the other, "by having eased me of the pains that made me weary of my life."[9] One of Lucullus's soldiers having been rifled by the enemy, performed a brave exploit against him by way of revenge, by which he recovered his loss and more. Lucullus, who from that action had conceived a very advantageous opinion of the man, endeavoured, with all the persuasions and fine promises he could think of,

Verbis, quæ timido quoque possent addere mentem,[10] to engage him in an enterprise of danger; but "No," said the fellow; "employ some miserable devil that has lost all his money."

and flatly refused to go.

When we read that Mahomet having furiously reprimanded Chasan, Aga of the Janisaries, who seeing the Hungarians break into his battalion, had behaved himself very ill in the business, and that Chasan, instead of any other answer, rushed furiously, alone, with his scimitar in his hand, into the first body of the enemy, where he was presently cut to pieces, we are not to look upon this as so much a generous design to vindicate himself from the reproach of cowardice as a change of mind; not so much natural valour as sudden vexation. The man you see to-day so adventurous and brave, you must not think it strange to find him as great a poltroon to-morrow: anger, necessity, company, wine, or the sound of the trumpet may have roused his spirits; this is no valour formed and established by meditation; but accidentally created by those circumstances, and therefore it is no wonder, if by contrary circumstances, it appears quite another thing. These supple variations and contradictions in us have given some people occasion to believe that man has two souls; others two distinct powers which always accompany and incline us, one towards good, and the other towards evil, according to its own nature and propension; so sudden a variety of inclination not being to be imagined to flow from one and the same fountain.

For my part, I must own that the puff of every accident not only carries me along with it, according to its own proclivity, but that moreover I discompose and trouble myself by the instability of my own posture; and whoever will look narrowly into his own breast will hardly find himself twice in the same condition. I give my soul sometimes one face, and sometimes another, according to the side I turn her to. If I speak variously of myself, it is because I consider myself variously. All contrarieties are there to be found in one corner or another, or after one manner or another. Bashful, insolent; chaste, lustful; talkative, silent; laborious, delicate; ingenious, heavy; melancholic, pleasant; lying, sincere; learned, ignorant; liberal, covetous, and prodigal; I find all this in myself, more or less, according as I turn myself about; and whoever will sift himself to the bottom will be conscious, even by his own judgment, of this volubility and discordance. I have nothing to say of myself entirely, simply, and solidly, without mixture and confusion, nor, in a word; distinguo is the universal part of my logic.

Though I always intend to speak well of the good, and rather interpret in a good sense such things as may be so, yet such is the strangeness of our condition that we are sometimes pushed on to do well, even by vice itself, if well doing were not judged by the intention only. One gallant action, therefore, ought not to conclude a man valiant; if a man was brave indeed, he would be always so, and upon all occasions. If it were a habit of virtue, and not a sally, it would render a man equally resolute in all accidents; the same alone as in company, the same in lists as in battles; for, let people say what they please, there is not one valour for the street, and another for the field. He would bear a sickness in his bed as bravely as a wound in the trenches, and no more fear death in his own house than at an assault. We should not then see the same man charge into a breach with a brave assurance, and afterwards torment himself, and whine like a woman, for the loss of a law-suit, or the death of a child. When being a coward in arms, he is firm under poverty; when he starts at the sight of a barber's razor, but rushes fearless among the swords of the enemy, the action is commendable, not the man. Many of the Greeks, says Cicero, cannot endure the sight of an enemy, and yet are courageous in sickness; the Cimbrians and Celtiberians quite the contrary. Nihil enim potest esse æquabile, quod non à certa ratione proficiscatur.[2] "Nothing can be uniform that does not proceed from solid reason." No valour could be more extreme in its kind than that of Alexander; but it was but one kind; nor was that kind full enough throughout, or universal. As peerless as it was, it had yet some blemishes; and of this his being so often at his wits' end upon every light suspicion of his captains conspiring against his life, and the behaving himself in such enquiries with so much vehemency and injustice, and with a fear that subverted his natural reason, is one striking instance. The superstition also with which he was so much tainted carries along with it some image of pusillanimity; and the excess of his penitence for the murder of Clytus is likewise another testimony of the unevenness of his courage.—All we do is a mere cento, as a man may say, of odds and ends,[3] and we would acquire honour by a false title. Virtue will not be followed but for herself; and, if we sometimes borrow her mask for some other occasion, she presently pulls it off again. 'Tis a strong and lively tincture, which, when the soul has once thoroughly imbibed it, will not out again but with the piece. And therefore to make a right judgment of a man, we are long and very observingly to follow his trace. If consistency does not there stand firm upon her own proper base, Cui vivendi via considerata atque provisa est;[1] "If the course of life is not plainly marked out;" if the variety of occurrences makes him to alter his pace (his path I mean, for the pace may be faster or slower), let him go; such a one runs before the wind, a vau le vent, as the Talbot motto has it.

A good action to be judged of by the intention only.

Virtue only to be courted for its own sake.

'Tis no wonder, says one of the ancients,[2] that chance has so great a dominion over us, since it is by chance we live. It is not possible for any one who has not designed his life for some certain end to dispose of particular actions. It is not possible for any one to fit the pieces together who has not the whole form already contrived in his imagination. To what use are colours to him, or to what end should he provide them, that knows not what he is to paint? No one lays down a certain plan of life; we only deliberate it by pieces. The archer ought first to know at what he is to aim, and then accommodate his arm, bow, string, shaft, and motion to it. Our opinions deviate and wander, because not levelled to any determinate end. No wind serves him who has no destined port. I cannot acquiesce in the judgment given by one in the behalf of Sophocles,[3] who concluded him capable of the management of domestic affairs, against the accusation of his son, from having seen one of his tragedies.

Neither do I think the conjecture of the Parians, sent to regulate the Milesians, sufficient for such a consequence as they drew from it. Coming to visit the island, they took notice of such grounds as were best cultivated, and such country houses as were best governed; and having taken the names of the owners, when they had assembled the citizens, they appointed those farmers for the new governors and magistrates, concluding that they who had been so provident in their own private concerns would be so of the public too.[4] We are all unformed lumps, and of so various a contexture that every moment every piece plays its own game, and there is as much difference betwixt us and ourselves as betwixt us and others. Magnam rem puta unum hominem agere.[5]—"'Tis a great matter to be always the same man." Since ambition can teach men valour, temperance, and liberality, and even justice; seeing that avarice can inspire a shop-boy, bred and nursed up in obscurity and ease, with courage enough to expose himself, far from the fire-side, to the mercy of the angry waves, in a frail boat; that, further, she can teach discretion and prudence; and that even Venus can infuse boldness and resolution into boys under the discipline of the rod, and inflame the hearts of tender virgins not out of leading-strings, with masculine courage;

> Hac duce, custodes furtim transgressa jacentes,
> Ad juvenem tenebris sola puella venit;[6]
>
> "With Venus' aid, while sleep the guard disarms,
> She stole by night to her young lover's arms;"

'tis not sound understanding to judge us simply by our outward action; we must penetrate the very soul, and there discover by what springs the motion is guided; but that being a high and hazardous undertaking, I could wish that fewer would attempt it.

CHAPTER II.

OF DRUNKENNESS.

THE world is nothing but variety and disproportion; vices are all alike, as they are vices, and 'tis thus, perhaps, the Stoics understand it; but, though they are equally vices, yet they are not all equal vices; and that he who has transgressed the bounds by a hundred paces,

There are some vices more enormous than others.

> Quos ultra, citraque nequit consistere rectum,[7]
>
> "Whence we cannot deviate without going wrong,"

should not be in a worse condition than he who has transgressed them but ten, is not to be believed; or that sacrilege is not worse than stealing a cabbage:

> Nec vincit ratio hoc, tantumdem ut peccet, idemque,
> Qui teneros caules alieni fregerit horti,
> Et qui nocturnus divum sacra legerit.[8]
>
> "Nor seems it reason he as much should sin
> That steals a cabbage plant, as he who in
> The dead of night a temple breaks, and brings > Away from thence the consecrated things."

There is in this as great diversity as in anything whatever. The confounding of the order and measure of sins is dangerous; murderers, traitors, and tyrants gain too much therein; it is not reasonable they should solace their consciences, because another man is idle or lascivious, or less assiduous at his devotion than he ought to be. Every one lays weight upon the sins of his companions, and lightens his own. In my opinion, our very instructors themselves range them very ill. As Socrates said, that the principal office of wisdom was to distinguish good from evil, we, the best of whom are always vicious, ought also to say of knowledge that it is to distinguish betwixt vice and vice, without which, and that very exactly performed too, the virtuous and the wicked will remain confounded and undistinguishable.

The confounding of sins is a dangerous thing.

Now among the rest, drunkenness seems to me to be a gross and brutish vice. The soul has more to do in all the rest, and there are some vices that have something, if a man may say so, of the high and generous in them. There are vices wherein there is a mixture of knowledge, diligence, valour, prudence, dexterity, and cunning; this is totally corporeal and earthly. The thickest-skulled nation this day in Europe is that where it is the most in fashion. Other vices discompose the understanding; this totally overthrows it, and stuns the body.

Drunkenness a stupid, brutish vice.

Cum vini vis penetravit, . . .
Consequitur gravitas membrorum, præpediuntur
Crura vacillanti, tardescit lingua, madet mens,
Nant oculi; clamor, singultus, jurgia, gliscunt.[1]

"When fumes of wine have fill'd the swelling veins,
Unusual weight throughout the body reigns;
The legs, so nimble in the race before,
Can now exert their wonted pow'r no more;
Falters the tongue, tears gush into the eyes,
And hiccoughs, noise, and jarring tumults rise."

The worst condition of man is that wherein he loses the knowledge and government of himself. And 'tis said, amongst other things upon that subject, that as the must, fermenting in a vessel, works up to the top whatever it has in the bottom, so wine, in those who have drunk beyond the measure, vents the most inward secrets.

Tu sapientium
Curas, et arcanum jocoso
Consilium retegis Lyæo.[2]

"And, sportive, strip from grave disguise
The cares and secret counsels of the wise."

Josephus tells us[3] that, by giving an ambassador, whom the enemy had sent to him, his full dose of liquor, he wormed out his secrets. And yet Augustus, committing the most inward secrets of his affairs to Lucius Piso, who conquered Thrace, never found him guilty of blabbing in the least; no more than Tiberius did Cossus, with whom he intrusted his whole counsels, though we know they were both so given to drink that they have often been carried home, both one and the other, drunk out of the senate-house.[4]

Hesterno inflatum venas, de more, Lyæo.[5]

"And swollen their veins, as wont, with wine of yesterday."

And the design of killing Cæsar was as safely communicated to Cimber, though he was often drunk, as to Cassius, who drank nothing but water; and upon this, Cimber once said merrily, "Shall I, who cannot bear wine, bear with a tyrant?"[6] We see our Germans, though never so drunk, know their post, remember the word, and perform their duty:

Nec facilis victoria de madidis, et Blæsis, atque mero titubantibus.[7]

"Nor find it easy victory to command
O'er men so drunk they scarce can speak or stand."

I could not have believed there had been so profound, senseless, and dead a degree of drunkenness, had I not read in history that Attalus, having, in order to put a notable affront upon Pausanias, who for this cause afterwards killed Philip, King of Macedon, who, by his excellent qualities, gave sufficient testimony of his education in the house and company of Epaminondas, invited him to supper, and made him drink to such a pitch that he could dispose of his body as that of a common prostitute to the grooms and meanest servants of the house. And I have been told by a lady whom I highly honour and esteem, that near Bourdeaux, towards Castres, where she lives, a countrywoman, a widow of excellent character, perceiving in herself the first symptoms of breeding, innocently told her neighbours that, if she had a husband, she should think herself with child; but the causes of suspicion every day more and more increasing, and at last growing up to a manifest proof, the poor woman was reduced to the necessity of causing it to be proclaimed at her parish church that whoever had done that deed and would frankly confess it, she did not only promise to forgive, but moreover to marry him, if he liked the offer; upon which a young fellow that served her in the quality of a labourer, encouraged by this proclamation, declared, that one holy-day he found her, having taken too much of the bottle, so fast asleep in the chimney-corner, and in so indecent a posture, that he made use of her without waking her; they still live together man and wife.

It is certain that antiquity has not much decried this vice: the writings of several philosophers speak very tenderly of it; and even amongst the Stoics there are some who advise to give one's-self sometimes the liberty to drink to a debauch, to recreate and refresh the soul.

Drunkenness not much declaimed against by the ancients.

Hoc quoque virtutum quondam certamine magnum

"And Socrates the wise, they say of yore, before his brother Artaxerxes, urged this excellency, that he could drink a great deal more than he.[1] And in the best governed nations this trial of skill in drinking was very much in use. I have heard Silvius, an excellent physician of Paris, say that, lest the digestive faculties of the stomach should grow idle, it were not amiss once a month to rouse and spur them on by this excess, lest they should grow dull and resty; and 'tis written that when the Persians were to consult upon any important affair they first warmed themselves well with wine.[2]

Drinking to a debauch in use amongst the best governed nations.

My taste and constitution are greater enemies to this vice than I am; for, besides that I easily submit my belief to the authority of ancient opinions, I look upon it as a mean and stupid vice, but less malicious and hurtful than the others, almost every one of which more directly jostles public society. And if we cannot please ourselves but it must cost us something, as they hold, I conceive this vice costs a man's conscience less than any of the rest: besides, it is of no difficult preparation, nor is what we look for hard to be found; a consideration not altogether to be despised. A man well advanced both in dignity and age, among three principal comforts, which he said still remained to him of life, told me this of drinking was one; and where would a man more justly find it than among the natural conveniences? But he did not take it right; for delicacy and a curious choice in wines is therein to be avoided. If you ground your pleasure upon drinking the best, you condemn yourself to the penance of drinking the worst.

Drunkenness a vice not so bad as some others.

Delicacy to be avoided in wine.

Your taste must be more indifferent and free: a delicate palate does not suit a good toper. The Germans drink almost indifferently of all wines with delight: their business is to pour down, and not to taste; and 'tis so much the better for them, their pleasure is so much the more constant and nearer at hand. On the other hand, not to drink after the French fashion, but at meals, and then very moderately too, is too much to restrict the bounty of the god of wine: there is more time and constancy required than so. The ancients spent whole nights in this exercise, and oft-times added the day following to piece it out; we ought therefore to take greater liberty than we do, and stick closer to our work. I have seen a great lord of my time, a man of high enterprise and famous success, who, without setting himself to it, and after his ordinary rate of drinking at meals, swallowed down not much less than five quarts of wine, and at his going away appeared but too wise and discreet, to the detriment of our affairs. The pleasure we design an esteem for during the course of our lives, ought to have a greater share of our time dedicated to it. We should, like journeymen and labourers, refuse no occasion, and omit no opportunity, of drinking, and always have it in our minds. But methinks we every day abridge and curtail the use of wine; and the breakfast, drinking, and collations, I used to see in my father's house when I was a boy, were in those days more usual and frequent than at present. Is it that we pretend to reformation? Truly no: but it may be we are more addicted to Venus than our fathers were. They are two exercises that hinder one another in their vigour. Lechery has weakened our stomach on the one side, and on the other sobriety renders us more amorous and vigorous for the exercise of love.

'Tis not to be imagined what strange stories I have heard my father tell of the chastity of that age wherein he lived. He might very well talk so, being both by art and nature cut out and finished for the service of ladies. He spoke little and well, ever mixing his language with some illustration out of modern authors, especially Spanish; and amongst them Marcus Aurelius was very frequent in his mouth.[3] His behaviour was grave, humble, and modest; he was very solicitous of neatness and decency in his person and dress, whether a-foot or on horseback. He was exceedingly punctual to his word, and of a conscience and religion tending rather towards superstition than otherwise. For a man of little stature, very strong, well proportioned, and well knit; of a pleasing countenance, inclining to brown, and very adroit in all noble exercises. I have yet in the house to be seen canes full of lead, with which, they say, he exercised his arms for throwing the bar or the stone; and shoes with leaden soles, to make him afterwards lighter for running or leaping. Of his vaulting he has left little miracles behind him; and I have seen him, when past threescore, laugh at our agilities, throw himself in his furred gown into the saddle, make the tour of a table upon his thumbs, and scarce ever mount the stairs up to his chamber without taking three or four steps at a time. But as to what I was speaking of before, he said there was scarce one woman of quality of ill fame in a whole province: would tell of strange privacies, and some of them his own, with virtuous women, without any manner of suspicion. And, for his own part, solemnly swore he was a virgin at his marriage; and yet it was after a long practice of arms beyond the mountains, of which war he has left us a written journal under his own hand, wherein he has given a precise account, from point to point, of all passages, both relating to the public and to himself. And he was married moreover at a well advanced maturity, in the year 1528, the three and thirtieth year of his age, upon his way home from Italy. But let us return to our bottle.

[3] Mery Causaubon, who mentions this book, in a short advertisement prefixed to his English translation of the genuine work of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, tells us this book was writ originally in Spanish, and translated into Italian, French, English, &c. "The author," he adds, "would fain have his work pass for a faithful translation of the treatise of Marcus Aurelius; but there is nothing in the whole book which shows that the learned Spaniard who composed it had seen the treatise of this wise emperor." This Spaniard is Guevara, who does not deserve the title of learned, which is here given him by Mery Causaubon. The reader may see the character of his wit and works in Bayle's Dictionary, under the title of Guevara.

Drinking the last pleasure which man is capable of enjoying.

The incommodities of old age, which stand in need of some refreshment and support, might with reason beget in me a desire of this faculty, it being, as it were, almost the last pleasure which the course of years deprives us of. The natural heat, say the good fellows, first seats itself in the feet, that concerns infancy; from thence it mounts to the middle region, where it makes a long abode, and produces, in my opinion, the only true pleasures of corporal life; all other pleasures sleep in comparison. Towards the end, like a vapour that still mounts upwards, as it exhales, it arrives at the throat, where it makes its last stop. I cannot nevertheless understand how men come to extend the pleasure of drinking beyond thirst, and to forge in the imagination an appetite artificial and against nature. My stomach would not proceed so far; it has enough to do with what it takes for necessity. My constitution is not to care to drink, but as it follows eating, and to wash down my meat, and for that reason my last draught is always the greatest. And as in old age we have our palates furred with phlegms, or depraved by some other ill constitution, the wine does not taste so well till the pores are washed and laid open: at least, I seldom relish the first glass much. Anacharsis[1] wondered that the Greeks drank in greater glasses towards the end of a meal than at the beginning; which was, I suppose, for the same reason. The Germans do the same, who then begin the battle.

The use of wine denied to children, and permitted to grown men.

Plato[2] forbids children to drink wine till eighteen years of age, or to get drunk till forty; but after forty gives them leave to please themselves, and to mix somewhat liberally in their feasts the influence of Dionysius,[3] that good deity, who restores young men their good humour, and old men their youth, who mollifies the passions of the soul, as iron is softened by fire; and in his laws allows such merry meetings, provided they have a discreet chief to govern and keep them in order, as good and useful: drunkenness being, says he, a true and certain trial of every one's nature, and withal fit to inspire old men with mettle to divert themselves in dancing and music: things of great use, but which they dare not attempt when sober. He moreover says that wine is able to supply the soul with temperance and the body with health. Nevertheless these restrictions, in part borrowed from the Carthaginians, please him: that they use it sparingly in expeditions of war;[4] that every judge and magistrate abstain from it when engaged in the duties of his post or in the consultation on the public affairs;[5] that such part of the day is not to be embezzled with it, as is due to other employments; nor that night in which a man intends to get a child.

Restrictions required in the use of wine.

'Tis said that the philosopher Stilpo, when oppressed with age, purposely hastened his end, by drinking pure wine.[6] The same thing, but not of his own design, dispatched also the philosopher Arcesilaus,[7] weakened by years.

Pure wine an enemy to old age.

But 'tis an old and pleasant question, whether the soul of a man can be overcome by the strength of wine?

Si munitæ adhibet vim sapientiæ?[8]

"And each grave thought for frolic airs resign?"

To what vanity does the good opinion we have of ourselves push us? The most regular and most perfect soul in the world has but too much to do to keep itself upright, from being overthrown by its own weakness. There is not one of a thousand that is right and settled so much as one minute in his life; and it may very well be doubted whether, according to her natural condition, it can ever be otherwise. But to join consistency to it is her utmost perfection; I mean though nothing should jostle and discompose her, which a thousand accidents may do. 'Tis to much purpose, indeed, that the great poet Lucretius keeps such a clutter with his philosophy, when behold he is ruined with a love-draught. Is it to be imagined that an apoplexy will not knock down Socrates as well as a porter? Some have forgotten their own names by the violence of a disease, and a slight wound has turned the judgment of others topsy-turvy. Let a man be as wise as he will, he is still a man; and than that, what is there more frail, more a mere nothing? Wisdom does not force our natural dispositions:

The most regular souls liable to be disordered by various accidents.

Sudores itaque, et pallorem existere toto
Corpore, et infringi linguam, vocemque aboriri,
Caligare oculos, sonere aures, succidere artus,
Denique concidere, ex animi terrore, videmus :[1]

" Paleness and sweat the countenance confounds,
The tongue 's deliver'd of abortive sounds ;
The eyes grow dim, ears deaf, the knees grow lame,
And do refuse to prop the trembling frame ;
And lastly, out of fear of mind, we all Things see into a dissolution fall :"

he must shut his eyes against the blow that threatens him ; he must tremble upon the brink of a precipice, like a child : nature having reserved these light works of her authority, not to be forced by our reason and stoical virtue, to teach man his mortality and little power. He turns pale with fear, red with shame, and groans with the cholic, if not very loud and despairingly, at least with a hoarse and broken voice :

Humani à se nihil alienum putet.[2]

" Let him not think he's free from human ties."

The poets, that feign all things at pleasure, dare not acquit their greatest heroes of tears :

Sic fatur lacrymans, classique immittit habenas.[3]

" He said, and wept, then spread his sails."

'Tis sufficient for a man to curb and moderate his inclinations ; for totally to suppress them is not in him to do. Even our Plutarch, that excellent and perfect judge of human actions, when he sees Brutus and Torquatus kill their own children, begins to doubt whether virtue could proceed so far, and to question whether these persons had not rather been stimulated by some other passion.[4] All actions exceeding the ordinary bounds are liable to sinister interpretation : forasmuch as our taste does no more affect what is above than what is below it.

Let us leave that other sect, which makes an express profession of haughty superiority :[5] but when, even in that sect,[6] reputed the most quiet and gentle, we hear these rhodomontades of Metrodorus : Occupavi te, Fortuna, atque cepi ; omnesque aditus tuos interclusi, ut ad me adspirare non posses ;[7] " Fortune, I have forestalled thee, and so fast shut up all the avenues thou canst not come at me ;" when Anaxarchus, by the command of Nicocreon, tyrant of Cyprus, was put into a stone mortar and pounded with iron mallets, ceases not to say, " Strike, batter, 'tis not Anaxarchus, 'tis but his sheath that you pound ;"[8] when we hear our martyrs cry out to the tyrant in the middle of the flame, " This side is roasted, fall to and eat ; it is enough done, begin to cook the other ;"[9] when we hear the child in Josephus, torn piece-meal with biting pincers, defying Antiochus, and crying out with a firm and assured voice, " Tyrant, thou losest thy labour, I am still at ease ; where is the pain, where are the torments with which thou didst so threaten me ? Is this all thou canst do ? My constancy torments thee more than thy cruelty does me. O pitiful coward ! thou faintest, and I grow stronger ; make me complain, make me bend, make me yield, if thou canst ; encourage thy satellites, cheer up thy executioners ; see, see, they faint and can do no more ; arm them, flesh them anew, spur them up ;"[10] really a man must confess that there is some excitement and fury, how holy soever, that does at that time possess those souls. When we come to these stoical sallies, " I had rather be furious than voluptuous," Μανειην μᾶλλον ἢ ἡσθειην, a saying of Antisthenes : when Sextius tells us, " He had rather be fettered with affliction than pleasure :" when Epicurus takes upon him to play with his gout, and, refusing health and ease, with gaiety of heart defies torment, and despising the lesser pains, as disdaining to contend with them, covets and calls out for sharper, more violent, and more worthy of him ;[11]

Spumantemque dari, pecora inter inertia, votis
Optat aprum, aut fulvum descendere monte leonem ;[12]

" Impatiently he views the feeble prey,
Wishing some nobler beast to cross his way,
And rather would the tusky boar attend,
Or see the tawny lion downward bend ;"

who can but conclude that these are sallies of a courage that has broken loose from its place ? Our soul cannot from her own seat reach so high ; 'tis necessary she must leave it, raise herself up, and, taking her bridle in her teeth, transport her man so far that he shall afterwards himself be astonished at what he has done. As in war the heat of battle sometimes pushes the gallant soldiers to perform things of so infinite danger as, after having recollected themselves, they themselves are the first to wonder at ; as poets, too, are often struck with admiration of their own writings, and know not the track through which they made so fine a career : this is in them called ardour, fury. Plato says—" 'Tis to no purpose for a sober man to knock at the door of the Muses ;"[13] and Aristotle says—" That no excellent soul is exempt from a mixture of folly ;"[14] and he has reason to call all transports, how commendable soever, folly, when they surpass our own judgment and understanding : because wisdom is a regular government of the soul, which is carried on with measure and proportion, and for which she is answerable to herself. Plato argues thus, " That the faculty of prophecy is above us ; that

CHAPTER III.

THE CUSTOM OF THE ISLE OF CEA.

To philosophize, what.

If, according to the common definition, to philosophize is to doubt, much more ought writing at random, and playing the fool, as I do, to be reputed doubting; for it is the business of novices and freshmen to enquire and dispute, and that of the chairman to determine. My moderator is the authority of the divine will, which governs us without contradiction, and which is seated above these vain and human contests.

Philip[2] having entered the Peloponnesus in arms, some one said to Damindas that the Lacedæmonians were likely to be very great sufferers if they did not reconcile themselves to his favour. "Coward!" replied he, "what can they suffer that do not fear to die?" It was asked of Agis, which way a man might live free? "By despising death," said he. These, and a thousand other sayings, to the same purpose, evidently refer to something more than a patient waiting the stroke of death when it shall come; for there are many misfortunes in life far worse to suffer than death itself. Witness the Lacedæmonian boy, taken by Antigonus, and sold for a slave, who, being by his new master commanded to some base employment: "Thou shalt see," says the boy, "whom thou hast bought; it would be a shame for me to serve, being within reach of liberty;" and, having so said, threw himself from the top of the house. Antipater severely threatening the Lacedæmonians, in order to make them acquiesce in a certain demand of his: "If thou threaten us with more than death," replied they, "we shall the more willingly die." And to Philip, having writ them word that he would frustrate all their enterprises: "What! wilt thou also hinder us from dying?" This is the meaning of the sentence, "That the wise man lives as long as he ought, not so long as he can;"[3] and that the most obliging present Nature has made us, and which takes from us all colour of complaint of our condition, is to have delivered into our own custody the keys of life. She has only ordered one door into life, but a hundred thousand of it. We may be straitened for earth to live upon, but earth sufficient to die upon can never be wanting; as Bojocalus answered the Romans.[4] Why dost thou complain of this world? it detains thee not. If thou livest in pain, thy own cowardice is the cause. There remains no more to die, but to be willing to die:

Many misfortunes worse to suffer than death.

Death depend upon the will.

> Ubique mors est; optime hoc cavit Deus.
> Eripere vitam nemo non homini potest;
> At nemo mortem: mille ad hanc aditus patent.[5]
>
> "Tender of human woes, indulgent fate
> Has left to death an ever-open gate:
> There's not a person on the earth but may > Take any fellow-creature's life away;
> And any man that will may yield his breath;
> There are a thousand ways that lead to death."

Neither is it a recipe for one disease; death does not merely relieve us of one particular malady, 'tis the infallible cure of all, an assured port that is never to be feared, and very often to be sought: it comes all to one point, whether a man gives himself his end, or stays to receive it; whether he pays before his day, or stay till his day of payment comes. Whencesoever it comes, it is still his; in what part soever the thread breaks, there's the end of the clue; the most voluntary death is the finest. Life depends upon the will of others, death upon our own. There is nothing in which we ought not to accommodate ourselves to our own humour so much as in that. Reputation is not concerned in such an enterprize; and it 's a folly to be diverted by any such apprehensions. Living is slavery, if the liberty of dying be away. The ordinary method of cure is carried on at the expense of life; they torment us with caustics, incisions, and amputations of limbs, interdicting aliments, and exhausting our blood; one step further, and we are cured indeed. Why is not the jugular vein as much at our disposal as the median?[6] For a desperate disease, a desperate cure. Servius, the grammarian, having the gout, could advise of no better remedy than to apply poison to his legs to deprive them of their sense; let them be gouty if they will, so they are but insensible of pain. God gives us leave enough, when he is pleased to reduce us to such a condition that to live is far worse than to die. 'Tis weakness to truckle under infirmities, but 'tis madness to cherish them. The Stoics say[8] that it is living according to nature in a wise man to take his leave of life even in the height of prosperity, provided he does it opportunely; and in a fool to prolong it though he be miserable, if he is not indigent of those things which are reputed the necessaries of life. As I do not offend the law provided against thieves when I embezzle my own money and cut my own purse, nor that against incendiaries, when I burn my own wood; so am I not under the lash of those made against murderers, for having deprived myself of my own life. Hegesias said that as the condition of life did, so the condition of death ought to depend upon our own choice.[1] And Diogenes meeting the philosopher Speusippus, so blown up with an inveterate dropsy that he was fain to be carried in a litter, and being by him saluted with "Health to thee, Diogenes;" "No health to thee," replied the other, "who consentest to live in such a condition." And in truth, not long after, Speusippus, weary of so languishing a state of life, killed himself.[2]

Suicide prohibited by God, and to be punished in the other world.

But this does not pass without admitting a dispute: for many are of opinion that we cannot quit this garrison of the world without express command of him who has placed us in it; and that it belongs to God alone, who has placed us here, not for ourselves only, but for his glory and the service of others, to dismiss us when it shall best please him, and not for us to depart without his license; that we are not born for ourselves only, but for our country also, the laws of which require an account from us, upon the score of their own interest, and have an action of manslaughter good against us; or, if these fail to take cognizance of the fact, we are punished in the other world as deserters of our duty:

Proxima deinde tenent mœsti loca, qui sibi lethum
Insontes peperere manu, lucemque perosi
Projecere animas.[3]

"The next in place and punishment are they
Who prodigally threw their souls away—
Fools, who, repining at their wretched state,
And loathing anxious life, suborned their fate."

There is more constancy in suffering the chain we are tied in than in breaking it, and more evidence of fortitude in Regulus than in Cato. 'Tis indiscretion and impatience that pushes us on. No misfortunes can make true virtue turn her back; she seeks and requires pain and grief as her aliment. The menaces of tyrants, racks, and tortures, serve only to animate and rouse her;

Duris ut ilex tonsa bipennibus
Nigræ feraci frondis in Algido,
Per damna, per cædes, ab ipso
Ducit opes, animumque ferro;[4]

"Are like an oak upon the wooden top
Of shaded Algidus, bestrew'd with leaves,
Which, as keen axes its green honours lop,
Through wounds, through losses, no decay can feel,
Collecting strength and spirit from the steel."

And, as the other says,

Non est, ut putas, virtus, pater,
Timere vitam; sed malis ingentibus
Obstare, nec se vertere, ac retro dare.[5]

"That fear to live is virtue, you contend,
This point, my father, you can ne'er defend;
That 's virtue which can evils great withstand,
And not retreat, nor shift to either hand."

Or as this:

Rebus in adversis facile est contemnere mortem:
Fortius ille facit, qui miser esse potest.[6]

"The wretched well may laugh at death, but he Is braver far can live in misery."

'Tis cowardice, not virtue, to lie squat in a furrow under a tomb, to evade the blows of fortune. Virtue never stops, nor goes out of her path for the greatest storm that blows:

Si fractus illabatur orbis
Impavidum ferient ruinæ.[7]

"Nor would the wreck his mind appal,
Should the whole world to swift destruction fall."

And for the most part, the flying of other inconveniencies brings us to this; endeavouring to evade death, we run into the jaws of it:

Hic, rogo, non furor est, ne moriare, mori?[8]

"Can there be greater madness, pray reply, Than that one should for fear of dying die?"

like those who, for fear of a precipice, throw themselves headlong into it:

Multos in summa pericula misit
Venturi timor ipse mali: fortissimus ille est,
Qui promptus metuenda pati, si cominus instent,
Et differre potest.[9]

"The fear of future ills oft makes men run
Into far worse than those they strive to shun;
But he deserves the noblest character,
Dares boldly stand the mischiefs he doth fear,
When they confront him, and appear in view,
And can defer at least, if not eschew."

Usque adeo, mortis formidine, vitæ
Percipit humanos odium, lucisque videndæ,
Ut sibi consciscant mœrenti pectore lethum;
Obliti fontem curarum hunc esse timorem.[10]

"Death unto that degree doth some men fright,
That, causing them to hate both life and light,
They kill themselves, thus seeming not aware
That this same fear 's the fountain of their care."

Plato, in his Laws,[11] assigns an ignominious sepulture to him who has deprived his nearest and best friend, namely himself, of life and his destined course of years, being neither compelled so to do by public judgment, by any sad and inevitable accident of fortune, nor by any insupportable disgrace, but merely pushed on by the cowardice and imbecility of a timorous soul. And the opinion that makes so little of life is ridiculous; for it is our being, 'tis all we have. Things of a nobler and more elevated being may indeed accuse this of ours; but it is against nature for us to contemn and make little account of ourselves; 'tis a disease particular to man, and not seen in any other creatures, to hate and despise itself. It is a vanity of the same stamp, to desire to be something else than what we are. The effects of such a desire do not touch us, forasmuch as it is contradicted and hindered in itself. He that desires to be changed from man into angel does nothing for himself; he would be never the

"For whosoe'er in misery is to live,
Must BE whene'er that misery shall arrive."

Security, indolence, impassibility, and the privation of the evils of life, which we pretend to purchase at the price of dying, are of no manner of advantage to us. That man evades war to very little purpose that can have no fruition of peace. And for as little does he avoid toil who cannot enjoy repose.

What are the justest reasons for suicide.

Amongst those of the first of these two opinions, there has been great debate; what occasions are sufficient to justify the determination to kill one's-self, which they call εὔλογον ἐξαγωγην,[2] "a reasonable handsome exit;" for though they say that men may die from trivial causes, seeing those that detain us in life are of no very great weight; yet there is to be some limit to this. There are fantastic and senseless humours that have prompted not only particular men, but whole nations, to destroy themselves, of which I have elsewhere given some examples; and we further read of the Milesian virgins that by an insane compact they hanged themselves, one after another, 'till the magistrate took order in it, enacting that the bodies of such as should be found so hanged should be drawn by the same halter, stark naked through the city.[3] When Therycion expected Cleomenes to dispatch himself, by reason of the ill posture of his affairs, and having evaded the death of most honour in the battle he had lost, to accept of this, the second in honour to it, and not to give the conquerors opportunity to make him undergo either an ignominious death or an infamous life; Cleomenes, with a courage truly stoic and Lacedæmonian, rejected his counsel as unmanly and poor: "That," said he, "is a remedy that can never be wanting, and which a man never should make use of whilst there is an inch of hope remaining;" telling him "that it sometimes showed firmness and valour to live; that he would that even his death should be of use to his country; and that he would make of it an act of honour and virtue."[4] Therycion thought himself in the right, and did his own business; and Cleomenes after did the same, but not till he had first tried the utmost malevolence of fortune.

All the inconveniencies in the world are not considerable enough that a man should die to evade them; and, besides there being so many sudden changes in human things, it is hard rightly to judge when we are at the end of our hope:

Sperat et in sæva victus gladiator arena
Sit licet infesto pollice turba minax.[5]

"The fencer conquer'd in the lists hopes on,
Though the turn'd thumb commands him to be gone."

All things, says the old adage, are to be hoped for by a man whilst he lives. "Aye," replies Seneca, "but why should this rather be always running in a man's head that fortune can do all things for the living man, than this, that fortune has no power over him that knows how to die?"[6] We see Josephus when engaged in near and apparent danger, a whole people being risen up against him, and no visible means of escape, and being, as himself says,[7] in this extremity counselled by one of his friends to dispatch himself, yet do well to maintain himself in hope; for fortune, beyond all human expectation, so changed the face of things that he saw himself delivered without any manner of inconvenience. Whereas Brutus and Cassius, on the contrary,

Deaths fatal by having been precipitant.

threw away the remains of the Roman liberty, of which they were the sole protectors, by the precipitation and temerity wherewith they killed themselves before the proper time and occasion. Monsieur d'Anguien, at the Battle of Serisolles, twice attempted to cut his throat, despairing of the fortune of the day, which went, indeed, very untowardly on that side of the field where he was engaged, and by that precipitation was very near depriving himself of the joy and honour of so glorious a victory.[8] I have seen a hundred hares escape out of the very teeth of the greyhounds; Aliquis carnifici suo superstes fuit. "Some have survived their intended executioners."

Multa dies, variusque labor mutabilis ævi

Appear in turns as fortune shifts the scene.
Some, raised aloft, come tumbling down amain,
Then fall so hard they bound and rise again."

What causes may induce a man to kill himself.

Pliny says there are only three sorts of diseases to escape any of which a man has good title to destroy himself; the worst of which is the stone in the bladder, when the urine is suppressed.[10] Seneca says those only [10] "In the quarto edition of these Essays, in 1588," remarks M. Coste, "Pliny is said to mention two more, viz., a pain in the stomach, and the head-ache, which, he says, lib. xxv. cap. 3, were the only three distempers, almost, for which men killed themselves. As to their right of killing themselves, he does not mention a word of it here; and I cannot conceive why Montaigne, who, at first, entered thoroughly into Pliny's sense, by saying that, according to this author, 'it was the custom for men to kill themselves, in order to be rid of any one of these three distempers, made him say afterwards that they had a right to kill themselves for this very end.'" which for a long time discompose the functions of the soul. Some there have been who, to avoid a worse, have chosen a death of their own liking. Democritus, general of the Ætolians, being brought prisoner to Rome, found means to make his escape by night; but being closely pursued by his keepers, rather than suffer himself to be retaken, he fell upon his own sword and died.[1] Antinous and Theodotus, their city of Epirus being reduced by the Romans to the last extremity, gave the people counsel to kill themselves; but, the advice of giving themselves up to the enemy prevailing, they went to seek death, rushing furiously upon the enemy, with an intention to strike home, but not to defend a blow.[2] The Island of Gozo[3] being forced some years ago by the Turks, a Sicilian, who had two beautiful daughters marriageable, killed them both with his own hand, and their mother, running in to save them, to boot; which having done, sallying out of the house with a cross-bow and a harquebuss, with those two shots he killed two of the Turks nearest to his door, and drawing his sword charged furiously in amongst the rest, where he was suddenly enclosed and cut to pieces; by that means delivering his family and himself from slavery and dishonour. The Jewish women, after having circumcised their children, threw themselves down a precipice to avoid the cruelty of Antigonus. I have been told of a gentleman in one of our prisons, whose friends being informed he would certainly be condemned, to avoid the ignominy of such a death, suborned a priest to tell him that the only means of deliverance was to recommend himself to such a saint under such and such vows, and fast eight days together without taking any manner of nourishment, what weakness or faintness soever he might find in himself during the time. He followed their advice, and by that means destroyed himself before he was aware, not dreaming of death or any danger in the experiment. Scribonia advising her nephew Libo to kill himself, rather than to attend the stroke of justice, told him "that it was to do other people's business to preserve his life, to put it after into the hands of those who, within three or four days, would come and fetch him to execution; and that it was to serve his enemies to keep his blood to gratify their malice."[4] We read in the Bible that Nicanor,[5] the persecutor of the law of God, having sent his soldiers to seize upon the good old man Razias, surnamed, in honour of his virtue, the Father of the Jews; the good man seeing no other remedy, his gates burnt down, and the enemies ready to seize him, choosing rather to die generously than to fall into the hands of his wicked adversaries, and suffer himself to be cruelly butchered by them, contrary to the honour of his rank and quality, he stabbed himself with his own sword; but the blow, from haste, not having been given home, he ran and threw himself from the top of a wall headlong among them, who separating themselves and making room, he pitched directly upon his head. Notwithstanding which, feeling yet in himself some remains of life, he renewed his courage, and, starting up upon his feet, all bloody and wounded as he was, and making his way through the crowd, ran to a neighbouring precipice, but, not being able to reach the edge, through one of his wounds, he drew out his bowels, which, tearing and pulling to pieces with both his hands, he threw amongst his pursuers, all the while attesting and invoking the divine vengeance upon them.

Acts of violence committed on the chastity of women.

Of violence offered to the conscience, that against the chastity of woman is, in my opinion, the most to be avoided, forasmuch as there is a certain pleasure naturally mixed with it; and for that reason the dissent cannot be sufficiently perfect and entire, so that the violence seems to be mixed with a little consent of the forced party. The Ecclesiastical History marks with favour several examples of devout persons who have embraced death to secure them from the outrages prepared by tyrants against their religion and honour. Of Pelagia[6] and Sophronia,[7] both canonized, the first precipitated herself with her mother and sisters into the river, to avoid being forced by some soldiers, and the last also killed herself to escape being ravished by the Emperor Maxentius.

It may peradventure be an honour to us in future ages, that a learned author of this present time, and a Parisian, too, takes a great deal of pains to persuade the ladies of our age, rather to take any other course than to enter into the horrid meditation of such an act of despair. I am sorry he had never heard (that he might have inserted it amongst his other stories) the saying of a woman, which was told me at Toulouse, who had passed through the handling of some soldiers,—"God be praised," said she, "that once at least in my life I have had my fill without sin!" Truly, these cruelties are very unworthy the French sweetness and good-nature; and indeed, God be thanked, our air is very well purged of it since this good advice. 'Tis enough that they say No, in doing it, according to the rule of the good Marot.[8]

Death preferable to a miserable life.

History is every where full of such as, in a thousand ways, have for death exchanged a painful and irksome life. Lucius Aruntius killed himself, to fly, he said, both the future and the past.[9] Granius Silvanus and Statius Proximus, after having been pardoned by Nero, killed themselves;[1] either disdaining to live by the favour of so wicked a man, or that they might not be troubled at some other time to obtain a second pardon, considering his facility to suspect, and credit accusations against, worthy men. Spargapizez, the son of Queen Thomyris, being a prisoner of war to Cyrus, made use of the first favour Cyrus shewed him, in commanding him to be unbound, to kill himself, having sought no other benefit of liberty but only to be avenged of himself for the disgrace of being taken.[2] Bogez, governor in Eiona for King Xerxes, being besieged by the Athenian army under the conduct of Cimon, refused the conditions offered, that he might return safe into Asia with all his wealth, unable to survive the loss of a place his master had given him to keep; wherefore, having defended the city to the last extremity, nothing being left to eat, he first threw the gold, and whatever else the enemy could make booty of, into the river Strymon, and, after causing a great pile to be set on fire, and the throats of all his wives, children, concubines, and servants, to be cut, he threw their bodies into the fire, and at last leaped into it himself.[3]

Ninachetuen, an Indian lord, so soon as he heard the first whisper of the Portuguese vice-roy's determination to dispossess him, without any apparent cause, of the command in Malaca, to transfer it to the King of Campar, took this resolution with himself. He caused a scaffold, longer than broad, to be erected, supported by columns, royally adorned with tapestry, and strewed with flowers and abundance of perfumes; all which being thus prepared, in a robe of cloth of gold, set full of jewels of great value, he came out into the street, and mounted the steps to the scaffold, at one corner of which he had a lighted pile of aromatic wood. Everybody ran to see to what end these unusual preparations were made: when Ninachetuen, with a manly but discontented countenance, began to remonstrate how much he had obliged the Portuguese nation, and with what fidelity he had carried himself in his charge; that having so often, with his sword in his hand, manifested, in the behalf of others, that honour was much more dear to him than life, he was not to abandon the concern of it for himself. That, fortune denying him all the means of opposing the affront designed to be put upon him, his courage at least enjoined him to free himself from the sense of it, and not to serve for a table-talk to the people, nor for a triumph to men less deserving than himself; which having said, he leaped into the fire.

Remarkable death of an Indian of quality.

Sextilia, the wife of Scaurus, and Paxea, the wife of Labeo, to encourage their husbands to evade the dangers that pressed upon them, wherein they had no other share than from mere conjugal affection, voluntarily gave up their own lives, to serve them, in this extreme necessity, for company and example.[4] What they did for their husbands, Cocceius Nerva did for his country, with less utility, though with equal affection. This great lawyer, flourishing in health, riches, reputation, and favour with the emperor, had no other cause to kill himself but the sole compassion of the miserable estate of the Roman Republic.[5] Nothing can add to the grace of the death of the wife of Fulvius, a favourite of Augustus. Augustus having discovered that he or his wife had blabbed an important secret he had entrusted him withal, one morning that he came to his court received him very coldly. He returned home full of despair, and sorrowfully told his wife that, being fallen into this misfortune, he was resolved to kill himself. To which she replied, "'Tis but reason you should, seeing that, having so often experienced the incontinency of my tongue, you could not take caution against it. But let me kill myself first;" and, without any more dispute, ran herself through the body with a sword.[6]

Two women who put themselves to death, to encourage their husbands to do the same.

Vibius Virius, despairing of the safety of his city besieged by the Romans, and likewise of their mercy, in the last deliberation of his city's senate, after many remonstrances conducing to that end, concluded that the most noble means to escape fortune was by their own hands:—telling them that the enemy would have them in honour, and Hannibal would be sensible how many faithful friends he had abandoned; inviting those who approved of his advice to go take a good supper he had ready at home, where, after they had eaten well, they would drink together of what he had prepared; a beverage, said he, that will deliver our bodies from torments, our souls from injury, and our eyes and ears from the sense of so many hateful mischiefs as the conquered are to suffer from angry and implacable conquerors. "I have," said he, "taken order for fit persons to throw our bodies in a funeral pile before my door so soon as we are dead." Many approved this high resolution, few adopted it: seven-and-twenty senators followed him, who, after having tried to drown the thought of this fatal determination in wine, ended the feast with the mortal mess, and embracing one another, after they had jointly deplored the misfortune of their country, some retired home to their own houses, others stayed to be burned with Vibius in his funeral pile; and were all of them so long a dying, the vapour of the wine having prepossessed the veins, and by that means deferring the effect of the poison, that some of them were within an hour of seeing the enemy within the walls of Capua, which was taken the next morning, and of undergoing the miseries they had at so dear a rate endeavoured to evade.[1] Taurea Jubellius, another citizen of the same country,[2] seeing the consul, Fulvius, returning from the shameful butchery he had made on this occasion of two hundred and twenty-five senators, called him back fiercely by his name, and having made him stop, "Give the word," said he, "that somebody may dispatch me after the massacre of so many others, that thou mayest boast to have killed a much more valiant man than thyself." Fulvius, disdaining him as a man out of his wits, and as also having received letters from Rome, contrary to the inhumanity of this execution, which tied his hands, Jubellius proceeded;—"Since my country being taken, my friends dead, and having with my own hands slain my wife and children to rescue them from desolation and ruin, I am denied to die the death of my fellow citizens, let us borrow from virtue vengeance on this hated life!" and drawing a sword he carried concealed about him, he ran it through his own bosom, falling down backward, and expiring at the consul's feet.

Alexander, laying siege to a city of the Indies, those within, finding themselves very hardly pressed, put on a vigorous resolution to deprive him of the pleasure of his victory, and accordingly burned themselves in general, together with their city, in spite of all his efforts to save them: a new kind of war, where the enemies sought to rescue them, and they to kill themselves, doing, to make themselves sure of death, all that men do to secure their lives.[3]

Astapa, a city of Spain, finding itself too weak in walls and defence to withstand the Romans, the inhabitants made a heap of all their riches and furniture in the public place, and, having ranged upon this heap all the women and children, and piled them round with wood and other combustible matter to take sudden fire, and left fifty of their young men for the execution of that whereon they had resolved; they made a desperate sally, where, for want of power to overcome, they caused themselves to be every man slain. The fifty, after having massacred every living soul throughout the whole city, and put fire to this pile, threw themselves lastly into it, finishing their generous liberty rather in an insensible, than after a sorrowful and disgraceful, manner, and showing the enemy that, if fortune had been so pleased, they had the courage as well to take the victory out of their hands as to frustrate and render it dreadful, and even mortal, to those who, allured by the glitter of the gold melting in this flame, having approached it, were in great numbers there suffocated and burned, being kept from retiring by the crowd that followed them.[4]

The Abydeans, being pressed by King Philip, put on the same resolution, but, being come upon too suddenly, they could not put it in effect; the king, however, who abhorred to see the precipitate rashness of this execution, (the treasure and moveables which they had condemned to fire and water being first seized,) drawing off his soldiers, granted them three days' time to kill themselves in, that they might do it with more order and at greater ease; which space they filled with blood and slaughter, beyond the utmost excess of all hostile cruelty, so that not so much as any one soul was left alive that had the power to destroy itself.[5] There are infinite examples of like popular conclusions, which seem the more tremendous by how much the effect is more universal, and yet are really less than when singly executed. What arguments and persuasions cannot make upon individuals, they can do upon all, the ardour of society imposing upon particular judgments.

The condemned who waited to be executed, in the reign of Tiberius, forfeited their goods, and were denied the rites of sepulture; but those who, by killing themselves, did anticipate it, were interred, and had liberty to dispose of their estates by will.[6]

But men sometimes covet death out of hope of a greater good. "I desire," says St. Paul,[7] "to be dead, that I may be with Christ;" and "who shall rid me of these bonds?" Cleombrotus Ambraciota,[8] having read Plato's Phædo, entered into so great a desire of the life to come that without any other occasion he threw himself into the sea. By which it appears how improperly we call this voluntary dissolution despair, to which the eagerness of hope does often incline us, and often a calm and temperate desire, proceeding from a mature and considerate judgment. Jaques du Chastel, Bishop of Soissons, in St. Louis's foreign expedition, seeing the king and the whole army upon the point of returning into France, leaving the affairs of religion imperfect, took a resolution rather to go into Paradise; wherefore, having taken solemn leave of his friends, he charged alone, in the sight of every one, into the enemy's army, where he was presently cut to pieces. In a certain kingdom of the New World, upon a day of solemn procession, when the Idol they adore is drawn about in public upon a car of wonderful size; besides that several are then seen cutting off pieces of their flesh to offer to him, there are a number of others who prostrate themselves to be crushed and broken to pieces with the weighty wheels, to obtain the veneration of sanctity after their death, which is accordingly paid them. The death of the fore-named bishop, with his sword in his hand, has more of gallantry in it, and less of feeling, the ardour of combat taking away part of the latter.

There are some governments who have taken upon them to regulate the justice and opportunity of voluntary deaths. In former times there was kept, in our city of Marseilles, a poison prepared out of hemlock at the public charge, for those who had a mind to hasten their end, having first before the Six Hundred, which were their senate, given an account of the reasons and motives of their design, and it was not otherwise lawful than by leave from the magistrate, and upon just occasion, to do violence to themselves. The same law was also in use in other places.

Poison kept and prepared at the public expense for such as were inclined to make use of it.

Sextus Pompeius, in his expedition into Asia, touching at the Isle of Cea, in Negropont, it accidentally happened whilst he was there, as we have it from one that was with him,[1] that a woman of great quality having given an account to her citizens why she was resolved to put an end to her life, invited Pompeius to her death, to render it the more honourable; an invitation that he accepted, and having long tried in vain, by the power of his eloquence, which was very great, to divert her from that design, he acquiesced at last to grant her request. She had passed four-score and ten years in a very happy state both of body and mind; but being then laid on her bed, better drest than ordinary, and leaning upon her elbow: "The Gods," said she, "O, Sextus Pompeius, and rather those I leave than those I go to seek, reward thee, for that thou hast not disdained to be both the counsellor of my life, and the witness of my death. For my part, having always experienced the smiles of fortune, for fear lest the desire of living too long may make me see a contrary fate, I am going by a happy end to dismiss the remains of my soul, leaving behind two daughters and a legion of nephews." Which having said, and having exhorted her family to live in union and peace, she divided amongst them her goods, and recommending her domestic gods to her eldest daughter, she took with a firm hand the bowl that contained the poison, and, having made her vows and prayers to Mercury to conduct her to some happy abode in the other world, drank off the mortal potion, which having done, she entertained the company with the progress of its operation, and how the cold by degrees seized the several parts of her body, one after another, till, having in the end told them it began to seize upon her heart and bowels, she called her daughters to do their last office and close her eyes.

Pliny[2] tells us of a certain hyperborean nation, where, by reason of the sweet temperature of the air, lives did rarely end but by the voluntary surrender of the inhabitants; but that, being weary of and satiated with life, they had a custom, at a very old age, after having made good cheer, to precipitate themselves into the sea from the top of a certain rock, destined for that service. Pain, and the fear of a worse death, seem to me the most excusable incitements.

The voluntary death of the Hyperboreans.

CHAPTER IV.

BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Of all our French writers, I give, with justice, I think, the palm to Jaques Amiot, as well for the propriety and purity of his language, in which he excels all others, as his application and patience in going through so long a work, and the depth of his learning and judgment in having been able to unravel and explain so difficult an author; (for let people say what they please, I understand nothing of Greek, but I meet with sense so well connected and maintained throughout his whole translation that certainly he either knew the true imagination of the author, or having, by long conversation with him, planted in his soul a thorough and lively idea of that of Plutarch, at least he has lent him nothing that either contradicts or dishonours him;) but what I am most pleased with him for is the discreet choice he has made of so noble and useful a book to make a present of to his country. We ignorant people had been undone had not this book raised us out of the mire; by its favour we dare both speak and write; by it the ladies are able to school their schoolmasters: 'tis our breviary. If this good man lived I would desire him to do as much for Xenophon: 'tis a much easier task than the other, and consequently more proper for his age. And besides, I know not how, but methinks, though he briskly and clearly enough gets over steps another would have stumbled at, that nevertheless his style is more his own where he does not encounter those difficulties, and rolls on at its ease.

A eulogium on Amiot, the translator of Plutarch.

I was just now reading that passage where Plutarch says of himself, that Rusticus, being present at a declamation of his in Rome, he there received a packet from the emperor, and deferred to open it till all was over: for which, says he, all the company highly applauded the gravity of this person. 'Tis true, that his discourse being upon Curiosity, and that eager passion for news which makes us, with so much indiscretion and impatience, quit all things to entertain a new comer, and, without any manner of respect or civility, tear open on a sudden, in what company soever, the letters that are

[1] Val. Max. ii. 6. 8.

[2] Nat. Hist. iv. 12.

delivered to us, he had reason to applaud the gravity of Rusticus upon this occasion; and might moreover have added to it the commendation of his civility and courtesy, that would not interrupt the course of his declamation. But I doubt whether any one can commend his prudence; for, receiving unexpected letters, and especially from an emperor, it might well have fallen out that the deferring to read them might have been of great prejudice. The vice opposite to curiosity is negligence, to which I naturally incline, and which I have seen some men so extremely guilty of that one might have found the letters that had been sent to them three or four days before, still sealed up in their pockets.

Negligence the opposite vice to curiosity.

I never opened any letters directed to another, not merely those entrusted with me, but even such as chance has placed in my hand; and am annoyed if my eyes unawares steal any contents of letters of importance which a great man is reading when I stand near him. Never was man less inquisitive, or less prying into other men's affairs than I am.

In our fathers' days Monsieur de Boutieres had like to have lost Turin from neglecting, he having company at that time with him at supper, to read an information that was sent him of a conspiracy against the city where he commanded. And this very Plutarch tells me that Julius Cæsar had preserved himself, if, in going to the Senate the day he was assassinated by the conspirators, he had read a paper that was presented to him by the way; and he tells also the story of Archias, tyrant of Thebes, that the night before the execution of the design Pelopidas had laid to kill him, to restore his country to liberty, he had an account sent him in writing by another Archias, an Athenian, of the whole conspiracy, and that this packet having been delivered to him while he sat at supper, he deferred the opening of it, saying, which afterwards became a proverb in Greece, "Business to-morrow."[1]

A wise man may, I confess, out of respect to another, as not indecorously to disturb the company, as Rusticus did, or not to break off another affair of importance in hand, defer to read or hear any new thing that is brought him; but if for his own interest or particular pleasure, especially if he be a public minister, he will not interrupt his dinner, or break his sleep, he is inexcusable. And there was anciently at Rome the Consular Place, as they called it, which was the most honourable at the table, for being a place of most liberty, and of more convenient access to those who came in to talk with the person seated there.[2] By which it appears that, though at meals, they did not totally abandon the concern of other affairs. But, when all is said, it is very hard in human actions to give so exact a rule, upon the best grounds of reason, that Fortune will not have a hand in them, and maintain her own right.

The consular place at table the most accessible.

CHAPTER V.

OF CONSCIENCE.

The Sieur de la Brousse my brother, and I, travelling one day together during the time of our civil wars, met a gentleman of good mien. He was of the contrary party to ours, though I did not know so much, for he pretended otherwise; and the mischief is that, in this sort of war, the cards are so shuffled, an enemy not being distinguishable from a friend by any apparent mark, either of language or habit, nourished under the same laws, air, and manners, that it is very hard to avoid disorder and confusion. This made me afraid myself of meeting any of our troops in a place where I was not known, that I might not be in fear to tell my name, and peradventure of something worse; as it has befallen me before, where, by one of these mistakes, I lost both men and horses; and, amongst others, an Italian gentleman, my page, whom I had bred with the greatest care and affection, was miserably killed —in whom a promising youth of great expectation was blasted. But the gentleman that my brother and I met had so strange a fear upon him at the meeting of any horse, or passing by any of the towns belonging to the king, that I at last discovered them to be alarms of conscience, and the poor man seemed to be in such a condition as if through his vizard, and the crosses upon his cassock, one might have penetrated into his bosom, and read the most secret intentions of his heart. So wonderful is the power of conscience, that it makes us betray, accuse, and fight against ourselves; and, for want of other witnesses, to give evidence against ourselves,

> Occultum quatiens animo tortore flagellum.[3]
>
> "Whom conscience, ne'er asleep,
> "Wounds with incessant strokes, not loud, but deep."

This story is in every child's mouth: Bessus the Pæonian, being reproached with wantonness, for pulling down a nest of young sparrows and killing them, replied he had reason so to do, seeing that those little birds never ceased falsely to accuse him of the murder of his father. This parricide had till then been concealed and unknown, but the revenging fury of conscience caused it to be discovered by himself, who was justly to suffer for it.[4] Hesiod corrects the saying of Plato, "That punishment closely follows sin;" it being, as he says, born at the same time with it.[1] Whoever expects punishment, already suffers it; whoever has deserved it, expects it.[2] Wickedness contrives torments against itself: Malum consilium, consultori pessimum:[3] "Ill designs fall out worse to the contriver:" as the wasp stings and offends another, but most of all itself; for it there loses its sting and its power for ever,

[4] Plutarch, On Divine Justice.

Punishment connate with sin.

Vitasque in vulnere ponunt.[4]

"And in the wound which they inflict expire."

Cantharides have somewhere about them, by a contrariety of nature, a counterpoison against their poison.[5] In like manner, at the same time that we take delight in vice, there springs in the conscience a displeasure that afflicts us sleeping and waking with many tormenting imaginations:

Quippe ubi se multi, per somnia sæpe loquentes,
Aut morbo delirantes, protraxe ferantur,
Et celata diu in medium peccata dedisse.[6]

"The guilty seldom their own counsel keep,
But oft will blab it ev'n in their sleep;
Or, in a fever raging, will reveal
Crimes which they long had labour'd to conceal."

Apollodorus dreamed that he saw himself flayed by the Scythians, and after boiled in a cauldron, and that his heart muttered these words: "I am the cause of all these mischiefs that have befallen thee."[7] Epicurus said that no hiding hole can conceal the wicked, since they can never assure themselves of being hid, for their consciences discover them to themselves.[8]

Prima est hæc ultio, quod se
Judice nemo nocens absolvitur.[9]

"'Tis the first constant punishment of sin,
That no bad man absolves himself within."

As an ill conscience fills us with fear, so a good one gives us greater confidence and assurance; and I can truly say that I have gone through several hazards with a more steady pace, in consideration of the secret knowledge I had of my own will, and the innocence of my intentions:

Conscia mens ut cuique sua est, ita concipit intra Pectora pro facto spemque, metumque suo.[10]

"Despotic conscience rules our hopes and fears."

Of this there are a thousand examples; but it will be enough to instance three of one and the same person. Scipio being one day accused before the people of Rome of a heavy crime, instead of excusing himself, or flattering the judges: "It will become you well," said he, "to sit in judgment upon him by whom you have the power to judge all the world."[11] And another time all the answer he gave to several impeachments brought against him by a tribune of the people, instead of making his defence: "Come, citizens,"[12] said he, "let us go render thanks to the gods for the victory they gave me over the Carthaginians on such a day;" and marching himself before them towards the temple, he had presently all the assembly, and his very accuser himself, following at his heels.[12] And Petilius having been set on by Cato to demand of him an account of the money that had passed through his hands in the province of Antioch, Scipio, being come into the senate for that purpose, produced a book from under his robe, in which, he told them, was an exact account of his receipts and disbursements; but being required to deliver it to the secretary to be examined and enrolled, he refused, saying, "He would not do himself so great a disgrace;" and in the presence of the whole senate tore the book with his own hands to pieces.[13] I do not believe that a seared conscience could have counterfeited so great an assurance. "He had naturally too high a spirit, and was accustomed to too high a fortune," says Titus Livius, "to know how to be criminal, and to dispose himself to the meanness of defending his innocency."

The confident innocency of Scipio.

The putting men to the rack is a dangerous invention, and seems to be rather a trial of patience than of truth. Both he who has the fortitude to endure it conceals the truth, and he who has not. For why should pain sooner make me confess what really is, than force me to say what is not? And, on the contrary, if he who is not guilty of what he is accused of has the courage to undergo those torments, why should not he who is guilty have the same, so fair a reward as life being in his prospect? I think the ground of this invention proceeds from the consideration of the force of conscience: for to the guilty it seems to assist the rack to make him confess his fault and to shake his resolution; and on the other side, that it fortifies the innocent against the torture. But when all is done, 'tis in plain truth a trial full of uncertainty and danger. What would not a man say, what would not a man do, to avoid such intolerable torments?

whence it comes to pass that he whom the judge has racked that he may not die innocent is made to die both innocent and racked. A thousand and a thousand have charged their own heads by false confessions, amongst whom I place Philotas, considering the circumstances of the trial Alexander put him upon, and the progress of his torture.[1] "But so it is," say they, "that it is the least evil human weakness could invent:" very inhuman notwithstanding, and to very little purpose, in my opinion."

The use of the rack condemned by several nations, and why.

Many nations, less barbarous in this than the Greeks and Romans who call them so, repute it horrible and cruel to torment and pull a man to pieces for a fault of which they are yet in doubt. How can it help your ignorance? Are not you unjust, that, not to kill him without cause, do worse than kill him? And that this is so, do but observe by how many times he had rather die without reason than undergo this examination, more painful than execution itself; and which often, by its extremity, anticipates execution and dispatches him. I know not where I had this story,[2] but it exactly matches the conscience of our justice in this particular. A country-woman came to a general[3] of very severe discipline, and accused one of his soldiers that he had taken from her children the little food she had left to nourish them withal, the army having consumed all the rest; but of this, proof there was none. The general cautioned the woman to take good heed to what she said, for that she would make herself guilty of a false accusation, and should suffer the punishment due to it if she told a lie; but she persisting, he presently caused the soldier's belly to be ripped up, to clear the truth of the fact, and the woman was found to be in the right. An instructive sentence.

CHAPTER VI.

USE MAKES PERFECT.

Reason and instruction, without practice, cannot make us virtuous.

'Tis not to be expected that reasoning and instruction, though we never so voluntarily surrender our belief to them, should be powerful enough to lead us on so far as to action, if we do not over and above exercise and form the soul by experience to the course for which we design it: it will otherwise doubtless find itself at a loss when it comes to the pinch of the business. This is the reason why those amongst the philosophers who were ambitious to attain to a greater excellence were not contented to await the severities of fortune in their retirement and repose, lest she should surprise them raw and unexpert in the combat; but sallied out to meet her, and purposely threw themselves into the proof of difficulties. Some of whom abandoned riches to exercise themselves in a voluntary poverty; others have sought out labour, and an austerity of life, to inure themselves to hardships and inconveniences; others have deprived themselves of their dearest members, as of their eyes and instruments of generation, lest their too delightful and effeminate service should soften and relax the stability of their souls.

But in dying, which is the greatest work we have to do, practice can give us no assistance. A man may by habit fortify himself against pain, shame, poverty, and such like misfortunes; but as to death, we can experience it but once, and are all apprentices when we come to it.

There have anciently been men such excellent managers of their time that they have tried even in death itself to relish and taste it, and who have bent their utmost faculties of mind to discover what this passage is. But they are none of them come back to give an account of it:

Nemo expergitus extat,
Frigida quem semel est vitai pausa sequuta,[4]

"No person e'er again awak'd to breath
Who once was clasp'd in the cold arms of death."

A memorable instance of a Roman, who, when dying, observed the effect of death.

Canius Julius, a noble Roman, of singular firmness and virtue, having been condemned to die by that rascal Caligula, besides many admirable testimonies that he gave of his resolution, as he was just going to receive the stroke of the executioner was asked by a philosopher, a friend of his,—"Well, Canius, whereabout is your soul now? What is she doing?—what are you thinking of?" "I was thinking," replied he, "to keep myself ready, and the faculties of my mind concentrated and fixed, to try if in this short and quick instant of death I could perceive the motion of the soul when she parts from the body, and whether she has any sense of the separation, that I may hereafter come again, if I can, to acquaint my friends with it."[5] This man philosophizes not unto death only, but in death itself. What a strange assurance was this, what loftiness of courage, to desire his death should be a lesson to him, and to have leisure to think of other things in so great an affair.

Jus hoc animi morientis habebat.[6]

How a man may, in some measure, make death familiar to him.

And yet I fancy there is some way of making it familiar to us, and in some sort of making trial what it is. We may gain experience of it, if not entire and perfect, yet such, at least, as shall not be totally useless to us; and that may render us more assured. If we cannot undertake it, we may approach it and view it; and if we do not advance so far as to the fort, we may at least discover and make ourselves perfect in the avenues.

Sleep the image of death.

It is not without reason that we are taught to consider sleep as a resemblance of death: with how great facility do we pass from waking to sleeping, and with how little concern do we lose the knowledge of light and of ourselves! Perhaps the faculty of sleeping would seem useless and contrary to nature, since it deprives us of all action and sense, were it not that by it nature instructs us that she has equally made us to die as to live, and from life presents us the eternal estate she reserves for us after it, to accustom us to it and to take from us the fear of it. But such as have by some violent accident fallen into a swoon, and in it have lost all sense, these, methinks, have been very near seeing the true and natural face of death; for as to the moment of the passage, it is not to be feared that it brings with it any pain or displeasure, forasmuch as we can have no feeling without leisure: our sufferings require time, which in death is so short and precipitous that it must necessarily be insensible. The approaches are what we have to fear, and these may fall within the limits of experience.

Many things seem greater by imagination than they are in effect. I have passed a good part of my age in a perfect and entire health; I say not only entire, but moreover sprightly and wanton. This state, so full of verdure, jollity, and vigour, made the consideration of sickness so horrible to me that, when I came to experience it, I found the attacks faint and easy, in comparison of what I had feared. Of this I have daily experience: if I am under the shelter of a warm room, in a stormy and tempestuous night, I wonder how people can live abroad, and am afflicted for those who are out in the field: if I am there myself, I do not wish to be anywhere else. This one thing of being always shut up in a chamber I fancied insupportable: but I was presently inured to be so imprisoned a week, nay, a month together, weak and ill; and have found that in the time of my health I did much more pity the sick than I think myself to be pitied when I am so, and that the force of my imagination enhances near one half of the essence and reality of the thing. I hope that when I come to die I shall find the same, and that I shall not find it worth the pains I take, so much preparation and so much assistance as I call in to undergo the stroke. But, at all events, we cannot give ourselves too much advantage.

The story of an accident that happened to Montaigne, which cast him into a long swoon.

In the time of our third or second troubles (I do not well remember which), going one day abroad to take the air, about a league from my own house, which is seated in the very centre of the scene of all the bustle and mischief of the civil wars of France, thinking myself in all security and so near to my retreat that I stood in need of no better equipage, I had taken a horse that went very easy in his pace, but was not very strong. Being upon my return home, a sudden occasion falling out to make use of this horse in a kind of service that he was not very well used to, one of my people, a lusty, proper fellow, mounted upon a strong German horse, that had a very ill mouth, but was otherwise vigorous and unfoiled, to play a bravado and get a-head of his fellows, comes thundering full speed in the very track where I was, rushing like a Colossus upon the little man and the little horse, with such a career of strength and weight that he turned us both over and over, topsy turvy, with our heels in the air: so that there lay the horse, overthrown and stunned by the fall, and I ten or twelve paces from him, stretched out at length, with my face all battered and bruised, my sword, which I had in my hand, above ten paces beyond me, and my belt broken all to pieces, without any more motion or sense than a stock. 'Twas the only swoon I was ever in till that hour in my life. Those who were with me, after having used all the means they could to bring me to myself, concluding me dead, took me up in their arms and carried me with very much difficulty home to my house, which was about half a French league thence. On the way, and after having for more than two long hours been given over for a dead man, I began to move and fetch my breath, for so great abundance of blood was fallen into my stomach that nature had need to rouse her forces to discharge it. They then raised me upon my feet, where I threw off a great quantity of pure blood, which I did also several other times on the way. This gave me so much ease that I began to recover a little life, but slowly, and by so small advances that my first sensations were much more like the approaches of death than life:

> Perchè, dubbiosa ancor del suo ritorno,
> Non s'assicura attonita la mente.[1]
>
> "Because the soul her mansion half had quit,
> And was not sure of her return to it."

The remembrance of this accident, which is very well imprinted in my memory, so naturally representing to me the image and idea of death, has in some sort reconciled me to it. When I first began to open my eyes after my trance, it was with so perplexed, so weak and dead a sight, that I could yet distinguish nothing, and could only discern the light:

[1] Tasso, La Gerusalemme, xii. 74.

Come quel ch'or apre, or chiude
Gli occhi, mezzo tra'l sonno è l' esser desto.[1]

"As people in the morning when they rise,
'Twixt sleep and wake, open and shut their eyes."

As to the functions of the soul, they advanced with the same pace and measure with those of the body. I saw myself all bloody, for my doublet was stained all over with the blood I had vomited. The first thought that came into my mind was that I had a cross-bow shot in my head; indeed at the same time there were several of these discharged round about us. Methought my life but just hung upon my lips, and I shut my eyes to help, methought, to thrust it out, and took a pleasure in languishing and letting myself go. It was an imagination that only superficially floated upon my soul, as tender and weak as all the rest; but really not only exempt from pain, but mixed with that sweetness and pleasure that people are sensible of when they are falling into a slumber.

Whether swoonings in the agonies of death are very painful.

I believe it is the very same condition those people are in whom we see swoon with weakness, in the agony of death, and I am of opinion that we pity them without cause, supposing them agitated with grievous dolours, or that their souls suffer under painful thoughts. It has ever been my belief, contrary to the opinion of many, and even of Stephen Boëtius, that those whom we see so subdued and stupified at the approach of their end, or depressed with the length of the disease, or by accident of an apoplexy or falling sickness,—

Vi morbi sæpe coactus
Ante oculos aliquis nostros, ut fulminis ictu,
Concidit, et spumas agit; ingemit, et remit artus;
Desipit, extentat nervos, torquetur, anhelat,
Inconstanter et in jactando membra fatigat;[2]

"As if by thunder struck, oft have we known
The dire disease's victims fall and groan,
Foam, tremble, writhe, breathe short, until at length
In various strugglings they exhaust their strength;"

or hurt in the head, whom we hear to mutter, and by fits to give grievous groans; though we gather thence some signs by which it seems as if they had some remains of sense and knowledge, I have always believed, I say, both the body and the soul benumbed and asleep;

Vivit, et est vitæ nescius ipse suæ;[3]

"He lives, but knows it not;"

and I cannot believe that in so great a stupefaction of the members, and so great a defection of the senses, the soul can maintain any force within to take cognisance of herself, or look into her own condition, and that therefore they had no reason or reflections to torment them, or make them consider and be sensible of the misery of their condition, and that consequently were not much to be pitied.

I can, for my part, think of no state so insupportable and dreadful as to have the soul vividly alive and afflicted, without means to declare itself; as I should say of such who are sent to execution, with their tongues first cut out (were it not that, in this kind of dying, the most silent seems to me the most graceful, if accompanied with a grave and firm countenance), or of those miserable prisoners who fall into the hands of the base, bloody soldiers of this age, by whom they are tormented with all sorts of inhuman usage to compel them to some excessive and impossible ransom, kept in the mean time in such condition and place, where they have no means of expressing or signifying their mind and misery to such as they may expect should relieve them. The poets have feigned some gods who favour the deliverance of such as suffer under a languishing death:

Hunc ego Diti
Sacrum jussa fero, teque isto corpore solvo.[4]

"I, by command, offer to Pluto this,
And from that body do thy soul dismiss."

And the unconnected words, and the short and irregular answers one gets from them sometimes, by bawling and keeping a clutter about them; or the motions which seem to yield some consent to what we would have them do, are no testimony nevertheless that they live an entire life at least. It is thus that in the yawning of sleep, before it has fully possessed us, we perceive, as in a dream, what is done about us, and follow the last things that are said, with a perplexed and uncertain hearing, which seems but to touch upon the borders of the soul, and make answers to the last words that were spoken to us, which have more in them of chance than sense.

Now, seeing I have, in effect, tried it, I make no doubt but I have hitherto made a right judgment of it. For first, being quite in a swoon, I laboured to tear open my doublet with my hands, for I was without a weapon, and yet I felt nothing in my imagination that hurt me; for we have many motions in us that do not proceed from our direction;

Semianimesque micant digiti, ferrumque retractant.[5]

"And half-dead fingers grope about and feel,
To grasp again the late abandoned steel."

So falling people extend their arms before them by a natural impulse which prompts them to offices and motions, without any commission from us.

Falciferos memorant currus abscindere membra . . .
Ut tremere in terra videatur ab artubus, id quod
Decidit abscisum; cum mens tamen atque hominis vis, Mobilitate mali, non quit sentire dolorem.[6]

"So chariots armed with keen scythes around,
When fiercely driven, deal the desp'rate wound;
And yet the wounded man, so quick 's the blow,
Is scarce disturb'd, scarce seems to feel or know
His wound."

My stomach was oppressed with the coagulated blood, and my hands moved to that part by their own voluntary motion, as they frequently do to the part that itches, without being directed by our will. There are several animals, and even men, in whom one may perceive the muscles to stir and tremble after they are dead. Every one by experience knows that there are some members which grow stiff, and flag, often without his leave. Now these passions which only touch the outward bark of us, as a man may say, cannot be said to be ours; to make them so there must be a concurrence of the whole man; and the pains which are felt by the hand or the foot, while we are sleeping, are none of ours.

As I drew near my own house, where the alarm of my fall was already got before me, and my family ran to me with the clamour usual in such cases, I did not only make some little answer to the questions that were asked me, but they moreover tell me that I had so much sense about me as to order them to give a horse to my wife, who, I saw, was toiling and labouring along the road, which was a steep and uneasy one. This consideration should seem to proceed from a soul that retained its function, but it was not so with me. I knew not what I said or did; they were nothing but idle thoughts in the clouds that were stirred up by the senses of the eyes and ears, and proceeded not from me. I knew not any the more whence I came, or whither I was going, neither was I capable to weigh and consider what was said to me. These were light effects that the senses produced of themselves, as of custom; what the soul contributed was in a dream, and lightly touched, as it were, merely licked and bedewed by the soft impression of the senses. Meantime my condition was, in truth, very easy and quiet; I had no affliction upon me, either for others or myself. It was an extreme drooping and weakness, without any manner of pain. I saw my own house, but knew it not. When they had put me to bed, I found an inexpressible sweetness in that repose; for I had been wretchedly tugged and jolted about by those poor people who had taken the pains to carry me upon their arms a very great, and a very ill way, and had, in doing so, all quite tired out themselves twice or thrice, one after another. They offered me all sorts of remedies, but I would take none, certainly believing that I was mortally wounded in the head. And in earnest, it had been a very happy death; for the weakness of my understanding deprived me of the faculty of discerning, and that of my body from the sense of feeling. I was suffering myself to glide away so sweetly, and after so soft and easy a manner, that I scarce find any other action less troublesome than that was. When I came again to myself, and to re-assume my faculties,

Ut tandem sensus convaluere mei,[1]

"As my lost senses did again return," which was two or three hours after, I felt myself on a sudden involved in a terrible pain, having my limbs battered and knocked to pieces with my fall, and was so exceedingly ill for two or three nights after that, I thought once more I was dying, but a more painful death, and to this hour am sensible of the bruises of that shock. I will not here omit that the last thing I could make them beat into my head was the memory of the accident; and I made it be over and over again repeated to me whither I was going, whence I was coming, and at what time of the day this mischance befel me, before I could comprehend it. As to the manner of my fall, that was concealed from me in favour to him who had been the occasion, and some other account was invented. But a long time after, and the very next day, when my memory began to return and represent to me the state wherein I was at the instant that I perceived this horse coming full drive upon me (for I had seen him at my heels, and gave myself for gone; but this thought had been so sudden that fear had no leisure to introduce itself), it seemed to me like a flash of lightning that had pierced through my soul, and that was coming from the other world.

This long story of so light a matter would appear vain enough, were it not for the knowledge I have gained by it for my own use; for I really find that, to get acquainted with death, you have but nearly to approach it. "Every one," as Pliny says,[2] "is a good doctor to himself, provided he be capable of looking closely into himself." This is not my doctrine, 'tis my study; it is not the lesson of another, but my own, and yet, if I communicate it, it ought not to be ill taken. That which is of use to me may also, perhaps, be useful to another. As to the rest, I spoil nothing, I make use of nothing but my own; and, if I play the fool, 'tis at my own expense, and nobody else is concerned in it: for 'tis a folly that will die with me, and that no one is to inherit. We hear of but two or three of the ancients who have beaten this road, and yet we cannot say if it be after this manner, knowing no more of them but their names. No one since has followed the track: 'tis a ticklish subject, and more nice than it seems, to follow a pace so extravagant and uncertain as that of the soul: to penetrate the dark profundities of her intricate internal windings, to choose and lay hold of so many little nimble motions; it is a new and extraordinary undertaking, which withdraws us from the common and most recommended employments of the world. 'Tis now many years since that my thoughts have had no other aim and object than myself, that I have only pried into and studied myself: and if I do now and then study any other thing, 'tis all of a sudden, in order to apply it to myself, or rather, in myself. And I do not think it a fault if, as others do by much less profitable sciences, I communicate what I have learnt in this matter; though I am not very well pleased with what progress I have made in it. There is no description so difficult, nor doubtless of so great utility, as that of one's-self. And withal a man must curl his hair, order his apparel, and adjust himself, to appear in public. Now, I am perpetually setting off myself, for I am eternally upon my own description. Custom has made all speaking of a man's self vicious, and positively forbids it, in hatred to the vanity that seems inseparably joined with the testimony men give of themselves. Because the child wants to blow his nose, they cut it off:

Man is a good lesson to himself.

[1] Ovid, Trist. i. 3. 14.

[2] Nat. Hist. xxii. 24.

Whether it is vanity for a man to speak sincerely of himself.

In vitium ducit culpæ fuga.[1]

"But oft our greatest errors take their rise
From our best views."

I find more evil than good in this remedy. But though it should be true that to entertain people with discourses of ourselves must of necessity be a piece of presumption, yet I ought not, according to my general plan, to forbear an action that publishes this infirmity, since it is in me; nor conceal a fault which I not only practise but profess. Nevertheless, to speak my mind freely of the matter, I think the custom of condemning wine, because some people will be drunk, is to be condemned. A man cannot abuse anything but what is good in itself; and I believe that this rule has only regard to the popular vice: it is a bridle for calves, by which neither saints, whom we hear speak so highly of themselves, nor the philosophers, nor the divines, will be curbed: neither will I, who am as little the one as the other. If these folks do not expressly name themselves, yet they take good care, whenever an occasion offers, to exhibit themselves so manifestly before you that there is no mistaking them. Of what does Socrates treat more largely than of himself? To what does he more direct and address the discourses of his disciples than to speak of themselves; not of the lesson in their book, but of the essence and motion of their souls? We confess ourselves religiously to God and our confessor, as our neighbours[2] do to all the people. But it may be said,—"there we speak nothing but accusation against ourselves." Why then we say all, for our very virtue itself is faulty and repentable. My trade and my art is to live. He that forbids me to speak according to my own sense, experience, and practice, may as well enjoin an architect not to speak of building according to his own knowledge, but according to that of his neighbour; according to the knowledge of another, and not according to his own. If it be vain-glory for a man to publish his own virtues, why does not Cicero prefer the eloquence of Hortensius, and Hortensius that of Cicero? Perhaps they mean that I should give testimony of myself by works and effects, not barely by words: I chiefly paint my thoughts, an inform subject, and incapable of operative production. 'Tis all that I can do to couch it in this airy body of the voice. The wisest and devoutest men have lived in the greatest care to avoid all discovery of works: effects would speak more of fortune than of me. They manifest their own office, and not mine; but uncertainly, and by conjecture. They are but patterns of some one particular virtue. I expose myself entire: 'tis an anatomy where, at one view, the veins, muscles, and tendons are apparent, each of them in its proper place. The effect of coughing produced one part, the effect of paleness or heart-beating another, but this doubtfully. I do not write my acts, but myself and my essence.

I am of opinion that a man must be very prudent in valuing himself, and equally conscientious to give a true report, be it better or worse, indifferently. If I thought myself perfectly good and wise, I would sound it forth to good purpose. To speak less of a man's-self than what one really is, is folly, not modesty; and to take that for current pay which is under a man's value is pusillanimity and cowardice, according to Aristotle:[3] no virtue assists itself with falsehood: truth is never the matter for error: to speak more of one's-self than is really true is not always presumption, 'tis moreover very often folly: to be immeasurably pleased with what one is, and to fall into an indiscreet self-love, is the substance of this vice. The best remedy for it is to do quite contrary to what these people direct, who, in forbidding us to speak of ourselves, do consequently at the same time interdict thinking of ourselves. Pride dwells in the thought; the tongue can have but very little share in it.

It is a commendable thing for a man to set a just value upon himself.

They fancy that to think of one's-self is to be delighted with one's-self; that to frequent and to converse with one's-self is to be over-indulgent. But this excess arises only in those who take but a superficial view of themselves, and dedicate their main inspection to their affairs; that call meditation raving and idleness, and furnishing and fitting ourselves up building castles in the air; looking upon themselves as a third person only, and a stranger. If any one is charmed with his own knowledge, whilst he looks only on those below him, let him but turn his eye upward toward past ages and his pride will be abated, when he shall there find so many thousand wits that trample him under foot. If he enter into a flattering vanity of his personal valour, let him but recollect the lives of Scipio, Epaminondas, so many armies and nations that leave him so far behind, and he will be cured of his self-opinion. No particular quality can make any man proud, that will at the same time put the so many weak and imperfect ones he has in him in the other scale, and the nothingness of human condition to balance the weight. Because Socrates had alone digested to purpose the precept of his God, "To know himself;" and by that study was arrived to the perfection of setting himself at nought, he only was reputed worthy the title of a sage. Whoever shall so know himself, let him boldly speak out and make himself known.

[1] Horace, Art. Poet. 31. [2] The Protestants. [3] Ethics, iv. 7.

Why Socrates was reckoned the only wise man.

CHAPTER VII.

OF RECOMPENSES OF HONOUR.

THOSE who wrote the life of Augustus Cæsar[1] observe this in his military discipline—that he was wonderfully liberal of gifts to men of merit; but that as to the pure recompenses of honour he was altogether as sparing: he himself had been gratified by his uncle with all the military recompenses before he had ever been in the field. It was a pretty invention, and received into most governments of the world, to institute certain vain and in themselves valueless distinctions, to honour and recompense valour or virtue: such as crowns of laurel, oak, and myrtle; the particular fashion of some garment; the privilege to ride in a coach in the city, or to have a torch by night; some peculiar place assigned in public assemblies; the prerogative of certain additional names and titles; certain distinctions in their bearing of coats of arms, and the like: the use of which, according to the several humours of nations, has been variously received, and does yet continue.

Honorary rewards ought to be dispensed with very great discretion.

We in France, as also several of our neighbours, have the orders of knighthood, that were instituted only for this end. And it is, indeed, a very good and profitable custom to find out an acknowledgment for the worth of excellent and extraordinary men; and to satisfy their ambition with rewards that are not at all costly either to prince or people. And what has been always found both by ancient experience, and which we ourselves may also have observed in our own times, that men of quality have ever been more jealous of such recompenses than of those wherein there was gain and profit, is not without very good ground and reason. If with reward, which ought to be simply a recompense of honour, they should mix other emoluments, and add riches, this mixture, instead of procuring an increase of esteem, would vilify and debase it. The order of St. Michael,[2] which has been so long in repute amongst us, had no greater commodity than that it had no communication with any other; which produced this effect, that formerly there was no office or title whatever to which the gentry pretended with so great a desire and affection as they did to this order; nor quality that carried with it more respect and grandeur: virtue more willingly embracing, and with greater ambition aspiring to a recompense truly her own, and rather honourable than beneficial. For, in truth, the other rewards have not so great a dignity in them, by reason they are laid out upon all sorts of occasions. With money a man pays the wages of a servant, the diligence of a courier, dancing, vaulting, speaking, and the vilest offices we receive; nay, we reward vice with it, too, as flattery, treachery, and pimping: and therefore 'tis no wonder if virtue less desires, and less willingly receives, this common sort of payment, than that which is proper and peculiar to her, as being truly generous and noble. Augustus was right in being a better husband and more sparing of this than the other, by how much honour is a privilege that extracts its principal essence from its rarity, and virtue the same.

Orders of knighthood instituted to reward military virtue.

The Order of St. Michael.

Cui malus est nemo, quis bonus esse potest?[3]

"To whom none seemeth bad, who good can seem?"

We do not intend it for a commendation when we say that such a one is careful in the bringing up of his children, by reason it is a common act, how just and well done soever, no more than we commend a great tree where the whole forest is the same. I do not think that any citizen of Sparta valued himself upon his valour, it being the universal virtue of the whole nation, and as little prided himself upon his fidelity and contempt of riches. There is no recompense to virtue, how great soever, that is once become a general custom; and I know not withal whether we can ever call it great, being common.

Valour of the citizens of Sparta.

Seeing then that these rewards of honour have no other value and estimation but only this, that few people enjoy them, 'tis but to be liberal of them to bring them down to nothing. And though there should be more men found than in former times worthy of our order,[4] the value of it, nevertheless, ought not to be abated, nor the honour made cheap: and it may easily happen that more may merit it now than formerly; for there is no virtue that so easily diffuses itself as that of military valour. There is another true, perfect, and philosophical, of which I do not speak (and only make use of the word in the common acceptation), much greater than this, and more full, which is a strength and assurance of soul, despising equally all sorts of adverse accidents, equable, uniform, and constant, of which ours is but a little ray. Use, bringing up, example and custom, can do all in all in the establishment of that which I am speaking of, and with great facility render it common, as by the experience of our civil war is manifest enough; and whoever could at this instant unite us all, Catholics and Hugonots, into one body, and set us upon some common enterprise, we should make our ancient military reputation flourish again. It is most certain that in times past the recompense of this order had not only a regard to valour, but had a farther prospect. It never was the reward of a valiant soldier, but of a great captain: the science of obeying was not reputed worthy of so honourable a guerdon. There was therein a more universal military expertness required, which comprehended the most and the greatest qualities of a military man: Neque enim eædem militares et imperatoriæ artes sunt "For the qualities of a soldier and of a general are not the same;" and, besides, a man was to be of a birth and rank suitable to such a dignity. But I say, though more men should be worthy now than formerly, yet ought it not to be more liberally distributed; and it were better to fall short and not give it to all to whom it may be due, than for ever to lose, as we have lately done, the fruit of so useful an invention. No man of spirit will vouchsafe to advantage himself with what is in common with many; and such of the present time as have least merited this recompense make the greater show of disclaiming it, intending thereby to be ranked with those to whom so much wrong has been done, by the unworthy conferring and debasing the distinction which was their particular right.

It is difficult to bring a new order of knighthood into credit.

Now to expect, in obliterating and abolishing this, suddenly to create and bring into credit a like institution, is not a proper attempt for so licentious and sick a time as this in which we now are; and it will fall out that the last[1] will, from its birth, incur the same inconveniences that have ruined the other. The rules for the dispensing of this new order had need to be extremely clipped, and bound under great restrictions, to give it authority; and this tumultuous season is incapable of such a curb. Besides that before this can be brought into reputation 'tis necessary that the memory of the first, and the contempt into which it is fallen, should be totally buried in oblivion.

This place might naturally enough admit of some discourse upon the consideration of valour, and the difference of this virtue from others: but Plutarch having so often handled this subject, I should give myself an unnecessary trouble to repeat what he has said. But this, nevertheless, is worth considering, that our nation places valour (vaillance) in the highest degree of virtue, as the very word itself shows, being derived from value (valeur); and that, according to our custom, when we mean a worthy man, or a man of value (homme vaillant), it is only in our court style to say a valiant man, after the Roman way; for the general appellation of virtue with them takes etymology from force.[2] The proper, sole, and essential occupation of the French nobility and gentry is the practice of arms. It is likely that the first virtue which discovered itself amongst men, and that has given some advantage over others, was this, by which the strongest and most valiant have mastered the weaker, and acbuired a particular rank and reputation, whence this honour and name remained to them. Or else that these nations, being very warlike, have given the pre-eminence to that of the virtues which was most familiar to them, and which they thought of the most worthy character. Just as our passion, and the feverish solicitude we have of the chastity of women makes the saying a good woman, a woman of worth, a woman of honour and virtue, to signify no more than a chaste woman; as if to oblige her to that one duty, we were indifferent to all the rest; and gave them the reins to all other faults whatever, to compound for that one of incontinence.

Valour the chief virtue among the French.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE AFFECTION OF FATHERS TO THEIR CHILDREN.

TO MADAME D'ESTISSAC.[3]

MADAM, if the strangeness and novelty of my subject, which generally give value to things, do not save me, I shall never come off with honour from this foolish attempt: but 'tis so fantastic, and carries a face so unlike the common custom, that the oddness of it may perhaps make it pass. 'Tis a melancholic humour, and consequently a humour very much opposed to my natural complexion, engendered by the pensiveness of the solitude into which for some years past I have retired myself, that first put into my head this idle fancy of writing: wherein, finding myself totally unprovided and empty of other matters, I presented myself to myself for argument and subject. 'Tis the only book in the world of its kind, and of a wild and extravagant design. Indeed, there is nothing worth remark but the extravagancy in this affair: for in a subject so vain and frivolous the best workman in the world could not have given it a form fit to recommend it to any manner of esteem. Now, madam, being to draw my own picture to the life, I should have omitted an important feature, had I not represented in it the honour I have ever paid to your merits; and I have chosen to say this expressly at the head of this chapter, by reason that, among your other excellent qualities, the love you have shown to your children holds one of the chief places. Whoever shall know at what age Monsieur d' Estissac, your husband, left you a widow, the great and honourable matches have since been offered to you, as many and as great as to any lady of your condition in France; the firmness and steadiness wherewith you have sustained for so many years, through so many sharp difficulties, the charge and conduct of their affairs, which have kept you in agitation in every corner of the kingdom, and which yet hold you, as it were, besieged, and the happy direction you have given all these, either by your prudence or good fortune, will easily conclude with me that we have not a more striking example than yours of maternal affection in our times.

I praise God, madam, that it has been so well employed; for the great hopes that Monsieur d' Estissac, your son, gives of himself, are sufficient assurances that, when he comes to age, you will reap from him all the obedience and gratitude of a very good man. But forasmuch as by reason of his tender years he has not been capable of taking notice of those numberless offices of kindness which he has received from you, I will take care, if these papers ever fall into his hands, when I shall neither have mouth nor speech left to deliver it to him, that he shall receive from me this testimony, in all truth, which shall be more effectually manifested to him by their own effects, and by which he will see and feel that there is not a gentleman in France who stands more indebted to a mother's care than he does; and that he cannot for the future give a better nor more certain proof of his own worth and virtue, than by acknowledging you for that excellent mother you are.

The affection of parents toward their children greater than that of children towards them, and why.

If there be any law truly natural, that is to say, any instinct that is seen universally, and perpetually imprinted in both beasts and men (which is not without controversy), I can say that, in my opinion, next to the care every animal has of his own preservation, and to avoid that which may hurt him, the affection that the begetter bears to his offspring holds the second place in rank. And seeing that nature seems to have recommended it to us, having regard to the extension and progression of the successive pieces of this machine of hers; 'tis no wonder that, on the contrary, that of children towards their parents is not so great. To which we may add this other Aristotelian consideration, that he who confers a benefit on any one loves him better than he is beloved by him again; and that he to whom it is due loves better than him from whom it is due:[1] and that every artificer is fonder of his work than, if that work had sense, it would be of the artificer; by reason that it is dear to us to be, and to be consists in moving and action; whereby every one has, in some sort, a being in his work. Whoever confers a benefit, exercises a fine and honest action; he who receives it, exercises the utile only. Now the utile is much less amiable than the honestum: the honestum is stable and permanent, supplying him who has done it with a continual gratification. The utile loses itself, easily slides away, and the memory of it is neither so fresh nor so pleasing. Those things are dearest to us that have cost us most; and giving is more chargeable than receiving.

To what end men are created capable of reasoning.

Since it has pleased God to endue us with some capacity of weighing and considering things, to the end we may not, like brutes, be servilely subjected and enslaved by the laws common to both, but that we should by judgment, and a voluntary liberty, apply ourselves to them; we ought, indeed, sometimes to yield to the simple authority of nature, but not suffer ourselves to be tyrannically hurried away, and transported by her; reason alone should have the conduct of our inclinations. I, for my part, have a strange distaste to those inclinations that are started in us, without the mediation and direction of the judgment; as, upon the subject I am speaking of, I cannot entertain that passion of dandling and caressing an infant scarcely born, having, as yet, neither motion of soul, nor shape of body distinguishable, by which they can render themselves loveable; and have not willingly suffered them to be nursed near me. A true and well-regulated affection ought to spring up, and increase with the knowledge they give us of themselves, and then, if they are worthy of it, natural propension going hand-in-hand with reason, to cherish them with a truly paternal love; and to judge and discern also if they be otherwise, still submitting ourselves to reason, notwithstanding the force of nature. It is often quite the reverse; and most commonly we find ourselves more taken with the first trotting about, and little ways and plays of our children, than we are afterwards with their formed actions; as if we had loved them for our sport, like monkeys, and not as men. And some there are who are very liberal in buying them playthings when they are children, who are very close-handed for the least necessary expense when they grow up. Nay, to such degree that it looks as if the jealousy of seeing them appear in, and enjoy the world, when we are about to leave it, renders us more niggardly and stingy towards them: it vexes us that they tread upon our heels, as if to solicit us to go out; but if this be to be feared, since the order of things will have it so, that they cannot, to speak the truth, be or live but at the expense of our being and life, we should never meddle with getting children.

For my part, I think it cruelty and injustice not to receive them into the share and society of our goods, and not to make them partakers in the intelligence of our domestic affairs when they are capable, and not to lessen and contract our own expenses, to make the more room for theirs, seeing we begat them to that effect. 'Tis unjust that an old fellow, deaf, lame, and half-dead, should alone, in a corner of the chimney, enjoy the goods that were sufficient for the maintenance and advancement of many children, and suffer them in the mean time to lose their best years for want of means to put themselves forward in the public service, and the knowledge of men. A man by this means drives them to desperate courses, and to seek out by any means, how unjust or dishonourable soever, to provide for their own support: as I have, in my time, seen several young men of good birth so addicted to stealing that no correction could cure them of it. I know one of a very good family, to whom, at the request of a brother of his, a very honest and brave gentleman, I once spoke on this account; who made answer, and confessed to me roundly that he had been put upon this dirty practice by the severity and avarice of his father; but that he was now so accustomed to it he could not leave it off. At this very time he had been entrapped stealing a lady's rings, being come into her chamber as she was dressing, with several others. He put me in mind of a story I had heard of another gentleman so perfect and accomplished in this genteel trade in his youth that, after he came to his estate, and resolved to give it over, could not hold his hands, nevertheless, if he passed by a shop where he saw anything he liked, from catching it up, though it put him to the shame of sending afterwards to pay for it. And I have myself seen several so habituated to this laudable quality that even amongst their comrades they could not forbear filching, though with intent to restore what they had taken. I am a Gascon, and yet there is no vice I so little understand as that; I hate it even something more by disposition than I condemn it by my reason: I do not so much as desire any thing of another man's. This province of ours is, in truth, a little more suspected than the other parts of the kingdom; and yet we have often seen, in our times, men of good families of other provinces, in the hands of justice, convicted of several abominable thefts. I fear this offence is, in some sort, to be attributed to the forementioned vice of the fathers.

Young men given to filching.

Gascons generally addicted to stealing.

And if a man should tell me, as a lord of very good understanding once did, "That he hoarded up wealth, not to extract any other fruit and use from his parsimony, but to make himself honoured and sought after by his own relations; and that, age having deprived him of all other powers, it was the only remaining remedy to maintain his authority in his family, and to keep him from being neglected and despised by all the world," (and, in truth, not only old age, but all other imbecility, according to Aristotle,[1] is the promoter of avarice) this is something, but it is physic for a disease that a man should prevent altogether. A father is very miserable that has no other hold of his children's affections than the need they have of his assistance, if that can be called affection; he must render himself worthy to be respected by his virtue and wisdom, and beloved by his bounty and the sweetness of his manners. Even the very ashes of a rich matter have their value, and we generally, by custom, have the bones and relics of worthy men in regard and reverence. No old age can be so ruinous and offensive in a man who has passed his life in honour, but it must be very valuable, especially to his children; the soul of which must have trained up to their duty by reason, not by necessity and the need they have of him, nor by roughness and force:

The means by which a father should procure the respect of his children.

>
> "And he extremely differs from my sense,
> Who thinks the pow'r obtain'd by violence
> Can ever prove more solid and secure
> Than that which friendship's softer means procure."

I condemn all violence in the education of a gentle soul that is designed for honour and liberty. There is, I know not what of servile in rigour and restraint; and I am of opinion that what is not to be done by reason, prudence and address, is never to be effected by force. I myself was brought up after that manner, and they tell me that in all my first age, I never felt the rod but twice, and then very slightly. I have practised the same method with my children, who all of them died at nurse, except Leonora,[3] my only daughter, who escaped that misfortune, and has arrived to the age of six years and upward, without other correction for her childish faults (her mother's indulgence easily concurring) than words only,

Violence in the education of children condemned.

and those very gentle; and, though my expectation should be frustrated, there are other causes enough to lay the fault on, without blaming my discipline, which I know to be natural and just. I should in this have been even more scrupulous towards males, as born to less subjection, and more free; I should have loved to swell their hearts with ingenuousness and freedom. I have never observed other effects of whipping unless to render children more cowardly or more wilful and obstinate.

The true way for parents to gain the love of their children.

Do we desire to be beloved of our children? would we remove from them all occasion of wishing our death (though no occasion of so horrid a wish can either be just or excusable, Nullum scelus rationem habet: "No crime can have a reason")? Let us reasonably accommodate their lives with what is in our power. In order to this, we should not marry so young that our age shall in a manner be confounded with theirs; for this inconvenience plunges us into many very great difficulties; I speak more especially of the gentry who are of a condition wherein they have little to do, and live, as the phrase is, upon their income; for in other conditions, where life is dedicated to making money, the plurality and numbers of children is an increase to good husbandry, and they are so many new tools and instruments wherewith to grow rich.

The most proper age for marriage.

I married at three and thirty years of age, and [illegible] in the opinion for [illegible]ive, which is said to be [illegible] of Aristotle.[1] Plato will have nobody marry before thirty, but he has reason to laugh at those who undertake the work of marriage after five and fifty, and to condemn their offspring as unworthy of aliment and life. Thales gave it the truest limits, who when young, and being importuned by his mother to marry, answered, "That it was too soon;" and being grown in years, and urged again, "That it was too late."[2] A man must deny opportunity to every importunate action. The ancient Gauls[3] looked upon it as a very great reproach for a man to have to do with a woman before he was twenty years of age; and strictly recommended to the men who designed themselves for war the keeping their virginity till well grown in years, forasmuch as courage is abated and diverted by the use of women:

The use of women enervates young men.

Ma hor congiunto à giovinetta sposa,
E lieto homai, de' figli, era invilito
Negli affetti di padre et di marito.[4]

"But now being married to a fair young wife,
Hels quite fall'n off from his old course of life:
His mettle is grown rusty, and his care
His wife and children do betwixt them share."

Muleasses,[5] King of Tunis, he whom the Emperor Charles the Fifth restored to the kingdom, reproached the memory of his father, Mahomet, with the frequentation of women, styling him loose, effeminate, and a getter of children. The Greek History observes of Iccus, the Tarentine, of Crisso, Astyllus, Diopompus, and others, that, to keep their bodies in order for the Olympic games, and such like exercises, they denied themselves during that preparation all commerce with Venus. In a certain country of the Spanish Indies, men were not permitted to marry till after they were forty years of age, and yet the girls were allowed to do so at ten. 'Tis not time for a gentleman of five-and-thirty years old to give place to his son who is twenty; he being himself in a condition to serve both in the camp and court of his prince, he has himself need of all his money; and yet, doubtless ought to allow his son a share, but not so great a one as wholly to disfurnish himself; and for such a one, the saying that fathers have ordinarily in their mouths, "I will not put off my clothes till I go to bed," is proper enough.

A father that is superannuated ought to give up his estate to his child.

But a father, worn out with age and infirmities, and deprived, by his weakness and want of health, of the common society of men, wrongs himself and his, to rake together a great mass of useless treasure. He has lived long enough, if he be wise, to have a mind to strip himself to go to bed; not to his very shirt, I confess, but to that and a good warm night-gown. The remaining pomps, of which he has no further use, he ought voluntarily to surrender to those to whom by the order of nature they belong. 'Tis reason he should transfer the use of those things to them, seeing that nature has reduced him to such a state that he cannot enjoy them himself; otherwise there is, doubtless, ill-nature and envy in the case. The greatest act of the Emperor Charles the Fifth was that, in imitation of some of the ancients of his own quality, confessing it but reason to strip ourselves when our clothes encumber and grow too heavy for us, and to lie down when our legs begin to fail us, he resigned his possessions, grandeur, and power to his son, when he found himself beginning to lose the vigour and steadiness necessary to conduct his affairs, with the glory he had therein acquired.

the body and the mind (which in my opinion is equal, if the soul, indeed, is not more than the half), has lost the reputation of most of the great men of the world. I have known in my time, and have been intimately acquainted with some persons of very great quality whom a man might easily discern so manifestly fallen from that former sufficiency I was sure they were once endued with, by the reputation they had acquired in their former years, that I could heartily, for their own sakes, have wished them at home at their ease, discharged from those public and military employments which were now grown too heavy for their shoulders. I was formerly very familiar in a gentleman's house, a widower, and very old, though healthy and cheerful enough. This gentleman had several daughters to marry, and a son, already of a ripe age, which brought upon him many visits, and a great expense, neither of which did very well please him, not only out of consideration of frugality, but yet more for having, by reason of his age, entered into a course of life far differing from ours. I told him, one day, a little boldly, as I have been used to do, that he would do better to give us room, and to leave his principal house (for he had but that well situated and furnished), to his son, and retire himself to an estate he had hard by, where nobody would trouble his repose, seeing he could not otherwise avoid being importuned by us, the condition of his children considered. He took my advice afterwards, and found an advantage by so doing.

I do not mean that a man should so instate them as not to reserve to himself a liberty to recant: I, who am now arrived to the age wherein such things are nigh fit to be done, would resign to them the enjoyment of my house and goods, but with a power of revocation, if they should give me cause to alter my mind. I would leave to them the use, that being no longer proper for me; but of the general authority and power over all, I would reserve as much as I thought good to myself; having always thought that it must needs be a great satisfaction to an aged father, to put his children himself in the way of governing his affairs, and to have power, during his life, to superintend their behaviour, supplying them with instruction and advice from his own experience, and himself to transfer the ancient honour and order of his house into the hands of those who are to succeed him, and by that means to be responsible to himself (by the hopes he may conceive) for their future conduct. And in order to this, I would not avoid their company; I would observe them near at hand, and partake, according to the condition of my age, of their feasts and amusements. If I did not live amongst them (which I could not do without being a disturbance to them, by reason of the touchiness of my age, and the restlessness of my infirmities, and without violating also the rules and order of living I should then have set down to myself), I would at least live near them in some part of my house, not the best in show, but the most commodious. Not as I saw, some years ago, a Dean of St. Hilaire, of Poictiers, by his melancholy given up to such a solitude that, at the time I came into his chamber, it had been two-and-twenty years that he had not stepped one foot out of it, and yet had all his motions free, and ate, and was in perfect health, saving a little rheum that fell upon his lungs. He would hardly once in a week suffer any one to come to see him; he always kept himself shut up in his chamber, alone, except a servant that brought him something to eat, and did then but just come in and go out again. His employment was to walk up and down, and read some book; for he was a bit of a scholar: but as to the rest, obstinately bent to die in his retirement, as he soon after did. I would endeavour, by a sweet and obliging conversation, to create in my children a lively and unfeigned friendship and good will, which, in well-descended natures, is not hard to do; for if they be brutes, of which this age of ours produces thousands, we must hate and avoid them as such.

I am angry at the custom of forbidding children to call their father by the name of father, and to enjoin them another, as more full of respect and reverence, as if nature had not sufficiently provided for our authority. We call God father, and disdain to have our children call us so. I have reformed this error in my family.[1] It is also folly and injustice to deprive children, when grown up, of a familiarity with their father, and to carry an austere countenance toward them, thinking by that to keep them in awe and obedience; for it is but a very idle farce that, instead of producing the effect designed, renders fathers distasteful and, which is worse, ridiculous, to their own children. They have youth and vigour in possession, and consequently the breath and favour of the world, and therefore receive these fierce and tyrannical looks (mere scare-crows) of a man without blood, either in his heart or veins, with mockery and contempt. Though I could make myself feared, I had yet much rather make myself beloved. There are so many sorts of defects in old age, so much impotency, and it is so liable to contempt, that the best purchase a man can make is the kindness and affection of his own family: command and fear are no longer his weapons. Such a one I have known, who, having been very imperious in his youth, when he came to be old, though he might have Children ought not to be forbid to call their father by the name of father.

Children that are grown up ought to be admitted to a familiarity with their fathers.

[1] The good King Henry IV. reformed it also in his family; for Perefixe says he would not have his children call him monsieur, an appellation which seems to make the father and the children strangers, and which is a mark of subjection and slavery; but that they should call him papa, or father, an appellation of love and tenderness.

lived at his full ease and had his judgment as entire as ever, would yet torment himself and others; strike, rant, swear, and curse; the most tempestuous master in France; fretting himself with unnecessary suspicion and vigilance. And all this rumble and clutter but makes his family cheat him the sooner and the more; of his barn, his kitchen, cellar, nay, and his very purse too, others have the greatest use and share, whilst he keeps his keys in his bosom much more carefully than his eyes. Whilst he hugs himself with the frugality of the pitiful pittance of a wretched niggardly table, everything goes to wrack and ruin in every corner of his house, in play, drink, all sorts of profusion, making sports in their junkettings with his vain anger and fruitless parsimony. Every one is a centinel against him; and if by accident any wretched fellow that serves him is of another humour, and will not join with the rest, he is presently rendered suspected to him, a bait which old age very easily bites at of itself. How often has this gentleman boasted to me in how great awe he kept his family, and how exact an obedience and reverence they paid him! How clearly he saw into his own affairs!

Ille solus nescit omnia.[1]

"He alone knows nothing of the matter."

I do not know any one that can muster more parts, both natural and acquired, proper to maintain such a dominion, than he; yet he is fallen from it like a child. For this reason it is that I have picked him out amongst several others that I know of the same humour, for the greatest example. It were matter for a question in the schools, "Whether he is better thus or otherwise?" In his presence all submit to and bow before him, and give so much way to his vanity that nobody ever resists him; he has his belly-full of cringe, and all postures of fear, submission, and respect. Does he turn away a servant? he packs up his bundle, and is gone,—but 'tis no further than just out of his sight: the pace of old age is so slow, and the senses so weak and troubled, that he will live and do his old office in the same house a year together without being perceived. And after a fit interval of time, letters are pretended to come from a great way off, very pitiful, suppliant, and full of promises of amendment, by virtue of which he is again received into favour. Does monsieur make any bargain, or send away any dispatch that does not please? 'Tis suppressed, and causes afterwards forged to excuse the want of execution in the one or answer in the other. No strange letters are first brought to him; he never sees any but those that seem fit for his knowledge. If by accident they fall first into his own hand, being used to trust somebody to read them to him, he reads extempore what he thinks fit, and very often makes such a one ask him pardon, who abuses and rails at him in his letter. In short, he sees nothing but by an image prepared and designed before-hand, and the most satisfactory they can invent not to rouse and awake his ill-humour and choler. I have, under different forms, seen enough of long and enduring management to just the same effect.

Women have a sort of natural tendency to cross their husbands:[2] they lay hold with both hands on all occasions to contradict and oppose them, and the first excuse serves for a plenary justification. I have seen a wife who grossly purloined from her husband, that, as she told her confessor, she might distribute more liberal alms. As if anybody would believe a word of this religious dispensation. No authority seems to them of sufficient dignity, if proceeding from the husband's assent; they must usurp it either by insolence or cunning, and always injuriously, or else it has not the grace of that authority they desire. When, as in the case I am speaking of, 'tis against a poor old man, and for the children, they make use of this title to serve their passion with glory; and, as in a common servitude, easily monopolise against his government and dominion. If they be men, strong, and flourishing in health and manhood, they presently corrupt, either by force or favour, both steward, receivers, and all the rest. Such as have neither wife nor son do not so easily fall into this misfortune; when they do, it is more cruelly and undeservedly. Cato the Elder, in his time, said, "So many servants so many enemies."[3] Consider, then, whether, according to the vast difference betwixt the purity of the age he lived in and the corruption of this of ours, he does not seem to advertise us that wife, son, and servant, are so many enemies to us? 'Tis well for old age that it is always accompanied with stupidity, ignorance, and a facility of being deceived; for, should we see how we are used, and would not acquiesce, what would become of us?—especially in such an age as this, where the very judges who are to determine are usually partial to the young in any cause that comes before them.[4] In case that the discovery of this cheat escape me, I cannot at least fail to discern that I am very fit to be cheated; and can a man ever enough speak the value of a friend, in comparison with these civil ties? The very image of it which I see so pure and uncorrupted in beasts, how religiously do I respect it! If others deceive me, yet I do not at least deceive myself in thinking I am able to defend myself from them, or in

[2] Mr. Cotton's gallantry, or his desire to save the credit of Montaigne with the ladies, induced him to diminish the effect of this shameful calumny upon our better halves, by this addition—"Women, especially the perverse and elder sort,"—a modification which I cannot refrain from preserving in the form of a note, though Montaigne himself, by an oversight, doubtless, neglected to make it.

wearing out my brains to make myself so? I protect myself from such treasons in my own bosom, not by an unquiet and tumultuary curiosity, but rather by diversion and resolution. When I hear talk of any one's condition I never trouble me to think of him, I presently turn my eyes upon myself, to see in what condition I am. Whatever concerns another relates to me; the accident that has befallen him gives me caution and rouses me to turn my defence that way. We every day and every hour say things of another that we might more properly say of ourselves, could we but revert our observation to our own concerns as well as extend it to others. And several authors have in this manner prejudiced their own cause by running headlong upon those they attack, and darting those shafts against their enemies that are more properly, and with greater advantage, to be returned upon them.

The late Marshal de Montluc, having lost his son, who died in the Island of Madeira, in truth a very brave gentleman, and of great expectation, did to me, amongst his other regrets, very much insist upon what a sorrow and heart-breaking it was to him that he had never made himself familiarly acquainted with him; and, by that humour of fatherly gravity and grimace, had lost the opportunity of having an insight into, and of well knowing, his son; as also of letting him know the extreme affection he had for him, and the worthy opinion he had of his virtue. "The poor boy," said he, "never saw in me other than a stern and disdainful countenance; and is gone in a belief that I neither knew how to love or esteem him according to his desert. For whom did I reserve the discovery of that singular affection I had for him in my soul? Was it not he himself who ought to have had all the pleasure of it, and all the obligation? I forced and wracked myself to put on and maintain this vain disguise, and have by that means deprived myself of the pleasure of his conversation, and, I doubt, in some measure of his affection; which could not but be very cold towards me, having never other from me than austerity; nor felt other than a tyrannical manner of proceeding."[1] I find this complaint to be rational and rightly apprehended; for as I myself know, by too certain experience, there is not so sweet a consolation in the loss of friends as the consciousness of having had no reserve with them, to have had with them a perfect and entire communication. Oh, my friend![2] am I the better for being sensible of this; or am I the worse? I am doubtless much the better. I am comforted and honoured in the sorrow for his death. Is it not a pious, a pleasing office of my life to be always upon my friend's obsequies? Can there be any joy equal to this privation?

I open myself to my family as much as I can, and very willingly let them know in what state they are in my opinion and good will, as I do to every body else. I make haste to bring out and produce myself to them; for I will not have them mistaken in me in any thing. Amongst other particular customs of our ancient Gauls, this, as Cæsar reports, was one,—that the sons never presented themselves before their fathers, nor durst ever appear in their company in public, till they began to bear arms;[3] as if they would intimate, by that, that then was also time for the fathers to receive them into their familiarity and acquaintance.

I have observed yet another sort of indiscretion in fathers of my time, that, not contented with having deprived their children, during their own long lives, of the share they naturally ought to have had in their fortunes, they after leave to their wives the same authority over their estates, and liberty to dispose of them according to their own fancy: and I have known a certain lord, one of the principal officers of the crown, who having in his prospect, by right of succession, above fifty thousand crowns yearly revenue, died necessitous and overwhelmed with debt, at above fifty years of age; his mother, in an extreme decrepitude, being yet in possession of all his estates by the will of his father, who had, for his part, lived till near eighty years old. This appears by no means reasonable to me. And therefore I think it of very little advantage to a man, whose affairs are well enough, to seek a wife that will charge his estate with too great a jointure: there being no sort of foreign debt or incumbrance that brings greater and more frequent ruin to estates and families than that. My predecessors have ever been aware of that danger, and provided against it, and so have I. But those who dissuade us from rich wives, for fear they should be less tractable and kind, are out in their advice to make a man lose a real convenience for so frivolous a conjecture. It costs an unreasonable woman no more to pass over one reason than another. The more she is in the wrong the better. Injustice allures such, as the honour of their virtuous actions does the good; the more riches women bring with them, the more likely they are to be so much the more gentle and sweet-natured; as women, the fairer they are, are the more inclined to be proudly chaste.

'Tis reasonable to leave the administration of affairs to the mothers during the minority of the children; but the father has brought them up very ill if he cannot hope that, when they come to maturity, they will have more wisdom and dexterity in the management of their affairs than his wife, considering the ordinary weakness of the sex. It were, notwithstanding, to say the truth, more against nature to make the mothers depend upon the discretion of their children. They ought to be plentifully provided for, to maintain themselves according to their quality and age, by reason that necessity is much more unbecoming and insupportable to them than to men; and therefore the son is rather to be cut short than the mother.

The most prudent distribution of estates.

In general, the most judicious distribution of our goods, when we come to die, is, in my opinion, to let them be distributed according to the custom of the country. The laws have considered it better than we, and 'tis better to let them fail in their election than rashly to run the hazard of miscarrying in ours. Neither are they properly ours, since, by a civil prescription, and without us, they are all judged to certain successors. And although we have some liberty beyond that, yet I think that we ought not, without great and manifest cause, to take away that from one which his fortune has allotted him, and to which the public equity gives him title; and that it is against reason to abuse this liberty, in making it serve our own frivolous and private fancies. My destiny has been kind to me, in not furnishing me with occasions to tempt and divert my affection from the common and legitimate institution. I see some with whom 'tis time lost to employ a long diligence of good offices: a word ill taken obliterates ten years' merit; he is the happy man who is in a condition to oil their good will at the last passage. The last action carries it: not the best and most frequent offices, but the most recent and present, do the work. These are people that play with their wills, as with apples and rods, to gratify or chastise every action of those that pretend to an interest in them. 'Tis a thing of too great weight and consequence to be so tumbled and tossed and altered every moment: and wherein wise men determine once for all, having therein, above all things, a regard to reason, and to what is publicly observed. We lay male inheritance too much to heart, proposing a ridiculous eternity to our names. We are, moreover, too superstitious in the vain conjectures of futurity, which we derive from those little observations we make of the words and actions of children. Perhaps they might have done me an injustice in dispossessing me of my rank, for having been the most dull and heavy, the most slow and unwilling at my book, not of all my brothers only, but of all the boys in the whole province; whether at my lesson or at any bodily exercise. 'Tis a folly to make an extraordinary election upon the credit of these divinations, wherein we are so often deceived. If the rule of primogeniture were to be violated, and the destinies corrected in the choice they have made of our heirs, one might more plausibly do it upon the account of some enormous personal deformity; a constant and incorrigible vice, and, in the opinion of us French, who are great admirers of beauty, of important prejudice.

Plato's opinion that the disposition of estates should be regulated by the laws.

The pleasant dialogue betwixt legislator and his citizens will be an ornament to this place. "What," said they, feeling themselves about to die, "may we not dispose of our own to whom we please? Gods, what cruelty, that it shall not be lawful for us, according as we have been served and attended in our sickness, in old age, and other affairs, to give more or less to those whom we have found most diligent about us, at our own fancy and discretion!" To which the legislator answers thus: "My friends, who are now, without question, very soon to die, it is hard for you either to know yourselves, or what is yours, according to the Delphic inscription. I, who make the laws, am of opinion that you neither are yourselves your own, neither is that yours of which you are possessed. Both your goods and you belong to your families, as well those past as those to come; but yet, both your family and goods do much more appertain to the public. Wherefore, lest any flatterers in your age, or in your sickness, or any passion of your own, should unseasonably prevail with you to make an unjust will, I shall take care to prevent that impropriety. But, having respect both to the universal interest of the city, and that of your particular family, I shall establish laws, and make it appear that a particular convenience ought to give place to the common benefit. Go then cheerfully where human necessity calls you. It belongs to me, who have no more respect to one thing than another, and who, as much as in me lies, am careful of the public concern, to take care of what you leave behind you."[1]

'Tis dangerous to leave it in the power of the widows to share the succession of the fathers among their children.

To return to my subject: it appears to me that such women are very rarely born to whom the prerogative over men, the maternal and natural excepted, is in any sort due, unless it be for the punishment of such as in some lustful humour have voluntarily submitted themselves to them: but that does nothing concern the old ones, of whom we are now speaking. This consideration it is which has made us so willing to forge and give force to that law, which was never yet seen by any one, by which women are excluded the succession to this crown; and there is hardly a government in the world where it is not pleaded as 'tis here, by mere reason of the thing that gives it authority, though fortune has given it more credit in some places than in others. 'Tis dangerous to leave the disposal of our succession to their judgment, according to the choice they shall make of children, which is often fantastic and unjust; for the irregular appetite and depraved taste they have during the time of their being with child, they have at all other times in the mind.

[1] Plato, Laws, xi.

We commonly see them fond of the most weak, ricketty, and deformed children, or of those, if they have such, as are at the breast. For, not having sufficient force of reason to choose and embrace that which is most worthy, they the more willingly suffer themselves to be carried away, where the impressions of nature are most alone; like animals that know their young no longer than they give them suck. As to the rest, it is easy by experience to be discerned that this natural affection, to which we give so great authority, has but a very weak and shallow root. For a very little profit we every day ravish their own children out of their mothers' arms, and make them take ours in their room. We make them abandon their own to some pitiful nurse, to which we disdain to commit ours, or to some she-goat: forbidding them not only to give them suck, what danger soever they run thereby, but moreover to take any manner of care of them, that they may wholly be taken up with the care of, and attendance upon, ours. And we see in most of them an adulterate affection, begot by custom toward the foster-children, more vehement than the natural, and greater solicitude for the preservation of those they have taken charge of than their own. And that which I was saying of goats was upon this account; that it is ordinary, all about where I live, to see the country-women, when they want suck of their own, to call goats to their assistance. And I have at this hour two footmen that never sucked women's milk more than eight days after they were born. These goats are immediately taught to come to suckle the little children, well knowing their voices when they cry, and come running to them; when, if any other than that they are acquainted with be presented to them, they refuse to let it suck; and the child will do the same to any other goat. I saw one the other day from whom they had taken away the goat that used to nourish it, by reason the father had only borrowed it of a neighbour, that would not touch any other they could bring, and died doubtless of hunger. Beasts do as easily alter and corrupt their natural affections, as we. I believe that in what Herodotus[1] relates of a certain district of Lybia there are many mistakes. He says,—"That the women are there in common; but that the child, so soon as it can go, finds him out in the crowd for his father, to whom he is first led by his natural inclination."

What stress may be laid on the natural affection of mothers to their children.

Goats trained to give suck to children.

Now, in considering this simple reason for loving our children and calling them our second-selves, only because we beget them, it appears, methinks, that there is another kind of production proceeding from us that should no less recommend itself to our love: for that which we engender by the soul, the issue of our understanding, courage, and abilities, springs from nobler parts than those of the body, and that are much more our own; we are both father and mother together in this generation. These cost us a great deal more, and bring us more honour, if they have any thing of good in them. For the value of other children is much more theirs than ours; the share we have in them is very little; but of these, all the beauty, all the grace and value, is ours. Thus 'tis that they more livelily represent and resemble us than the rest. Plato[2] adds that those are immortal children that immortalise their fathers, as Lycurgus, Solon, Minos. Now, histories being full of examples of the common affection of fathers to their children, it seems not altogether improper to introduce some few also of this other kind. Heliodorus, that good Bishop of Tricca, rather chose to lose the dignity, profit, and devotion, of so venerable a prelacy, than to lose his daughter;[3] a daughter that continues to this day very graceful and comely, though, peradventure, a little too curiously and wantonly set off, and too amorous, for an ecclesiastic and sacerdotal daughter. There was one Labienus at Rome, a man of great worth and authority, and, amongst other good qualities, excellent in all sorts of literature, who was, as I take it, the son of that great Labienus, the chief of Cæsar's captains in the wars of Gaul, and who, afterwards siding with Pompey the Great, so valiantly maintained his cause, till he was by Cæsar defeated in Spain. This Labienus of whom I am now speaking had several enemies, jealous of his virtue, and, 'tis likely, courtiers and minions of the emperor of his time, who were very angry at, and displeased with, his freedom and the paternal humour which he yet retained against tyranny, with which, it is to be supposed, he had tinctured his books and writings. His adversaries, before the magistracy of Rome, prosecuted several pieces he had published, and prevailed so far against him as to have them condemned to the flames.[4] It was in him that this new example of punishment was begun, which was afterwards continued against several others at Rome, to punish even writing and studies with death. There would not be means and matter enough of cruelty did we not mix with them things that nature has exempted from all sense and suffering, as reputation and the products of mind, and if we did not communicate corporeal punishments to the learning and monuments of the muses. Now Labienus could not suffer this loss, nor survive these his so dear issue, and therefore caused himself to be conveyed and shut up alive in the monument of his ancestors, where he made shift to kill and bury himself at once. 'Tis hard to show a more violent paternal affection than this. Cassius Severus, a man of great eloquence, and his very intimate friend, seeing his books burn, cried out, "That by the same sentence they should also condemn him to the fire too, seeing that he carried in his memory all that they contained." The like misfortune befel Cremutius Cordus, who being accused for having in his books commended Brutus and Cassius, the dirty, servile, and degenerate senate, worthy a worse master than Tiberius, condemned his writings to the flames. He was willing to bear them company, and killed himself with fasting.[1] The good Lucan, being condemned by that rascal Nero, at the last gasp of his life, when the greater part of his blood was already gone by the veins of his arms, which he had caused his physician to open to make him die, and that the cold had seized on all his extremities, and began to approach his vital parts; the last thing he had in his memory was some of the verses of his battle of Pharsalia, which he repeated, and died with them in his mouth.[2] What was this but taking a tender and paternal leave of his children, in imitation of the farewell blessings and embraces wherewith we part with ours when we come to die; and an effect of that natural inclination that suggests to our remembrance, in this extremity, those things which were dearest to us during life?

Cordus's writings condemned to the fire.

Can we believe that Epicurus,[3] who, as he says himself, dying of intolerable pains of the cholic, had all his consolation in the beauty of the doctrine he left behind him, could have received the same satisfaction from many children, though never so well brought up, had he had them, as he did from the issue of so many rich and admirable writings? Or that, had it been in his choice to have left behind him a deformed and untoward child, or a foolish and ridiculous book, he, or any other man of his understanding, would not rather have chosen to have run the first misfortune than the other? It had been, perhaps, an impiety in St. Austin, for example, if, on the one hand, it had been proposed to him to bury his writings, from which our religion has received so great advantage; or, on the other, to bury his children, had he had any, had he not rather chosen to bury his children? And I know not whether I had not much rather have begot a very beautiful one, through my society with the muses, than by lying with my wife. To this, such as it is, what I give it I give it absolutely and irrevocably, as men do to their bodily children. That little I have done for it is no more at my own disposal. It may know many things that I have forgotten, and retain from me that which I have not retained myself; and that, as a stranger, I must borrow thence, should I stand in need. If I am wiser than my book, it is richer than I.

Of the affection which Montaigne had for his book.

There are few men addicted to poetry who would not be much prouder to be father to the Æneid than to the handsomest and best made youth of Rome, and that would not much better bear the loss of the one than the other. For, according to Aristotle,[4] the poet, of all sorts of artificers, is fondest of his work. 'Tis hard to believe that Epaminondas, who boasted that for all his posterity, he left two daughters behind him which would one day do their father honour, (meaning the two noble victories he obtained over the Lacedæmonians)[5] would willingly have consented to exchange these for the most beautiful creatures of all Greece: or that Alexander, or Cæsar, ever wished to be deprived of the grandeur of their glorious exploits in war, for the conveniency of having children and heirs, how perfect and accomplished soever. Nay, I make great question whether Phidias, or any other excellent statuary, would be so solicitous of the preservation and continuance of his natural children as he would be of a rare statue, which with long labour and study he had perfected according to art. And to those furious and irregular passions that have sometimes flamed in fathers towards their own daughters, and in mothers towards their own sons; the like is also found in this other sort of parentage. Witness what is related of Pygmalion, who, having made the statue of a woman of singular beauty, fell so passionately in love with this work of his that the Gods, in pity of his passion, were fain to inspire it with life:

> Tentatum mollescit ebur, positoque rigore
> Subsidit digitis.[6]
>
> "Hard though it was, beginning to relent,
> The iv'ry breast beneath his fingers bent."

CHAPTER IX.

OF THE ARMS OF THE PARTHIANS.

'Tis an ill custom, and a little unmanly, which the gentlemen of our time have got, not to put on their armour, but just upon the point of the most extreme necessity; and to lay it by again as soon as ever there is any show of the danger being a little over; whence many disorders arise; for every one bustling and running to his arms, just when he should go to charge, has his cuirass to buckle on when his companions are already put to the rout. Our ancestors were wont to give their head-piece, lance, and gauntlets to carry, but never put off their other pieces so long as there was any work to be done. Our troops are now cumbered and rendered unsightly with the clutter of baggage and servants, that cannot be from their masters, by reason they carry their arms. Livy, speaking of our nation, Intolerantissima laboris corpora vix arma humeris gerebant.[1] "Their bodies were so impatient of labour that they could scarcely endure to wear their armour." Many nations do yet, as anciently, go to war without defensive arms; or such, at least, as were of very little proof.

Tegmina queis capitum, raptus de subere cortex.[2]

"Who their temples only bind
With a light helm, made of the cork-tree rind."

Alexander, the most adventurous captain that ever was, very seldom wore armour; and such amongst us as slight it do not by that much harm the main concern; for if we see some killed for want of it, there are few less whom the lumber of armour helps to destroy, either by being over-burdened, crushed, and cramped with its weight, by a rude shock, or otherwise. For, in plain truth, to observe the weight and thickness of that which we have now in use, it seems as if we only sought to defend ourselves; we are rather loaded, than secured, by it. We have enough to do to support its weight, manacled and immured, as if we were only to contend with the shock of our armour; and as if we had not the same obligation to defend it as it has to defend us. Tacitus[3] gives a pleasant description of the men-at-arms of our ancient Gauls, so armed as to be only able to move, without power to offend, or possibility to be offended, or to rise again when once beaten down. Lucullus, seeing certain soldiers of the Medes that made the front of Tigranes's army, heavily armed, and very uneasy, as if in prisons of iron, thence conceived hopes with great ease to defeat them; and by them began his charge and victory.[4] And now that our musqueteers are come into credit, I believe some invention will be found out to immure us for our safety, and draw us to the war in castles, such as those the ancients loaded their elephants withal.

The armour of the French too cumbersome, by its weight, to be proper for use.

This humour is far differing from that of the younger Scipio, who sharply reprehended his soldiers for having planted caltraps[5] under water, in a part of the fosse by which those of the town he held besieged might sally out upon him; saying that those who assaulted should think of attacking, and not of fearing;[6] suspecting, with good reason, that this stop they had put to the enemy would make them less vigilant upon their duty. He said, also, to a young man showing him a fine buckler he had that he was very proud of; "It is a very fine buckler, indeed; but a Roman soldier ought to repose greater confidence in his right hand than in his left."

Now 'tis nothing but the not being used to wear them that makes the weight of our arms so intolerable:

L'usbergo in dosso haveano, et l'elmo in testa,
Duo di questi guerrier, dei quali io canto;
Ne notte o dì, dopo ch' entraro in questa
Stanza, gl' haveano mai messi da canto;
Che facile a portar come la vesta
Era lor, perche in uso l'avean tanto.[7]

"Two of these heroes whom I sing, had on
Each his bright helm, and strong habergeon;
And night nor day, nor one poor minute's space,
Once laid them by whilst they were in this place;
So long accustomed this weight to bear,
Their clothes to them not lighter did appear."

The Emperor Caracalla was wont continually to march on foot, completely armed, at the head of his army.[8] The Roman infantry always carried not only their helmet, sword and shield (for as to arms, says Cicero, they were so accustomed to have them always on that they were no more trouble to them than their own limbs; Arma enim membra militis esse dicunt;[9]) but moreover, fifteen days' provision, together with a certain number of piles, or stakes, wherewith to fortify their camp, to sixty pounds' weight. And Marius's soldiers,[10] laden at the same rate, were inured to march in battalia five leagues in five hours; and sometimes, upon an urgent occasion, six. Their military discipline was much ruder than ours, and accordingly produced much greater effects. The younger Scipio, reforming his army in Spain, ordered his soldiers to eat standing, and nothing that was dressed.[11] The jeer that was given a Lacedæmonian soldier is marvellously pat to the matter, who, in an expedition of war, was reproached to have been seen under the roof of a house. They were so inured to hardship that, let the weather be what it would, it was a shame to be seen under any other cover than the roof of Heaven. We should not march our people very far at that rate.

Arms of Roman infantry, and their military discipline.

As to what remains, Marcellinus, a man bred up in the Roman wars, curiously observes the manner of the Parthians arming themselves; and the rather for its being so different from that of the Romans. "They had," says he, "armour artificially woven, like so many little feathers, which did nothing hinder the motion of the body, and yet so hard that our darts hitting upon it would rebound."[1] (These were the coats of mail our forefathers were so constantly wont to use.) And in another place: "They had," says he, "strong and able horses, covered with thick tanned hides of leather, and were themselves armed cap-a-pie, with great plates of iron so artificially ordered that, in all parts of the limbs which required bending, they assisted motion. One would have said that they were men of iron; having armour for the head so neatly fitted, and so naturally representing the form of a face, that they were no where vulnerable, save at two little round holes that gave them a little light; and certain small chinks about their mouth and nostrils, through which they did, with great difficulty, breathe."

A description very near resembling the equipage of the men-at-arms in France, with their barbed horses. Plutarch says that Demetrius caused two complete suits of armour to be made for himself and for Alcimus, the first warrior about him, of six-score pounds weight each; whereas the ordinary suits weighed but half so much.[3]

CHAPTER X.

OF BOOKS.

I MAKE no doubt but that I often happen to speak of things that are much better, and more truly, handled by those who are masters of the trade. You have here purely an essay of my natural, and not acquired, parts; and whoever shall take me tripping in my ignorance, will not in any sort displease me; for I should be very unwilling to become responsible to another for my writings, who am not so to myself, nor satisfied with them. Whoever goes in quest of knowledge, let him fish for it where it is to be found; there is nothing I so little profess. These are fancies of my own, by which I do not pretend to discover things, but to lay open myself. They may, perhaps, one day be known to me, or have formerly been, according as fortune has put me upon a place where they have been explained; but I have forgotten them; and if I am a man of some reading, I am a man of no retention; so that I can promise no certainty, if not to make known to what point the knowledge I now have rises. Therefore let nobody insist upon the matter I write, but my method in writing it: let them observe in what I borrow, if I have known how to choose what is proper to raise or help the invention, which is always my own; for I make others say for me what, either for want of language, or want of sense, I cannot so well myself express. I do not number my borrowings, I weigh them. And had I designed to raise their value by their number, I had made them twice as many. They are all, or within a very few, so famed and ancient authors that they seem, methinks, themselves sufficiently to tell who they are, without giving me the trouble.[4] In reasons, comparisons, and arguments, if I transplant any into my own soil, and confound them amongst my own, I purposely conceal the author to awe the temerity of those forward censurers that fall upon all sorts of writings, particularly the late ones, of men yet living, and in the vulgar tongue, forsooth, which puts, it would seem, every one into a capacity of judging, and which seems to convict the authors themselves of vulgar conception and design. I would have them give Plutarch a fillip on my nose, and put themselves in a heat with railing against Seneca, when they think they rail at me. I must shelter my own weakness under these great reputations. I shall love any one that can unplume me, that is, by clearness of understanding and judgment, and by the sole distinction of the force and beauty of reason: for I, who, for want of memory, am at every turn at a loss to pick them out by their national livery, am yet wise enough to know, by the measure of my own abilities, that my soil is incapable of producing any of those rich flowers that I there find set and growing; and that all the fruits of my own growth are not worth any one of them. For this, indeed, I hold myself responsible, though the confession make against me; if there be any vanity and vice in my writings, which I do not of myself perceive, nor can discern, when pointed out to me by another; for many faults escape the eye, but the infirmity of judgment consists in not being able to discern them, when, by another,

Why Montaigne did not choose to name the authors from whom he quoted.

[1] Ammianus Marcellinus, a Latin historian, though, by birth, a Greek, who bore arms under the emperors Constantius, Julian, &c. lib. xxiv. cap. 7.

[2] Claudian in Ruf. ii. 356.

[3] Plutarch, in vitâ, who tells the story somewhat differently.

[4] It was not till after Montaigne's death that his editor undertook to name the authors whom he had quoted. And this was rather attempted than executed up to the edition of M. Buchon (whence the present translation is corrected and enlarged), which not only shews the places whence Montaigne quoted those passages, but also many others, which he had only referred to in a very loose manner, though he had inserted the sense of them in his work.

laid open to us. Knowledge and truth may be in us without judgment, and judgment also without them; but the confession of ignorance is one of the fairest and surest testimonies of judgment that I know. I have no other officer to put my writings in rank and file, but fortune. As things come into my head I heap them in; sometimes they advance in whole bodies, sometimes in single files. I am content that every one should see my natural and ordinary pace, ill as it is. I let myself jog on at my own rate and ease. Neither are these subjects which a man is not permitted to be ignorant in, or casually, and at a venture, to discourse of. I could wish to have a more perfect knowledge of things, but I will not buy it so dear as it will cost. My design is to pass over easily, and not laboriously, the remainder of my life. There is nothing that I will break my brain about; no, not knowledge, of what price soever.

What he aimed to find in books.

I seek, in the reading of books, only to please myself by an irreproachable diversion; or, if I study, it is for no other science than what treats of the knowledge of myself, and instructs me how to live and die well:

Has meus ad metas sudet oportet equus.[1]

"I to this only course
Train up, and in it only breathe my horse."

I do not bite my nails about the difficulties I meet with in my reading; after a charge or two I give them over. Should I insist upon them, I should both lose myself and time; for I have an impatient understanding that must be satisfied at once; what I do not discern at first, by persisting becomes still more obscure. I do nothing without gaiety; continuation, and a too obstinate endeavour, darkens, stupifies and tires my judgment. My sight is confounded and dissipated with poring; I must withdraw it, and refer the discovery to new attempts; just as, to judge rightly of the lustre of scarlet, we are taught to pass it lightly over with the eye, in running it over at several sudden and reiterated views and glances. If one book does not please me, I take another, and never meddle with any but at such times as I am weary of doing nothing. I care not much for new ones, because the old seem fuller, and of stronger reason; neither do I much tamper with Greek authors, for my judgment loves not to occupy itself on matters which I know but superficially.[2] Amongst those that are simply pleasant of the moderns, Boccaccio's Decameron, Rabelais, and the Basia of Johannes Secundus, if those may be ranged under that title, are worth reading. As to the Amadises, and such kind of stuff, they had not the credit to take me, so much as in my childhood. And I will moreover say (whether boldly or rashly), that this old, heavy soul of mine is now no longer delighted with Ariosto; no, nor with the good fellow Ovid; his facility and invention, with which I was formerly so ravished, are now of no relish, and I can hardly have the patience to read him. I speak my opinion freely of all things, even of those that, perhaps, exceed my capacity, and that I do not conceive to be in anywise under my jurisdiction. The judgment I deliver is to show the measure of my own sight, and not that of the things. When I find myself disgusted with Plato's Axiochus, as with a work, considering who the author was, without force, my judgment does not believe itself:[3] it is not so arrogant as to oppose the authority of so many other famous judgments of antiquity, which it considers as its directors and masters, and with whom it is rather content to err; in such a case it condemns itself, either for stopping at the outer bark, not being able to penetrate to the heart, or for considering it by some false light, and is content with securing itself from trouble and error only; and, as to its own weakness, does frankly acknowledge and confess it. It thinks it gives a just interpretation, according to the appearance that its conceptions present to it; but they are weak and imperfect. Most of the Fables of Æsop have several meanings; those who mythologised them chose some aspect that quadrates well to the Fable; but, for the most part, 'tis but the first face that presents itself, and but superficial; there yet remain others more lively, essential, and profound, into which they have not been able to penetrate; and just so do I.

What he thought of Ovid in the decline of his life.

Montaigne preferred the writings of the ancients to the moderns.

But to proceed. I have always thought that, in poetry, Virgil, Lucretius, Catullus, and Horace, do many degrees excel the rest, and signally, Virgil in his Georgics, which I look upon as the most finished work in poetry; in comparison of which a man may easily discern that there are some places in his Æneids to which the author would have given a little more of the file, had he had leisure: the fifth book of his Æneids seems to me the most perfect. I also love Lucan, and willingly read him; not so much for his style as for his own worth, and the truth and solidity of his opinions and judgments. As for my good Terence, the standard of all that is charming and eloquent in the Latin tongue, I find in him so admirable and lively a representation of our manners and the movements of the soul, that our actions throw me at every turn upon him; and I cannot read him so oft that I do not still discover some new grace and beauty. Such as lived near Virgil's time were scandalized that some should compare him with Lucretius. I am of opinion that the comparison is, in truth, very unequal; a belief that, nevertheless, I have much ado to assure myself in, when I meet with some excellent passages in Lucretius. But, if they were so angry at this comparison, what would they have said of the brutish and barbarous stupidity of those who, at this hour, compare Ariosto with him? and what would Ariosto himself say?

[2] Montaigne takes other occasions to declare, more distinctly, his ignorance of Greek; yet we find him often quoting passages from that language.

[3] The Axiochus is not by Plato, and Laertius had already admitted this. It was for a long time attributed to Æschines, the Socratician (see the edition by Jean Le Clerc, Amsterdam, 1711); others have given it to Xenocrates, the Chalcedonian. Be this as it may, the dialogue is one of very great antiquity.

Of Lucretius.

O sæculum insipiens, et infacetum![1]

"O foolish, tasteless age!"

I think the ancients had more reason to be angry with those who compared Plautus to Terence (though he smacks more of his man), than Lucretius to Virgil. It makes much for the honour and preference of Terence that the father of Roman eloquence had him alone so often in his mouth, and the sentence that the best judge of Roman poets has passed upon the other.[2] I have often observed that those of our times who take upon them to write comedies (as well as the Italians, who are happy enough in that way of writing), take in three or four arguments of those of Plautus or Terence to make one of theirs, and crowd five or six of Boccaccio's novels into one single comedy. That which makes them so load themselves with matter is the diffidence they have of being able to support themselves with their own strength. They must find out something to lean on; and, having not of their own wherewith to entertain the audience, bring in the story to supply the defect of language. It is quite otherwise with my author;[3] the beauty, the perfection of his way of speaking, makes us lose the appetite for his plot. His fine expression, elegance, and quaintness, is every where taking: he is so pleasant throughout, and does so possess the soul with his graces that we forget those of his fable. This very consideration carries me further: I observe that the best and most ancient poets have avoided the affectation and hunting after, not only of fantastic Spanish and Petrarchic elevations, but even the softest and most gentle touches, which are the ornaments of the poetry of succeeding times. And yet there is no good judgment that will condemn this in the ancients, and that does not incomparably more admire the equal polish and the perpetual sweetness and flourishing beauty of Catullus's Epigrams than all the stings with which Martial arms the tails of his. This is by the same reason that I gave before, as Martial says of himself: Minus illi ingenio laborandum fuit, in cujus locum materia successerat.[5] "His subject was so fruitful that he had the less need for the exercise of his wit." The first, without being moved or putting themselves out at all, make themselves sufficiently felt; they have matter enough of laughter throughout, they need not tickle themselves. The others have need of foreign assistance; as they have the less wit, they must have the more body; they mount on horseback, because they are not able to stand on their own legs. As in our balls, those mean fellows that teach to dance not being able to represent the port and dignity of our gentry, are fain to supply it with dangerous jumpings, and other strange motions and fantastic tricks. And the ladies are less put to it in dances where there are several coupées, changes, and quick motions of body, than in some others of a more quiet kind, where they are only to move a natural pace, and to represent their ordinary grace and port: and as I have often seen good merry-andrews, who, in their own every-day clothes, and with their ordinary face, give us all the pleasure of their art, when their apprentices, not yet arrived to such perfection, are fain to meal their faces, put themselves into a ridiculous disguise, and make a hundred faces, to get us to laugh. This conception of mine is no where more demonstrable than in comparing the Æneid with Orlando Furioso; we see the first on outspread wing, with lofty and sustained flight, always following his point; the latter, fluttering and hopping from tale to tale, as from branch to branch, not daring to trust his wings but in very short flights, and perching at every turn, lest his breath and force should fail.

These, then, as to this sort of subjects, are the authors that best please me.

As to what concerns my other reading, that mixes a little more profit with the pleasure, and whence I learn how to marshal my opinions and qualities; the books that serve me to this purpose are Plutarch (since he has been translated into French) and Seneca. Both of them have this great convenience suited to my humour, that the knowledge I there seek is discoursed in some pieces that do not require any great trouble of reading long, of which I am incapable. Such are the minor works of the first, and the Epistles of the latter, which are the best and most profitable of all their writings. 'Tis no great undertaking to take one of them in hand, and I give over at pleasure; for they have no chain or dependence upon one another. These authors, for the most part, concur in all useful and true opinions: and there is this further parallel betwixt them, that fortune brought them into the world about the same age: they were both tutors to the Roman emperors: both sought out from foreign countries: both rich, and both powerful. Their instructions are the cream of philosophy, and delivered after a plain and pertinent manner. Plutarch is more uniform and constant; Seneca more various and undulating. The last toiled, set himself, and bent his whole force to fortify virtue against frailty, fear, and vicious appetites. The other seems more to slight their power; he disdains to alter his pace, or stand upon his guard. Plutarch's opinions are Platonic, gentle, and accommodated to civil society: those of the other are Stoical and Epicurean, more remote from common use, but, in my opinion, more proper for private sanction and more firm. Seneca would seem to lean a little to the tyranny of the emperors of his time, but only seems; for I hold it for certain that he spake against his judgment when he condemns the generous action of those who assassinated Cæsar. Plutarch is frank throughout; Seneca abounds with brisk touches and sallies: Plutarch with things that heat and move you more; this contents and pays you better; he guides us, the other pushes us on.

Opinion of Cicero;

As to Cicero, those of his works that are most useful to my design are they that treat of philosophy, especially moral. But, boldly to confess the truth (for since one has stepped over the barriers of impudence there is no checking one's-self,) his way of writing, and that of all other long-winded authors, appears to me very tedious: for his prefaces, definitions, divisions, and etymologies, take up the greatest part of his work: whatever there is of life and marrow is smothered and lost in the preparation. When I have spent an hour in reading him (which is a great deal for me), and try to recollect what I have thence extracted of juice and substance, for the most part I find nothing but wind; for he is not yet come to the arguments that serve to his purpose, and the reasons that should properly help to loose the knot I would untie. For me, who only desire to become more wise, not more learned or eloquent, these logical or Aristotelian dispositions of parts are of no use. I would have a man begin with the main proposition, and that wherein the force of the argument lies; I know well enough what death and pleasure are; let no man give himself the trouble to anatomize them to me; I look for good and solid reasons at the first dash to instruct me how to stand the shock, and resist them; to which purpose neither grammatical subtleties, nor the ingenious contexture of words and arguments, are of any use at all. I am for discourses that give the first charge into the heart of the doubt; his languish about his subjects, and delay our expectation. They are proper for the schools, for the bar, and for the pulpit, where we have leisure to nod, and may awake a quarter of an hour after, time enough to find again the thread of the discourse. It is necessary to speak after this manner to judges, whom a man has a design, right or wrong, to incline to favour his cause; to children and common-people, to whom a man must say all he can, and try what effects his eloquence can produce. I would not have an author make it his business to render me attentive; or that he should cry out fifty times O yes, as the clerks and heralds do. The Romans, in their religious exercises, began with Hoc age; as we in ours do with Sursum corda, which are so many words lost to me; I come thither already fully prepared from my chamber. I need no allurement, no invitation, no sauce; I eat the meat raw, and, instead of whetting my appetite by these preparatives, they tire and pall it. Will the license of the time excuse the sacrilegious boldness of my holding the dialoguisms of Plato himself to be also heavy, and too much stifling his matter; and my lamenting so much time lost by a man who had so many better things to say, in so many long and needless preliminary interlocutions. My ignorance will better excuse me in this, that I see nothing in the beauty of his language. I would generally choose books that use sciences, not such as only lead to them. The two first,[1] and Pliny, and their like, have nothing of this Hoc age; they will have to do with men already instructed; or if they have, 'tis a substantial Hoc age, and that has a body by itself. I also delight in reading the Epistles to Atticus; not only because they contain a great deal of history and the affairs of his time; but much more because I therein discover much of his own private humour: for I have a singular curiosity (as I have said elsewhere) to pry into the souls, and the natural and true judgments, of the authors with whom I converse. A man may indeed judge of their parts, but not of their manners nor of themselves, by the writings they expose upon the theatre of the world. I have a thousand times lamented the loss of the treatise that Brutus writ upon virtue; for it is best learning the theory of those who best know the practice. But seeing the thing preached, and the preacher, are different things, I would as willingly see Brutus in Plutarch as in a book of his own. I would rather choose to be certainly informed of the conference he had in h and of Plato's dialogues.

tent, with some particular friends of his, the night before a battle, than of the harangue he made the next day to his army; and of what he did in his closet and his chamber, than what he did in the public place and in the Senate. As to Cicero, I am of the common opinion that (learning excepted), he had no great natural parts. He was a good citizen, of an affable nature, as all fat, heavy men, such as he was, usually are: but given to ease, and had a mighty share of vanity and ambition. Neither do I know how to excuse him for thinking his poetry fit to be published. 'Tis no great imperfection to make ill verses; but it is an imperfection not to be able to judge how unworthy his verses were of the glory of his name. For what concerns his eloquence, that is totally out of comparison: I believe it will never be equalled. The younger Cicero, who resembled his father in nothing but in name, whilst commanding in Asia had several strangers one day at his table, and among the rest Cestius, seated at the lower end, as men often intrude to the open tables of the great. Cicero asked one of his people who that man was? who presently told him his name. But he, as one who had his thoughts taken up with something else, and had forgot the answer made him, asking three or four times over and over again the same question, the fellow, to deliver himself from so many questions, and to make him know him by some particular circumstance: "'Tis that Cestius," said he, "of whom it was told you that he makes no great account of your father's eloquence in comparison of his own." At which Cicero, being suddenly nettled, commanded poor Cestius presently to be seized, and caused him to be very well whipped in his own presence:[1]—a very discourteous entertainer! Yet, even amongst those who, all things considered, have reputed his eloquence incomparable, there have been some, however, who have not stuck to observe some faults: as that great Brutus, his friend, for example, who said 'twas a broken and feeble eloquence: fractam et elumbem.[2] The orators, also, nearest to the age wherein he lived, reprehended in him the care he had of a certain long cadence in his periods, and particularly took notice of these words, esse videatur, which he there so oft makes use of.[3] For my part I better approve of a shorter cadence, that comes more roundly off; yet he sometimes shuffles his parts more briskly together, but 'tis very seldom. I have myself taken notice of this one passage, Ego verò me minus diu senem mallem, quam esse senem antequam essem.[4] "For my own part, I had rather be old only a short time, than be old before I really am so."

Character of Cicero.

The historians, however, are my true men; for they are pleasant and easy; where immediately man in general, the knowledge of whom I hunt after, appears more lively and entire than any where besides: the variety and truth of his internal qualities, in gross and piece-meal, the diversity of means by which he is united and knit, and the accidents that threaten him. Now those that write lives, by reason they insist more upon counsels than events, more upon what sallies from within than upon that which happens without, are the most proper for my reading; and, therefore, above all others, Plutarch is the man for me. I am very sorry we have not a dozen Laertiuses, or that he was not further extended, or better understood. For I am equally curious to know the lives and fortunes of the great instructors of the world, as to know the diversities of their doctrines and opinions. In this class of study, the reading of histories, a man must tumble over, without distinction, all sorts of authors, ancient and modern, vulgar and classical, there to know the things of which they variously treat. But Cæsar, in my opinion, particularly deserves to be studied, not for the knowledge of the history only, but for himself, so great an excellence and perfection he has above all the rest, though Sallust be one of the number. In truth, I read this author with somewhat more reverence and respect than is usually allowed to human writings; one while considering him in his person, by his actions and miraculous greatness, and another in the purity and inimitable polish of his language and style, wherein he not only excels all other historians, as Cicero confesses,[5] but peradventure even Cicero himself: speaking of his enemies with so much sincerity in his judgment that, the false colours with which he strives to palliate his ill cause, and the pollution of his pestilent ambition, excepted, I think there is no fault to be objected against him, saving this, that he speaks too sparingly of himself, seeing so many great things could not have been performed under his conduct, but that he himself must necessarily have had a greater share in the execution than he makes mention of.

Why Montaigne was best pleased with history.

Cæsar's commentaries commended.

I love historians who are either very unsophisticated or very excellent. The former, who have nothing of their own to mix with it, and who only make it their business to make a faithful collection of all that comes to their knowledge, and faithfully to record all things without choice or prejudice, leave to us the entire judgment of discerning the truth of things. Such, for example, amongst others, is honest Froissart, who has proceeded in his undertaking with so frank a plainness that, having committed an error, he is not ashamed to confess and correct it in the place where the finger has been laid, and who represents to us even the variety of rumours that were then spread abroad, and the different reports that were made to him; which is the naked and unformed matter of history, and of which every one may make his profit according to his proportion of understanding. The more excellent sort of historians have judgment to pick out what is most worthy to be known; and, of two reports, to examine which is the most likely to be true. From the condition of princes and their humours they conclude the counsels, and attribute to them words proper for the occasion; and such have title to assume the authority of regulating our belief to what they themselves believe; but certainly this privilege belongs to very few. The middle sort of historians (of which the most part are) spoil all: they will chew our meat for us; they take upon themselves to judge of, and consequently to bias history to their own fancy: for, if the judgment partially lean to one side, a man cannot avoid wresting and writhing his narrative to that bias.[1] They undertake to choose things worthy to be known, and yet very often conceal from us such a word, such a private action, as would much better instruct us; omit, as incredible, such things as they do not understand; and others, perhaps, because they cannot express them in good French or Latin. Let them, in God's name, display their eloquence, and judge according to their own fancy; but let them, withal, leave us something to judge of after them, and neither alter nor disguise, by their abridgments and selections, any thing of the substance of the matter; but deliver it to us pure and entire in all its dimensions.

For the most part, and especially in these latter ages, persons are culled out for this work from amongst the common people, upon the sole consideration of well-speaking, as if we were to learn grammar thence; and the men so chosen are in the right, being hired for no other end, and pretending to nothing but babble, not to be very solicitous of any part but that, and so, with a fine jingle of words, prepare us a pretty contexture of reports they pick up in the corners of the streets. The only good histories are those that have been written by the persons themselves who commanded in the affairs whereof they write, or who have participated in the conduct of them, or, at least, who have had the conduct of others of the same nature. Such almost are all the Greek and Roman historians: for several eye-witnesses having writ of the same subject (as happened in those times, when grandeur and learning frequently met in the same person), if there was an error it must of necessity be a very slight one, and upon a very doubtful accident. What can a man expect from a physician who will undertake to write of war; or from a mere scholar treating upon the designs of princes? If we would take notice how religious the Romans were in this, there needs but this example: Asinius Pollio found in the History of Cæsar himself some mistake occasioned either by reason he could not have his eye in all parts of his army at once, and had given credit to some particular persons, who had not delivered him a very true account; or else for not having had too perfect notice given him by his lieutenants of what they had done in his absence.[2] By which we may see whether the inquisition after truth be not very delicate, when a man cannot believe the report of a battle from the knowledge of him who there commanded, nor from the soldiers who were engaged in it, unless, after the method of judicatory information, the witnesses be confronted, and the challenges received upon the proof of the least details of every point. The knowledge we have of our own private affairs is indeed still much weaker and more obscure: but that has been sufficiently handled by Bodin,[3] and according to my own sentiment.

The mistakes that have been discovered in Cæsar's Commentaries.

A little to guard against the treachery and defect of my memory (a defect so extreme that it has happened to me more than once to take books again into my hand for new and unseen, which I had carefully read over a few years before, and scribbled with my notes), I have taken a custom of late to fix at the end of every book (that is, of those I never intended to read again), the time when I made an end of it, and the judgment I had made of it on the whole, to the end that that might, at least, represent to me the air and general idea I had conceived of the author in reading it. And I will here transcribe some of these annotations.

I writ this some ten years ago in my Guicciardini (in what language soever my books speak, I always speak of them in my own):—"He is a diligent historiographer, and from whom, in my opinion, a man may learn the truth of the affairs of his time as exactly as from any other, or more; in the most of which he was himself also a personal actor, and in honourable command. There is no appearance that he disguised anything, either upon the account of hatred, favour, or vanity; of which the free opinion he passes upon great men, and particularly those by whom he was advanced and employed in commands of trust and honour, as Pope Clement the Seventh, give ample testimony. As to that part which he seems to think himself the best at, namely, his digressions and discourses, he has indeed very good ones, and enriched with fine expressions; but he is too fond of them: for to leave nothing unsaid, having a subject so full, ample, and almost infinite, he degenerates into pedantry, and relishes a little of the scholastic prattle. I have also observed this in him; that of so many persons, and so many effects, so many motives and so many counsels as he judges of, he never attributes any one of them to virtue, religion, or conscience; as if all those were utterly extinct in the world. And of all the actions, how brave and fair an outward show soever they make of themselves, he always throws the cause and motive upon some vicious occasion or some prospect of profit. It is impossible to imagine but that, amongst such an infinite number of actions as he makes mention of, there must be some one produced by the way of reason. No corruption could so universally have infected men that some of them would not have escaped the contagion: which makes me suspect that his own taste was vicious; whence it might happen that he judged other men by himself.

of Philip de Comines;

In my Philip de Comines there is this written:—"You will here find the language soft, delightful, and full of simplicity; the narration pure, in which the veracity of the author evidently shines; free from vanity when speaking of himself, and from affection or envy when speaking of others. His discourses and exhortations more accompanied with zeal and truth than with any exquisite self-sufficiency; and throughout authority and gravity, which speak him a man of extraction and bred up in great affairs."

of du Bellay.

Upon the Memoirs of Monsieur du Bellay[1] I find this:—"'Tis always pleasant to read things writ by those that have experienced how they ought to be carried on; but withal it cannot be denied but there is a manifest falling-off in these two lords from the freedom and liberty of writing that shines in the older historians of their class, such as the Sire de Jouinville, a domestic to St. Louis; Eginhard, chancellor to Charlemagne; and of later date in Philip de Comines. We have here rather an apology for King Francis against the Emperor Charles the Fifth than a history. I will not believe that they have falsified anything as to matter of fact; but they make a common practice of wresting the judgment of events (very often contrary to reason) to our advantage, and of omitting everything that is ticklish to be handled in the life of their master; witness the affairs of Messieurs de Montmorency and de Biron, which are here omitted: nay, so much as the very name of Madame d'Estampes is not here to be found. Secret actions an historian may conceal; but to pass over in silence what all the world knows, and things that have drawn after them important public consequences, is an inexcusable defect. In fine, whoever has a mind to have a perfect knowledge of King Francis, and what happened in his reign, let him seek it elsewhere, if my advice may prevail. The only profit a man can reap here is from the particular narrative of battles and other exploits of war wherein those gentlemen were personally engaged; some words and private actions of the princes of their time, and the practices and negociations carried on by the Seigneur de Langey; where, indeed, there are everywhere things worthy to be known, and discourses above the vulgar strain."

CHAPTER XI.

OF CRUELTY.

Virtue better than goodness.

I TAKE virtue to be distinct from, and something more noble than, those inclinations to generosity and good nature which we are born with. Well disposed and well descended souls pursue, indeed, the same methods, and represent the same face that virtue itself does; but the word virtue imports something, I know not what, more great and active than merely for a man to suffer himself, by a happy dispensation, to be gently and quietly drawn in the train of reason. He who, from a natural sweetness and facility of temper, should despise injuries received, would doubtless do a very great and a very laudable thing; but he who, provoked and nettled to the quick by an offence, should fortify himself with the arms of reason against the furious appetite of revenge, and, after a great conflict, master his own passion, would doubtless do a very great deal more. The first would do well; the latter virtuously. One action might be called goodness, and the other virtue; for methinks the very name of virtue pre-supposes difficulty and contention, and that it cannot be exercised without opposition. 'Tis for this reason, perhaps, that we call God good, mighty, liberal, and just; but we do not call him virtuous,[2] being that all his operations are natural and without endeavour. Many philosophers, not only Stoics, but Epicureans,[1] (and this distinction I borrow from the common opinion, which is a wrong one, notwithstanding that subtle quip of Arcesilaus to him who reproached him, "That many persons went from his school to the Epicurean, but never from the Epicurean to his;"—"It may well be so," said he; "cocks make many capons, but capons never make cocks." For, in truth, in firmness and austerity of opinions and precepts the Epicurean sect yields in no degree to the Stoic; and a Stoic, exhibiting better faith than those disputants who, to combat Epicurus and give themselves an advantage, make him say things he never thought of, twisting his words awry, and making use of the laws of grammar to deduce another sense from his way of speaking, and another doctrine than what, they well knew, he had in his heart and manifested in his manners, tells us that he declined to become an Epicurean for this consideration, among others, that he thought their ways too high and rugged: Et ii qui φιληδονοι vocantur sunt φιλοκαλοι, omnes virtutes et colunt et retinent):[2] of the philosophers, Stoic and Epicurean, I say, there are several who were of opinion that it is not enough to have the soul seated in a good place, of a good temper, and well disposed to virtue;—it is not enough to have our resolution and our reason fixed above all the power of fortune, but we are, moreover, to seek occasions wherein to put them to the proof. We are to covet pain, necessity, and contempt, to contend with them, and to keep the soul in breath: Multum sibi adjicit virtus lacessita.[3] "Virtue perfectionates herself by resisting assaults." 'Tis one of the reasons why Epaminondas, who was yet of a third sect,[4] refused the riches which fortune presented to him by very lawful means. "In order," said he, "to contend with poverty;" in the extreme of which he maintained himself to the last. Socrates, methinks, put himself upon a still harder trial, keeping for his exercise a termagant scolding wife, which was fighting at sharps. Metellus having, of all the Roman senators, alone attempted, by the power of virtue, to withstand the violence of Saturninus, tribune of the people at Rome, who sought forcibly to cause an unjust law to pass in favour of the commons, and by so doing having incurred the capital penalties that Saturninus had established against dissentients, entertained those who in this extremity led him to execution, with words to this effect: "That it was a thing too easy and too base to do ill; and that to do well where there was no danger was a common thing; but that to do well where there was danger was the proper office of a man of virtue."[5] These words of Metellus very clearly represent to us what I would make out, that virtue refuses facility for a companion; and that that easy, smooth, and descending way, by which the regular steps of a sweet disposition of nature are conducted, is not that of a true virtue. She requires a rough and stormy passage; she will have either outward difficulties to wrestle with, like that of Metellus, by means of which fortune delights to interrupt the speed of her career; or internal difficulties, which our inordinate appetites and imperfections introduce to disturb her.

Virtue cannot be exercised without some difficulty.

[1] These Memoirs, published by Martin du Bellay, consist of ten books, of which the four first and three last are Martin du Bellay's, and the others his brother William de Langey's, and were taken from his fifth Ogdoade, from the years 1536 to 1540. They are entitled Memoirs of Martin du Bellay, containing Accounts of several things that happened in France, from 1513 to the death of Francis I., in 1547. This accounts for Montaigne's speaking of two lords du Bellay, after he had mentioned only Monsieur du Bellay.

[2] "Quoique nous appellions Dieu bon, nous ne l'appellons pas vertueux, par ce qu'il n'a pas besoin d'effort pour bien faire."—Rousseau, Emile, v.

I am come thus far at my ease; but here it comes into my head that the soul of Socrates, the most perfect that ever came to my knowledge, should, by this rule, be of very little account; for I cannot conceive in that person any the least motion of a vicious inclination: I cannot imagine there could be any difficulty or constraint in the course of his virtue: I know his reason to be so powerful and sovereign over him that she would never have suffered a vicious appetite so much as to spring in him. To a virtue so elevated as his I have nothing to oppose. Methinks I see him march, with a victorious and triumphant pace, in pomp, and at his ease, without opposition or disturbance. If virtue cannot shine bright but by the conflict of contrary appetites, shall we then say that she cannot subsist without the assistance of vice, and that it is from her that she derives her reputation and honour? What then also would become of that brave and generous Epicurean pleasure which assumes to nourish virtue tenderly in her lap, and there make it play and wanton, giving it for toys to play withal shame, fevers, poverty, death, and torments? If I presuppose that a perfect virtue manifests itself in contending, in patiently enduring pain, and undergoing the utmost extremity of the gout, without being moved in her seat; if I give her austerity and difficulty for her necessary objects, what will become of a virtue elevated to such a degree as not only to despise pain, but moreover to rejoice in it, and to be tickled with the stabs of a sharp colic, such a virtue as the Epicureans have established, and of which many of them, by their actions, have given most sufficient proofs?[6] As have likewise several others, who I take to have surpassed, in effect,

[1] Montaigne stops here to make his excuse for thus naming the Epicureans with the Stoics, in conformity to the general opinion that the Epicureans were not so rigid in their morals as the Stoics, which is not true in the main, as he demonstrates at one view. This involved Montaigne in a long parenthesis, during which it is proper that the reader be attentive, that he may not entirely lose the thread of the argument. In some latter editions of this author it has been attempted to remedy this inconvenience by some vain and unauthorised repetition; but, without observing that Montaigne's argument is rendered somewhat feeble and obscure by these, it is a license that ought not to be taken, because he who publishes the work of another ought to give it as the other composed it. Mr. Cotton was so puzzled with the enormous parenthesis that follows in the text that he quite left it out.

even the rules of their own discipline; witness the younger Cato. When I see him die, and tear his own bowels, I am not satisfied simply to believe that he had then his soul totally exempt from all troubles and fear, I cannot think that he only maintained himself in the steadiness that the stoical rules prescribed him; temperate, without emotion, and undisturbed; there was, methinks, something in the virtue of this man too sprightly and active to stop there; I believe that, without doubt, he felt a pleasure and delight in so noble an action, and was more pleased in it than in any other of his life: Sic abiit è vita ut causam moriendi nactum se esse gauderet.[1] "He quitted life rejoicing that he had found occasion to seek death." I believe this so entirely that I question indeed whether he would have been content to have been deprived of the occasion of so brave an exploit. And if the goodness that made him embrace the public concern more than his own withheld me not, I should easily fall into an opinion that he thought himself obliged to fortune for having put his virtue upon so brave a trial, and for having favoured that thief[2] in treading under foot the ancient liberty of his country. Methinks I read in this action I know not what exultation in his soul, and an extraordinary and manly emotion of pleasure, when he looked upon the generosity and height of his enterprize:

The noble death of Cato accompanied with pleasure.

Deliberata morte ferocior:[3]

"Made more haughty by his resolution to die:"

not stimulated with any hope of glory, as the popular and effeminate judgments of some have concluded (for that consideration had been too mean and low to possess so generous, so haughty, and so unbending a heart as his), but for the very beauty of the thing in itself, which he, who had the handling of the springs discerned more clearly and in its perfection than we are able to do. Philosophy has obliged me in determining that so brave an action had been indecently placed in any other life than that of Cato, and that it only belonged to his to end so. Therefore it was that, according to reason, he commanded his son and the senators that accompanied him, to take another course in their affairs: Catoni quum incredibilem natura tribuisset gravitatem, eamque ipse perpetua constantia roboravisset, semperque in proposito consilio permansisset, moriendum potius quam tyranni vultus aspiciendus erat.[4] "Nature having endued Cato with a surprising inflexibility, which he himself had fortified with perpetual exercise, never having deviated from his resolutions, he chose rather to die than to see the face of the tyrant." Every death ought to hold proportion with the life before it. We do not become others for dying. I always interpret the death by the life preceding; and if any one tells me of a death strong and firm in appearance, annexed to a feeble life, I conclude it produced by some feeble cause, and suitable to the life before. The easiness then of this death, and the facility of dying he had acquired by the vigour of his soul, shall we say that it ought to abate anything of the lustre of his virtue? And who that has his brain never so little tinctured with the true philosophy, can be content to imagine Socrates merely free from fear and passion in the accident of his prison, fetters, and condemnation? and that will not discover in him not only stability and firmness (which was his ordinary composure), but moreover I know not what new satisfaction and frolic cheerfulness in his last words and actions? at the start he gave, with the pleasure of scratching his leg, when his irons were taken off, does he not discover an equal serenity and joy in his soul for being freed from past inconveniences, and at the same time to enter into the knowledge of things to come? Cato will pardon me if he please; his death, indeed, is more tragical and more taken notice of, but yet this, I know not how, finer. Aristippus said to those who were pitying him, "The gods grant me such a death." A man discerns in the souls of these two great men and their imitators (for I very much doubt whether there were ever their equals) so perfect a habit of virtue that it was turned to a complexion. It is no more a laborious virtue, nor the precepts of reason, to maintain which the soul is racked; but the very essence of their souls, its natural and ordinary condition. They have rendered it such by a long practice of philosophical precepts, having lit upon a rich and ingenuous nature. The vicious passions that spring in us can find no entrance into them. The force and vigour of their souls stifle and extinguish irregular desires so soon as they begin to move.

Virtue turned into habit in Cato and Socrates.

Now, that it is not more noble, by a high and divine resolution, to hinder the birth of temptations, and to be so formed to virtue that the very seeds of vice be rooted out, than to hinder, by main force, their progress; and having suffered one's-self to be surprised with the first motions of the passions, to arm one's-self, and to stand firm to oppose their progress and overcome them; and that this second effect, itself, is not also much more noble than to be simply endowed with a facile and affable nature, of itself disaffected to debauchery and vice, I do not think can be doubted; for this third and last sort seems to render a man innocent, but not virtuous; free from doing ill, but not apt enough to do well: added, that this condition is so near neighbour to imperfection and weakness that I know not very well how to separate the confines and distinguish them: the very name of goodness, and good nature, and innocence are, for this reason, in some sort grown into contempt. I know that several virtues, as chastity, sobriety, and temperance, may come to a man through personal defects. Firmness in danger (if firmness it must be called), the contempt of death and patience in misfortunes, may oft-times be found in men for want of well judging of such matters, and not apprehending them for such as they are. Want of apprehension and sottishness do sometimes counterfeit virtuous effects: as I have often observed it happen that men have been commended for what really deserved blame. An Italian lord once said this in my presence, to the disadvantage of his own nation; that the subtilty of the Italians and the vivacity of their conceptions were so great that they foresaw the dangers and accidents that might befal them so far off that it must not be thought strange if they were often, in war, observed to provide for their safety, even before they had discovered the peril: that we French and Spaniards, who are not so cunning, went on further; and that we must be made to see and feel the danger before we could take the alarm; but the Germans and Swiss, more heavy and thick-skulled, had not the sense to look about them, even then, when the blows were falling about their ears. Perhaps, he only said so for mirth's sake. And yet it is most certain that, in war, raw soldiers rush into danger with more precipitation than after they have been well beaten.

Italians subtile and quick of apprehension.

Germans and Swiss loggerheads.

> Haud ignarus * * * quantum nova gloria in armis,
> Et prædulce decus, primo certamine, possit.[1]
>
> "Knowing how much the hope of glory warms

For this reason it is that when we judge of a particular action, we are to consider the several circumstances and the whole of the man by whom it is performed, before we give it a name.

To instance in myself; I have sometimes known my friends call that prudence in me which was merely fortune, and repute that courage and patience which was judgment and opinion: and attribute to me one title for another, sometimes to my advantage, and sometimes otherwise. As to the rest, I am so far from being arrived at the first and most perfect degree of excellence, where virtue is turned into habit, that even of the second I have made no great trial. I have not been very solicitous to curb the desires by which I have been importuned. My virtue is a virtue, or rather an innocence, casual and accidental. If I had been born of a more irregular complexion, I am afraid I should have made scurvy work on't; for I never observed any great stability in my soul to resist passions, if they were never so little vehement. I have not the knack of nourishing quarrels and debates in my own bosom, and consequently owe myself no great thanks that I am free from several vices:

In what consisted Montaigne's virtue.

> Si vitiis mediocribus et mea paucis
> Mendosa est natura, alioqui recta; velut si
> Egregio inspersos reprehendas corpore nævos:[2]
>
> "If of small crimes, and few, my nature be
> To be accused, and from the great ones free,
> Those venial faults will no more spot my soul
> Than a fair body's blemished with a mole:

I owe it rather to my fortune than my reason. She has made me to be descended of a race famous for conduct, and of a very good father; I know not whether or no he has infused into me part of his humour; or whether domestic examples and the good education of my infancy have insensibly assisted in the work, or if I was otherwise born so:

> Seu Libra, seu me Scorpius aspicit
> Formidolosus, pars violentior
> Natalis horæ, seu tyrannus
> Hesperiæ Capricornus undæ.[3]
>
> "If Libra, or dread Scorpio's sign,
> Or Capricorn with stormy rays
> Prevailed, the tyrant of the Hesperian seas.

But so it is that I have naturally a horror for most vices. The answer of Antisthenes to him who asked him which was the best apprenticeship; "To unlearn evil,"[4] seems to point at this. I have them in horror, I say, with a detestation so natural and so much my own that the same instinct and impression I brought with me from my nurse I yet retain, no temptations whatever having had the power to make me alter it; not so much as my own discourses, which, in some things, dashing out of the common road, might easily license me to actions that my natural inclination makes me hate. I will say a prodigious thing, but I will say it however; I find myself, in many things, more curbed and retained by my manners than my opinion, and my concupiscence is less debauched than my reason. Aristippus instituted opinions so bold, in favour of pleasure and riches, as made all the philosophers set at him: but, as to his manners, Dionysius, the tyrant, having presented three beautiful women before him to take his choice, he made answer that he would choose them all, and that it had happened ill to Paris in having preferred one before the other two: but having taken them home to his house, he sent them back untouched.[1] His servant finding himself overloaded upon the way, with the money he carried after him, he ordered him to pour out and throw away that which troubled him.[2] And Epicurus, whose doctrines are so irreligious and effeminate, was, in his life, very laborious and devout: he wrote to a friend of his that he lived only upon biscuit and water, intreating him to send him a little cheese to lie by him against he had a mind to make a feast.[3] Can it be true, that to be a perfect good man we must be so by an occult, natural and universal propriety, without law, reason, or example? The debauchs wherein I have been engaged have not been, I thank God, of the worst sort; and I have thoroughly condemned them myself; for my judgment was never infected by them. On the contrary, I accuse them more severely in myself than in another. But that is all; for, as to the rest, I oppose too little resistance, and suffer myself to incline too much to the other side of the balance, excepting that I moderate them, and prevent them from mixing with other vices which, for the most part, will cling together if a man have not a care. I have contracted and curtailed mine to make them as single as I can:

Nec ultra
Errorem foveo.[4]

"Nor ever beyond this my faults indulge."

For, as to the opinion of the Stoics, who say that the wise man, when he works, works by all the virtues together, though one be most apparent, according to the nature of the action; (and of this the similitude of a human body might serve them to some instance; for the action of anger cannot work but that all the humours must assist, though choler predominate:) if thence they will draw a like consequence, that when the wicked man does wickedly, he does it by all the vices together, I do not believe it to be simply so, or else I understand them not; for I, by effect, find the contrary. These are witty, unsubstantial subtilties, which philosophy sometimes insists upon. I follow some vices, but I fly others as much as a saint would do. The Peripateticks also disown this indissoluble connection; and Aristotle is of opinion that a prudent and just man may be intemperate and lascivious. Socrates confessed to some who had discovered a certain inclination to vice in his physiognomy, that it was, in truth, his natural propensity, but that he had, by discipline, corrected it.[5] And such as were familiar with the philosopher Stilpo said that, being born subject to wine and women, he had, by study, rendered himself very abstinent both from the one and the other.[6]

What I have in me of good, I have, on the contrary, by the chance of my birth; and hold it not either by law, precept, or other apprenticeship. The innocence that is in me is quite simple; little vigour and no art. Amongst other vices I mortally hate cruelty, both by nature and judgment, as the extreme of all vices; and this to such a degree of tender-heartedness that I cannot see a chicken's neck pulled off without trouble, and cannot, without impatience, endure the cry of a hare in my dog's teeth, though the chase be an exciting pleasure. Such as are combatting sensuality willingly make use of this argument, to shew that it is altogether vicious and unreasonable that, when it is at the height, it masters us to that degree that a man's reason can have no access,[7] and they allege our own experience in the act of love

What Montaigne's goodness consisted in.

Atque in eo est Venus, ut muliebria conserat arva;[8]

wherein they conceive that the pleasure doth so transport us that our reason cannot perform its office whilst we are so benumbed and ravished with delight. I know very well it may be otherwise, and that a man may sometimes, if he will, gain this point over himself to sway his soul, even in the critical moment, to think of something else: but then he must firmly incline and ply it to that bent. I know that a man may triumph over the utmost effort of this pleasure: I have experienced it myself, and have not found Venus so imperious a goddess as many, and some more correct than I, declare. I do not consider it as a miracle, as the Queen of Navarre does, in one of the tales of her Heptameron (which is a pretty book of its kind), nor for a thing of extreme difficulty, to pass over whole nights, where a man has all the convenience and liberty he can desire, with a long-coveted mistress, and yet be just to his faith before given, to content himself with kisses and innocent embraces, without pressing any further. I conceive that the example of the pleasure of the chase would be more proper: wherein, though the pleasure be less, yet the ravishment and the surprise are more, by which the reason, being astonished, has not so much leisure to prepare itself for the encounter; when after a long quest the game starts up on a sudden in a place where, perhaps, we least expected: which sudden motion, with the ardour of the shouts and cries of the hunters, so strike us that it would be hard, for such as are lovers of the chase, to turn their thoughts another way: and the poets make

To return to my subject. I am tenderly compassionate of other afflictions, and should readily cry for company if, upon any occasion whatever, I could cry at all. Nothing tempts my tears but tears, and not only those that are real and true, but whatever they are, feigned or real. I do not much pity the dead, and should envy them rather; but I very much pity the dying. The savages do not so much offend me in roasting and eating the bodies of the dead as they do who torment and persecute the living. Nay, I cannot so much as look upon the ordinary executions of justice, how reasonable soever, with a steady eye. Some one having to give testimony of Julius Cæsar's clemency: "He was," says he, "mild and moderate in his vengeance; for, having compelled the pirates to yield, by whom he had before been taken prisoner and put to ransom, forasmuch as they had threatened him with the cross, he indeed condemned them to it, but it was after they were first strangled. He punished his secretary, Philemon, who had attempted to poison him, with no greater severity than simple death." Without naming that Latin author[2] that dares allege for a testimony of clemency the only killing those by whom we have been offended; it is easy to guess that he was struck with the horrid and inhuman examples of cruelty practised by the Roman tyrants.

Julius Cæsar's clemency.

For my part, even in justice itself, all that exceeds mere death appears to me pure cruelty; especially in us, who ought to have that regard to souls to dismiss them in a good and calm condition: which cannot be when we have discomposed them by insufferable torments. Not long since a soldier, who was a prisoner, perceiving from a tower where he was shut up that the people began to assemble in the place of execution, and that the carpenters were busy erecting a scaffold, he presently concluded that the preparation was for him; and therefore entered into a resolution to kill himself, but could find no instrument to assist him in his design, except an old rusty cart-nail, that fortune presented to him: with this he first gave himself two great wounds about his throat; but finding these would not do, he presently after gave himself a third in the belly, where he left the nail sticking up to the head. The first of his keepers that came in found him in this condition, alive, but sunk down and exhausted by his wounds. Therefore, to make use of time before he should die and defeat the law, they made haste to read his sentence, which having done, and he hearing that he was only condemned to be beheaded, he seemed to take new courage, accepted of wine, which he had before refused, and thanked his judges for the unhoped-for mildness of their sentence; saying, "That indeed he had taken a resolution to dispatch himself, for fear of a more severe and insupportable death; having entertained an opinion, by the preparations he had seen in the place, that they were resolved to torment him with some horrible execution:" and seemed to be delivered from death by having it changed from what he apprehended.

The executions of justice ought to be simple, and to carry no marks of severity.

I should advise that these examples of severity, by which 'tis designed to retain the people in their duty, might be exercised upon the dead bodies of criminals; for to see them deprived of sepulture, to see them boiled and divided into quarters, would almost work as much upon the vulgar as the pain they make the living endure: though that, in effect, be little or nothing, as God himself says, "Who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do."[3] And the poets represent the horror of such a sight as far above that of death itself:

> Heu! reliquias semiassi regis, denudatis ossibus,
> Per terram sanie delibutas fœde divexarier.[4]

I happened to come by one day accidentally, at Rome, just as they were upon executing Catena, a notorious robber. He was strangled, without any emotion on the part of the spectators; but when they came to cut him in quarters, the hangman gave not a blow that was not followed by a doleful cry from the people, and an exclamation as if every one had lent his feeling to the miserable carcase. Those inhuman excesses ought to be exercised upon the bark, and not upon the quick. 'Twas thus that Artaxerxes moderated the severity of the ancient laws of Persia, ordering "That the nobility who had failed in their charge, instead of being whipped, as they used to be, should be stripped only, and their clothes whipped for them; and that, whereas they had formerly their hair torn off, they should only take off their high-crowned tiara."[5] The so devout Egyptians thought they sufficiently satisfied the divine justice in sacrificing hogs in effigy and representation:[6] a bold invention to pay God, so essential a substance, in picture only, and in show.

The severe laws of Persia moderated by Artaxerxes.

dible examples of this vice, through the license of our civil wars; and we see nothing in ancient histories more extreme than what we have proof of every day. I could hardly persuade myself, before I saw it with my eyes, that there could be found out men so cruel and fell who, for the sole pleasure of murder, would hack and lop off the limbs of others; sharpen their wits to invent unusual torments and new kinds of deaths, without hatred, without profit, and for no other end but only to enjoy the pleasant spectacle of the gestures and motions, the lamentable groans and cries of a man dying in anguish. For this is the utmost point to which cruelty can arrive, Ut homò hominem, non iratus, non timens, tantum spectaturus, occidat.[1] "That a man should kill a man without being angry, or without fear, only for the pleasure of the spectacle." For my own part I cannot, without pain, see so much as an innocent beast pursued and killed that has no defence, and from whom we have received no offence at all. And that which frequently happens, that the stag we hunt, finding himself weak and out of breath, seeing no other remedy, surrenders himself to us who pursue him, imploring mercy by his tears,

The cruelties exercised in civil wars.

Montaigne's humanity with regard to beasts.

Questuque, cruentus,
Atque imploranti similis,[2]

"With bleeding tears doth mercy seem to crave," has ever been to me a very melancholy sight. I hardly ever take any beast or bird alive that I do not presently turn loose. Pythagoras bought them of huntsmen and fowlers, and fishes of fishermen, to do the same:

Primoque a cæde ferarum
Incaluisse puto maculatum sanguine ferrum.[3]

"I think 'twas slaughter of wild beasts that made Too docile man first learn the killing trade."

Those natures that are sanguinary towards beasts discover a natural propensity to cruelty. After they had accustomed themselves, at Rome, to the spectacle of the slaughter of animals, they proceeded to those of the slaughter of men, of the gladiators. Nature has herself, I fear, imprinted in man a kind of instinct to inhumanity; no body takes pleasure in seeing beasts play and caress one another, but every one is delighted with seeing them dismember and tear one another to pieces. And that I may not be laughed at for the sympathy I have with them, theology itself enjoins us some favour in their behalf: and, considering that one and the same Master has lodged us together in this palace for his service, and that they, as well as we, are of his family, it has reason to enjoin us some affection and regard to them. Pythagoras borrowed the Metempsycosis from the Egyptians, but it has since been received by several nations, and, particularly, by our druids:

Pythagoras's doctrine of the transmutation of souls.

Morte carent animæ; semperque, priore relicta
Sede, novis domibus vivunt, habitantque receptæ.[4]

"Souls never die, but, having left one seat,
Into new mansions they admittance get."

The religion of our ancient Gauls maintained that souls, being eternal, never ceased to remove and shift their places from one body to another; mixing, moreover, with this fancy some consideration of divine justice. For, according to the behaviour of the soul, whilst it had been in Alexander, they said that God ordered it another body to inhabit, more or less painful, and proper for its condition:

Muta ferarum
Cogit vincla pati: truculentos ingerit ursis,
Prædonesque lupis; fallaces vulpibus addit.
* * * * * *
Atque ubi per varios annos, per mille figuras
Egit, Lætheo purgatos flumine, tandem
Rursus ad humanæ revocat primordia formæ:[5]

"The yoke of speechless brutes he made them wear,
Blood-thirsty souls he did inclose in bears;
Those that rapacious were in wolves he shut;
The sly and cunning he in foxes put;
Where after having, in a course of years,
In num'rous forms, quite finish'd their careers,
In Lethe's flood he purged them, and at last
In human bodies he the souls replac'd:"

if it had been valiant, he lodged it in the body of a lion; if voluptuous, in that of a hog; if timorous, in that of a hart or hare; if subtle, in that of a fox; and so of the rest, till, having purified it by this chastisement, it again entered into the body of some other man;

Ipse ego, nam memini, Trojani tempore belli,
Panthoides Euphorbus eram.[6]

"For I, myself, remember, in the days
O' th' Trojan war, that I Euphorbus was."[7]

As to the relation betwixt us and beasts, I do not much admit of it, nor allow what several nations, and those some of the most ancient and most noble, have practised, who have not only received brutes into their society, but have given them a rank infinitely above them; esteeming them one while familiars and favourites of the gods, and having them in more than human reverence and respect; others knowing no other God or Divinity but they. Belluæ à Barbaris propter beneficium consecratæ.[7] "The Barbarians consecrated beasts out of opinion of some benefit received by them:"

Crocodilon adorat
Pars hæc; illa pavet saturam serpentibus Ibin:
Effigies sacri hic nitet aurea Cercopitheci,
* * * * hic piscem fluminis, illic
Oppida tota canem venerantur.[1]

"The serpent-eating ibis these inshrine,
Those think the crocodile alone divine;
There, in another place, you may behold
The statue of a monkey shine with gold;
Here men some monstrous fish's aid implore,
And there whole towns a grinning dog adore."

And the very interpretation that Plutarch gives to this error,[2] which is very well put, is advantageous to them: for, he says, that it was not the cat, or the ox, for example, that the Egyptians adored: but that they, in those beasts, adored some image of the divine faculties; in this patience and utility, in that vivacity, or, like our neighbours, the Burgundians, with the whole of Germany, impatience to see itself shut up; by which they represented the liberty they loved and adored above all other divine faculties, and so of the rest. But when, amongst the more moderate opinions, I meet with arguments that endeavour to demonstrate the near resemblance betwixt us and animals, how much they share in our greatest privileges, and with how great probability they compare us together, in faith, I abate a great deal of our presumption, and willingly resign the title of that imaginary sovereignty that some attribute to us over other creatures.

But supposing all this were not so, there is, nevertheless, a certain respect, and a general duty of humanity, that ties us, not only to beasts that have life and sense, but even to trees and plants. We owe justice to men, and graciousness and benignity to other creatures that are capable of it. There is a certain natural commerce and mutual obligation betwixt them and us; neither shall I be afraid to discover the tenderness of my nature so childish that I cannot well refuse to play with my dog when he, the most unseasonably, importunes me so to do. The Turks have alms and hospitals for beasts. The Romans had public care to the nourishment of geese,[3] by whose vigilancy their Capitol had been preserved. The Athenians made a decree that the mules, which served at the building of the temple, called Hecatompedon, should be free, and suffered to pasture where they would without hindrance.[4] The Agrigentines had a common custom solemnly to inter the beasts they had a kindness for; as horses of some extraordinary qualities, dogs and birds of whom they had had profit, and even those that had only been kept to divert their children: and the magnificency that was common with them in all other things did also particularly appear in the sumptuousness and number of monuments erected to this end, that remained a show for several ages after.[5] The Egyptians buried wolves, bears, crocodiles, dogs, and cats, in sacred places, embalmed their bodies, and put on mourning at their death.[6] Cimon gave an honourable sepulture to the mares with which he had three times gained the prize of the course at the Olympic games.[7] The ancient Xantippus caused his dog to be interred on an eminence near the sea, which has ever since retained the name.[8] And Plutarch says[9] that he made conscience of selling to the slaughter, for a paltry profit, an ox that had been long in his service.

We ought to have some regard for the brute beasts.

CHAPTER XII.

APOLOGY FOR RAIMOND SEBOND.[10]

LEARNING is, indeed, a very great and a very material accomplishment; and those who despise it sufficiently discover their own want of understanding; but yet I do not prize it at the excessive rate that some others do, as Herillus, the philosopher, for one, who therein places the sovereign good, and maintained "That it was only in her to render us wise and contented,"[11] which I do not believe; no more than I do what others have said, that learning is the mother of all virtue, and that all vice proceeds from ignorance, which, if it be true, requires a very long interpretation. My house has long been open to men of knowledge, and is very well known to them; for my father, who governed it fifty years and upwards, inflamed with the new ardour with which Francis the First embraced letters, and brought them into esteem, with great diligence and expense hunted after the acquaintance of learned men, receiving them into his house as persons sacred, and that had some particular inspiration of divine wisdom; collecting their sayings and sentences as so many oracles, and with so much the greater reverence and religion as he was the less able to judge of them; for he had no knowledge of letters any more than his predecessors. For my part I love them well, but I do not adore them. Amongst others, Peter Bunel,[12] a man of great reputation for knowledge in his time, having, with some others of his sort, staid some days at Montaigne in my father's company, he presented him at his departure with a book, entitled Theologia naturalis; sive Liber Creaturarum, magistri Raimondi de Sebonde.[1]

Sebond's work translated by Montaigne.

And as the Italian and Spanish tongues were familiar to my father, and as this book was written in a sort of jargon of Spanish with Latin terminations, he hoped that, with a little help, he might be able to understand it, and therefore recommended it to him for a very useful book, and proper for the time wherein he gave it to him; which was when the novel doctrines of Luther began to be in vogue, and in many places to stagger our ancient belief: wherein he was very well advised, wisely, in his own reason, foreseeing that the beginning of this distemper would easily run into an execrable atheism, for the vulgar, not having the faculty of judging of things, suffering themselves to be carried away by chance and appearance, after having once been inspired with the boldness to despise and controul those opinions which they had before had in extreme reverence, such as those wherein their salvation is concerned, and that some of the articles of their religion are brought into doubt and dispute, they afterwards throw all other parts of their belief into the same uncertainty, they having with them no other authority or foundation than the others they had already discomposed; and shake off all the impressions they had received from the authority of the laws, or the reverence of the ancient customs, as a tyrannical yoke:

> Nam cupide conculcatur nimis ante metutum;[2]
>
> "For with most eagerness they spurn the law,
> By which they were before most kept in awe;"

resolving to admit nothing for the future to which they had not first interposed their own decrees, and given their particular consent.

It happened that my father, a little before his death, having accidentally found this book under a heap of other neglected papers, commanded me to translate it for him into French. It is good to translate such authors as this, where there is little but the matter itself to express; but such wherein grace of language and elegance of style are aimed at, are dangerous to attempt, especially when a man is to turn them into a weaker idiom. It was a strange and a new undertaking for me; but having by chance at that time nothing else to do, and not being able to resist the command of the best father that ever was, I did it as well as I could; and he was so well pleased with it as to order it to be printed, which after his death was done.[3]

What books are proper to translate.

I found the ideas of this author exceeding fine, the contexture of his work well followed, and his design full of piety; and because many people take a delight to read it, and particularly the ladies, to whom we owe the most service, I have often thought to assist them to clear the book of two principal objections made to it. His design is bold and daring, for he undertakes, by human and natural reasons, to establish and make good, against the atheists, all the articles of the Christian religion: wherein, to speak the truth, he is so firm and so successful that I do not think it possible to do better upon that subject; nay, I believe he has been equalled by none. This work seeming to me to be too beautiful and too rich for an author whose name is so little known, and of whom all that we know is that he was a Spaniard, practising physic at Toulouse about two hundred years ago; I enquired of Adrian Turnebus, who knew all things, what he thought of that book; who made answer, "That he thought it was some abstract drawn from St. Thomas d'Aquin; for that, in truth, his mind, so full of infinite erudition and admirable subtlety, was alone capable of such thoughts." Be this as it may, whoever was the author and inventor (and 'tis not reasonable, without greater certainty, to deprive Sebond of that title), he was a man of great judgment and most admirable parts.

The first thing they reprehend in his work is "That Christians are to blame to repose their belief upon human reason, which is only conceived by faith and the particular inspiration of divine grace." In which objection there appears to be something of zeal to piety, and therefore we are to endeavour to satisfy those who put it forth with the greater mildness and respect. This were a task more proper for a man well read in divinity than for me, who know nothing of it; nevertheless, I conceive that in a thing so divine, so high, and so far transcending all human intelligence, as is that truth, with which it has pleased the bounty of God to enlighten us, it is very necessary that he should moreover lend us his assistance, as a very extraordinary favour and privilege, to conceive and imprint it in our understanding. And I do not believe that means purely human are in any sort capable of doing it: for, if they were, so many rare and excellent souls, and so abundantly furnished with natural force, in former ages, could not have failed, by their reason, to arrive at this knowledge. 'Tis faith alone that livelily and certainly comprehends the deep mysteries of Montaigne, in his first edition of the Essays, also states that the first edition of his translation was full of errors of the press, owing to the carelessness of the printer, who had the sole care of it. This translation was reprinted, in 1588, more correctly, Montaigne himself having purged it of the printer's errors. The best edition is that printed at Paris in 1611. There is such a perspicuity, spirit, and natural vivacity in this translation, that it has all the air of an original. Montaigne has added nothing of his own to it but a short dedication of it to his father, which the reader will find at the end of the present volume.

our religion; but, withal, I do not say that it is not a worthy and very laudable attempt to accommodate those natural and human utensils with which God has endowed us to the service of our faith: it is not to be doubted but that it is the most noble use we can put them to; and that there is not a design in a Christian man more noble than to make it the aim and end of all his studies to extend and amplify the truth of his belief. We do not satisfy ourselves with serving God with our souls and understandings only, we moreover owe and render him a corporal reverence, and apply our limbs and motions, and external things to do him honour; we must here do the same, and accompany our faith with all the reason we have, but always with this reservation, not to fancy that it is upon us that it depends, nor that our arguments and endeavours can arrive at so supernatural and divine a knowledge. If it enters not into us by an extraordinary infusion; if it enters not only by reason, but, moreover, by human ways, it is not in us in its true dignity and splendour: and yet, I am afraid, we only have it by this way. If we hold upon God by the mediation of a lively faith; if we hold upon God by him, and not by us; if we had a divine basis and foundation, human occasions would not have the power to shake us as they do; our fortress would not surrender to so weak a battery; the love of novelty, the constraint of princes, the success of one party, and the rash and fortuitous change of our opinions, would not have the power to stagger and alter our belief: we should not then leave it to the mercy of every new argument, nor abandon it to all the rhetoric in the world; we should withstand the fury of these waves with an immovable and unyielding constancy:

The marvellous effects of lively faith.

> Hlisos fluctus rupes ut vasta refundit,
> Et varias circum latrantes dissipat undas
> Mole sua.[1]
>
> "As a great rock repels the rolling tides,
> That foam and bark about her marble sides,
> From its strong bulk."

If we were but touched with this ray of divinity, it would appear throughout; not only our words, but our works also, would carry its brightness and lustre; whatever proceeded from us would be seen illuminated with this noble light. We ought to be ashamed that, in all the human sects, there never was any of the faction, what difficulty and strange novelty soever his doctrine imposed upon him, that did not, in some measure, conform his life and behaviour to it, whereas so divine and heavenly an institution does only distinguish Christians by the name! Will you see the proof of this? Compare our manners to those of a Mahometan or Pagan, you will still find that we fall very short; there where, out of regard to the reputation and advantage of our religion, we ought to shine in excellency at a vast distance beyond all others: and that it should be said of us, "Are they so just, so charitable, so good? Then they are Christians." All other signs are common to all religions; hope, trust, events, ceremonies, penance, martyrs. The peculiar mark of our truth ought to be our virtue, as it is also the most heavenly and difficult, and the most worthy product of truth. For this our good St. Louis was in the right, who, when the Tartar king, who was become Christian, designed to come to Lyons to kiss the Pope's feet, and there to be an eye-witness of the sanctity he hoped to find in our manners, immediately diverted him from his purpose; for fear lest our disorderly way of living should, on the contrary, put him out of conceit with so holy a belief.[2] And yet it happened quite otherwise since to that other, who, going to Rome, to the same end, and there seeing the dissoluteness of the prelates and people of that time, settled himself so much the more firmly in our religion, considering how great the force and divinity of it must necessarily be that could maintain its dignity and splendour among so much corruption, and in so vicious hands. If we had but one single grain of faith, we should remove mountains from their places,[3] saith the sacred Word; our actions, that would then be directed and accompanied by the divinity, would not be merely human, they would have in them something of miraculous, as well as our belief: Brevis est institutio vitæ honestæ beataque, si credas.[4] "Believe, and the way to happiness and virtue is a short one." Some impose upon the world that they believe that which they do not; others, more in number, make themselves believe that they believe, not being able to penetrate into what it is to believe. We think it strange if, in the civil war which, at this time, disorders our state, we see events float and vary after a common and ordinary manner; which is because we bring nothing to it but our own. Justice, which is in one party, is only there for ornament and palliation; it is, indeed, pretended, but 'tis not there received, settled and espoused: it is there, as in the mouth of an advocate, not as in the heart and affection of the party. God owes his extraordinary assistance to faith and religion; not to our passions. Men there are the conductors, and therein serve themselves with religion, whereas it ought to be quite contrary. Observe, if it be not by our own hands that we guide and train it, and draw it like wax into so many con-

> Quæ sese, multis circumlatrantibus undis, trary figures, from a rule in itself so direct and firm. When and where was this more manifest than in France in our days? They who have taken it on the left hand, they who have taken it on the right; they who call it black, they who call it white, alike employ it to their violent and ambitious designs, conduct it with a progress so conform in riot and injustice that they render the diversity they pretended in their opinions, in a thing whereon the conduct and rule of our life depends, doubtful and hard to believe. Did one ever see, come from the same school and discipline, manners more united, and more the same? Do but observe with what horrid impudence we toss divine arguments to and fro, and how irreligiously we have both rejected and retaken them, according as fortune has shifted our places in these intestine storms. This so solemn proposition, "Whether it be lawful for a subject to rebel and take up arms against his prince for the defence of his religion," do you remember in whose mouths, the last year, the affirmative of it was the prop of one party, and the negative the pillar of another? And hearken now from what quarter comes the voice and instruction of the one and the other, and if arms make less noise and rattle for this cause than for that. We condemn those to the fire who say that truth must be made to bear the yoke of our necessity; and how much worse does France than say it?[1] Let us confess the truth; whoever should draw out from the army, even that raised by the king, those who take up arms out of pure zeal to religion, and also those who only do it to protect the laws of their country, or for the service of their prince, could hardly, out of both these put together, make one complete company of gens-d'armes. Whence does this proceed, that there are so few to be found who have maintained the same will and the same progress in our civil commotions, and that we see them one while move but a foot-pace, and another run full speed? and the same men one while damage our affairs by their violent heat and fierceness, and another by their coldness, gentleness, and slowness; but that they are pushed on by particular and casual considerations, according to the variety wherein they move?

Whether it be lawful to take arms against the king in defence of religion?

I evidently perceive that we do not willingly afford devotion any other offices but those that best suit with our own passions. There is no hostility so admirable as the Christian. Our zeal performs wonders, when it seconds our inclinations to hatred, cruelty, ambition, avarice, detraction, and rebellion: but when it moves, against the hair, towards bounty, benignity, and temperance, unless, by miracle, some rare and virtuous disposition prompts us to it, we stir neither hand nor foot. Our religion is intended to extirpate vices, whereas it screens, nourishes, and incites them. We must not mock God. If we believed in him, I do not say by faith, but with a simple belief, that is to say (and I speak it to our great shame) if we believed in him and recognised him as we do any other history, or as we would do one of our companions, we should love him above all other things for the infinite bounty and beauty that shines in him;—at least, he would go equal in our affection with riches, pleasure, glory, and our friends. The best of us is not so much afraid to outrage him as he is afraid to injure his neighbour, his kinsman, or his master. Is there any understanding so weak that, having on one side the object of one of our vicious pleasures, and on the other (in equal knowledge and persuasion) the state of an immortal glory, would change the first for the other? and yet we often renounce this out of mere contempt: for what lust tempts us to blaspheme, if not, perhaps, the very desire to offend. The philosopher Antisthenes, as he was being initiated in the mysteries of Orpheus, the priest telling him, "That those who professed themselves of that religion were certain to receive perfect and eternal felicity after death,"—"If thou believest that," answered he, "why dost thou not die thyself?"[2] Diogenes, more rudely, according to his manner, and more remote from our purpose, to the priest that in like manner preached to him, "To become of his religion, that he might obtain the happiness of the other world;"—"What!" said he, "thou wouldest have me to believe that Agesilaus and Epaminondas, who were so great men, shall be miserable, and that thou, who art but a calf, and canst do nothing to purpose, shalt be happy, because thou art a priest?"[3] Did we receive these great promises of eternal beatitude with the same reverence and respect that we do a philosophical discourse, we should not have death in so great horror:

The zeal of the Christians full of injustice and fury.

Non jam se moriens dissolvi conquereretur;
Sed magis ire foras, vestemque relinquere, ut anguis,
Gauderet, prælonga senex aut cornua cervus.[4]

"We should not on a death-bed grieve to be Dissolved, but rather launch out cheerfully
From our old hut, and, with the snake, be glad
To cast off the corrupted slough we had;
Or with th' old stag rejoice to be now clear
From the large horns, too ponderous grown to bear."

"I desire to be dissolved," we should say, "and to be with Jesus Christ."[5] The force of Plato's arguments concerning the immortality of the soul set some of his disciples to seek a premature grave, that they might the sooner enjoy the things he had made them hope for.[6]

[5] St. Paul, Epist. to Philipp. i. 23.

All this is a most evident sign that we only receive our religion after our own fashion, by our own hands, and no otherwise than as other religions are received. Either we are happened in the country where it is in practice, or we reverence the antiquity of it, or the authority of the men who have maintained it, or fear the menaces it fulminates against misbelievers, or are allured by its promises. These considerations ought, 'tis true, to be applied to our belief but as subsidiaries only, for they are human obligations. Another religion, other witnesses, the like promises and threats, might, by the same way, imprint a quite contrary belief. We are Christians by the same title that we are Perigordians or Germans. And what Plato says,[1] "That there are few men so obstinate in their atheism whom a pressing danger will not reduce to an acknowledgment of the divine power," does not concern a true Christian: 'tis for mortal and human religions to be received by human recommendation. What kind of faith can that be that cowardice and want of courage establish in us? A pleasant faith, that does not believe what it believes but for want of courage to disbelieve it! Can a vicious passion, such as inconstancy and astonishment, cause any regular product in our souls? "They are confident in their judgment," says he,[2] "that what is said of hell and future torments is all feigned: but an occasion of making the experiment presenting itself, when old age or diseases bring them to the brink of the grave, the terror of death, by the horror of that future condition, inspires them with a new belief." And by reason that such impressions render them timorous, he forbids in his Laws[3] all such threatening doctrines, and all persuasion that anything of ill can befall a man from the gods, excepting for his great good when they happen to him, and for a medicinal effect. They say of Bion that, infected with the atheism of Theodorus, he had long had religious men in great scorn and contempt, but that death surprising him, he gave himself up to the most extreme superstition; as if the gods withdrew and returned according to the necessities of Bion.[4] Plato and these examples would conclude that we are brought to a belief of God either by reason or by force. Atheism being a proposition as unnatural as monstrous, difficult also and hard to establish in the human understanding, how arrogant soever, there are men enough seen, out of vanity and pride, to be the authors of extraordinary and reforming opinions, and outwardly to affect the profession of them; who, if they are such fools, have, nevertheless, not the power to plant them in their own conscience. Yet will they not fail to lift up their hands towards heaven if you give them a good thrust with a sword in the breast; and when fear or sickness has abated and dulled the licentious fury of this giddy humour, they will easily re-unite, and very discreetly suffer themselves to be reconciled to the public faith and examples. A doctrine seriously digested is one thing, and those superficial impressions another; which springing from the disorder of an unhinged understanding, float at random and great uncertainty in the fancy. Miserable and senseless men, who strive to be worse than they can!

The foundation of the profession of the Christian religion.

What atheism is.

The error of paganism and the ignorance of our sacred truth, let this great soul of Plato, but great only in human greatness, fall also into this other mistake, "That children and old men were most susceptible of religion," as if it sprung and derived its credit from our weakness. The knot that ought to bind the judgment and the will, that ought to restrain the soul and join it to our creator, should be a knot that derives its foldings and strength not from our considerations, from our reasons and passions, but from a divine and supernatural constraint, having but one form, one face, and one lustre, which is the authority of God and his divine grace. Now the heart and soul being governed and commanded by faith, 'tis but reason that they should muster all our other faculties, according as they are able to perform to the service and assistance of their design. Neither is it to be imagined that all this machine has not some marks imprinted upon it by the hand of the mighty architect, and that there is not in the things of this world some image that in some measure resembles the workman who has built and formed them. He has, in his stupendous works, left the character of his divinity, and 'tis our own weakness only that hinders us from discerning it. 'Tis what he himself is pleased to tell us, "That he manifests his invisible operations to us by those that are visible." Sebond applied himself to this laudable and noble study, and demonstrates to us that there is not any part or member of the world that disclaims or derogates from its maker. It were to do wrong to the divine goodness, did not the universe consent to our belief. The heavens, the earth, the elements, our bodies and our souls,—all things concur to this; we have but to find out the way to use them: they instruct us, if we are capable of instruction. For this world is a sacred temple, into which man is introduced, there to contemplate statues, not the works of a mortal hand, but such as the divine purpose has made the objects of sense; the sun, the stars, the water, and the earth, to represent those that are intelligible to us. "The invisible things of God," says St. Paul,[1] "appear by the creation of the world, his eternal wisdom and divinity being considered by his works."

> Atque adeo faciem cœli non invidet orbi
> Ipse Deus, vultusque suos, corpusque recludit
> Semper volvendo; seque ipsum inculcat, et offert:
> Ut bene cognosci possit, doceatque videndo

> Presents its varied splendour to our view,
> And on our minds himself inculcates, so
> That we th' Almighty mover well may know:
> Instructing us, by seeing him the cause
> Of all, to reverence and obey his laws."

Now our prayers and human discourses are but as sterile and undigested matter. The grace of God is the form; 'tis that which gives fashion and value to it. As the virtuous actions of Socrates and Cato remain vain and fruitless, for not having had the love and obedience of the true creator of all things for their end and object, and for not having known God, so is it with our imaginations and discourses; they have a kind of body, but it is an inform mass, without fashion and without light, if faith and grace be not added thereto. Faith coming to tinct and illustrate Sebond's arguments renders them firm and solid; and to that degree that they are capable of serving for directions, and of being the first guides to an elementary Christian to put him into the way of this knowledge. They in some measure form him to, and render him capable of, the grace of God, by which means he afterwards completes and perfects himself in the true belief. I know a man of authority, bred up to letters, who has confessed to me to have been brought back from the errors of unbelief by Sebond's arguments. And should they be stripped of this ornament, and of the assistance and approbation of the faith, and be looked upon as mere fancies only, to contend with those who are precipitated into the dreadful and horrible darkness of irreligion, they will even there find them as solid and firm as any others of the same quality that can be opposed against them; so that we shall be ready to say to our opponents:

> Si melius quid habes, arcesse; vel imperium fer:[3]
>
> "If you have arguments more fit, > Produce them, or to these submit."

let them admit the force of our reasons, or let them show us others, and upon some other subject, better woven and of finer thread. I am, unawares, half engaged in the second objection, to which I proposed to make answer in the behalf of Sebond. Some say that his arguments are weak, and unable to make good what he intends, and undertake with great ease to confute them. These are to be a little more roughly handled, for they are more dangerous and malicious than the first. Men willingly wrest the sayings of others to favour their own prejudicate opinions. To an atheist all writings tend to atheism: he corrupts the most innocent matter with his own venom. These have their judgments so prepossessed that they cannot relish Sebond's reasons. As to the rest, they think we give them very fair play in putting them into the liberty of combatting our religion with weapons merely human, whom, in her majesty, full of authority and command, they durst not attack. The means that I shall use, and that I think most proper to subdue this frenzy, is to crush and spurn under foot pride and human arrogance; to make them sensible of the inanity, vanity, and vileness of man; to wrest the wretched arms of their reason out of their hands; to make them bow down and bite the ground under the authority and reverence of the Divine Majesty. 'Tis to that alone that knowledge and wisdom appertain; that alone that can make a true estimate of itself, and from which we purloin whatever we value ourselves upon: Οὐ γὰρ ἐᾷ φρονεῖν ὁ Θεὸς μέγα ἄλλον, ἢ ἑαυτόν.[4] "God permits not any being but himself to be truly wise." Let us subdue this presumption, the first foundation of the tyranny of the evil spirit. Deus superbis resistit, humilibus autem dat gratiam.[5] "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble." "Understanding is in the gods," says Plato,[6] "and not at all, or very little, in men." Now it is in the mean time a great consolation to a Christian man to see our frail and mortal parts so fitly suited to our holy and divine faith that, when we employ them to the subjects of their own mortal and frail nature, they are not even there more unitedly or more firmly adjusted. Let us see, then, if man has in his power other more forcible and convincing reasons than those of Sebond; that is to say, if it be in him to arrive at any certainty by argument and reason. For St. Augustin,[7] disputing against these people, has good cause to reproach them with injustice, "In that they maintain the part of our belief to be false that our reason cannot establish." And to show that a great many things may be, and have been, of which our nature could not sound the reason and causes, he proposes to them certain known and undoubted experiments, wherein men confess they see nothing; and this he does, as all other things, with a curious and ingenious inquisition. We must do more than this, and make them know that, to convince the weakness of their reason, there is no necessity of culling out uncommon examples: and that it is so defective and so blind that there is no faculty clear enough for it;

Answer to the charge against Sebond's book, that the arguments are weak.

Wisdom only belongs to the Divinity.

that to it the easy and the hard are all one; that all subjects equally, and nature in general, disclaim its authority and reject its mediation.

What does truth mean when she preaches to us to fly worldly philosophy,[1] when she so often inculcates to us,[2] "That our wisdom is but folly in the sight of God: that the vainest of all vanities is man: that the man who presumes upon his wisdom does not yet know what wisdom is; and that man, who is nothing, if he thinks himself to be anything, does seduce and deceive himself?" These sentences of the Holy Spirit do so clearly and vividly express that which I would maintain that I should need no other proof against men who would with all humility and obedience submit to his authority: but these will be whipped at their own expense, and will not suffer a man to oppose their reason but by itself.

The wisdom of the world folly with God.

Let us then, for once, consider a man alone, without foreign assistance, armed only with his own proper arms, and unfurnished of the divine grace and wisdom, which is all his honour, strength, and the foundation of his being. Let us see how he stands in this fine equipage. Let him make me understand, by the force of his reason, upon what foundations he has built those great advantages he thinks he has over other creatures. Who has made him believe that this admirable motion of the celestial arch, the eternal light of those luminaries that roll so high over his head, the wondrous and fearful motions of that infinite ocean, should be established and continue so many ages for his service and convenience? Can any thing be imagined so ridiculous, that this miserable and wretched creature, who is not so much as master of himself, but subject to the injuries of all things, should call himself master and emperor of the world, of which he has not power to know the least part, much less to command the whole? And the privilege which he attributes to himself of being the only creature in this vast fabric who has the understanding to discover the beauty and the parts of it; the only one who can return thanks to the architect, and keep account of the revenues and disbursements of the world; who, I wonder, sealed him this patent? Let us see his commission for this great employment. Was it granted in favour of the wise only? Few people will be concerned in it. Are fools and wicked persons worthy so extraordinary a favour, and, being the worst part of the world,[3] to be preferred before the rest? Shall we believe this man?—Quorum igitur causa quis dixerit effectum esse mundum? Eorum scilicet animantium, quæ ratione utuntur; hi sunt dii et homines, quibus profecto nihil est melius: "For whose sake shall we, therefore, conclude that the world was made? For theirs who have the use of reason: these are gods and men, than whom certainly nothing can be better:" we can never sufficiently decry the impudence of this conjunction. But, wretched creature, what has he in himself worthy of such an advantage? Considering the incorruptible existence of the celestial bodies, their beauty, magnitude, and continual revolution by so exact a rule;

> Cum suspicimus magni cælestia mundi
> Templa super, stellisque micantibus æthera fixum,
> Et venit in mentem lunæ solisque viarum;[4]
>
> "When we the heavenly arch above behold,
> And the vast sky adorned with stars of gold,
> And mark the reg'lar courses that the sun
> And moon in their alternate progress run;"

considering the dominion and influence those bodies have, not only over our lives and fortunes;

> Facta etenim et vitas hominum suspendit ab astris;[5]
>
> "Men's lives and actions on the stars depend;"

but even over our inclinations, our thoughts and wills, which they govern, incite and agitate at the mercy of their influences, as our reason teaches us;

> Speculataque longe
> Deprendit tacitis dominantia legibus astra,
> Et totum alterna mundum ratione moveri,
> Fatorumque vices certis discurrere signis;[6]
>
> "Contemplating the stars he finds that they
> Rule by a secret and a silent sway;
> And that the enamell'd spheres which roll above
> Do ever by alternate causes move.
> And, studying these, he also can foresee,
> By certain signs, the turns of destiny;"

seeing that not only a man, not only kings, but that monarchies, empires, and all this lower world follow the influence of the celestial motions,

> Quantaque quam parvi faciant discrimina motus * * *
> Tantum est hoc regnum, quod regibus imperat ipsis![7]
>
> "How great a change a little motion brings!
> So great this kingdom is that governs kings:"

if our virtue, our vices, our knowledge, and this very discourse we are upon of the power of the stars, and the comparison we are making betwixt them and us, proceed, as our reason supposes, from their favour;

> Furit alter amore,
> Et pontum tranare potest, et vertere Trojam:
> Alterius sors est scribendis legibus apta.
> Ecce patrem nati perimunt, natosque parentes;
> Mutuaque armati coeunt in vulnere fratres.
> Non nostrum hoc bellum est; coguntur tanta movere,
> Inque suas ferri pœnas, laceranda que membra.
> * * * * * * * *
> Hoc quoque fatale est, sic ipsum expendere fatum;[8]
>
> "One mad in love may cross the raging main,
> To level lofty Ilium with the plain;
> Another's fate inclines him more by far
> To study laws and statutes for the bar.

Sons kill their fathers, fathers kill their sons,
And one arm'd brother 'gainst another runs.
This war's not their's, but fate's, that spurs them on
To shed the blood which, shed, they must bemoan;
And I ascribe it to the will of fate
That on this theme I now expatiate:

if we derive this little portion of reason we have from the bounty of heaven, how is it possible that reason should ever make us equal to it? How subject its essence and condition to our knowledge? Whatever we see in those bodies astonishes us: Quæ molitio, quæ ferramenta, qui vectes, quæ machinæ, qui ministri tanti operis fuerunt?[1] "What contrivance, what tools, what materials, what engines, were employed about so stupendous a work?" Why do we deprive them of soul, of life, and discourse? Have we discovered in them any immoveable or insensible stupidity, we who have no commerce with them but by obedience? Shall we say that we have discovered in no other creature but man the use of a reasonable soul? What! have we seen any thing like the sun? Does he cease to be, because we have seen nothing like him? And do his motions cease, because there are no other like them? If what we have not seen is not, our knowledge is marvellously contracted: Quæ sunt tantæ animi angustiæ![2] "How narrow are our understandings!" Are they not dreams of human vanity, to make the moon a celestial earth? there to fancy mountains and vales, as Anaxagoras did? there to fix habitations and human abodes, and plant colonies for our convenience, as Plato and Plutarch have done? And of our earth to make a luminous and resplendent star? Inter cætera mortalitatis incommoda, et hoc est, caligo mentium; nec tantum necessitas errandi, sed errorum amor.[3] — Corruptibile corpus aggravat animam, et deprimit terrena inhabitatio sensum multa cogitantem.[4] "Amongst the other inconveniences of mortality this is one, that darkness of the understanding which leads men astray, not so much from a necessity of erring, but from a love of error. The corruptible body stupifies the soul, and the earthly habitation dulls the faculties of the imagination."

Presumption an infirmity natural to man.

Presumption is our natural and original disease. The most wretched and frail of all creatures is man, and withal the proudest. He feels and sees himself lodged here in the dirt and filth of the world, nailed and rivetted to the worst and deadest part of the universe, in the lowest story of the house, the most remote from the heavenly arch, with animals of the worst condition of the three; and yet in his imagination will be placing himself above the circle of the moon, and bringing the heavens under his feet. 'Tis by the same vanity of imagination that he equals himself to God, attributes to himself divine qualities, withdraws and separates himself from the crowd of other creatures, cuts out the shares of the animals, his fellows and companions, and distributes to them portions of faculties and force, as himself thinks fit. How does he know, by the strength of his understanding, the secret and internal motions of animals?—from what comparison betwixt them and us does he conclude the stupidity he attributes to them? When I play with my cat who knows whether I do not make her more sport than she makes me? We mutually divert one another with our play. If I have my hour to begin or to refuse, she also has hers. Plato, in his picture of the golden age under Saturn,[5] reckons, among the chief advantages that a man then had, his communication with beasts, of whom, inquiring and informing himself, he knew the true qualities and differences of them all, by which he acquired a very perfect intelligence and prudence, and led his life more happily than we could do. Need we a better proof to condemn human impudence in the concern of beasts? This great author was of opinion that nature, for the most part, in the corporal form she gave them, had only regard to the use of prognostics that were derived thence in his time. The defect that hinders communication betwixt them and us, why may it not be in our part as well as theirs? 'Tis yet to determine where the fault lies that we understand not one another,—for we understand them no more than they do us; and by the same reason they may think us to be beasts as we think them. 'Tis no great wonder if we understand not them, when we do not understand a Basque or a Troglodyte.[6] And yet some have boasted that they understood them, as Apollonius Tyanæus,[7] Melampus, Tiresias, Thales, and others. And seeing, as cosmographers report, that there are nations that have a dog for their king,[8] they must of necessity be able to interpret his voice and motions. We must observe the parity betwixt us: we have some tolerable apprehension of their meaning, and so have beasts of ours,—much about the same. They caress us, threaten us, and beg of us, and we do the same to them.

By what right he claims the superiority over the animals.

Communication of beasts amongst themselves.

As to the rest, we manifestly discover that they have a full and absolute communication amongst themselves, and that they perfectly understand one another, not only those of the same, but of divers kinds:

Et mutæ pecudes, et denique secla ferarum
Dissimiles solerant voces variasque ciere,
Cum metus aut dolor est, aut cum jam gaudia gliscunt.[9]

"The tamer herds, and wilder sort of brutes,
Though we of higher race conclude them mutes,
Yet utter dissonant and various notes,
From gentler lungs or more distended throats,
As fear, or grief, or anger, do them move,
Or as they do approach the joys of love."

In one kind of barking of a dog the horse knows there is anger, of another sort of bark he is not afraid. Even in the very beasts that have no voice at all, we easily conclude, from the society of offices we observe amongst them, some other sort of communication: their very motions discover it:

Non alia longè ratione, atque ipse videtur
Protrahere ad gestum pueros infantia linguæ.[1]

"As infants who, for want of words, devise Expressive motions with their hands and eyes."

And why not, as well as our dumb people, dispute, argue, and tell stories by signs? Of whom I have seen some, by practice, so clever and active that way that, in fact, they wanted nothing of the perfection of making themselves understood. Lovers are angry, reconciled, intreat, thank, appoint, and, in short, speak all things by their eyes:

E'l silenzio ancor suole
Haver prieghi e parole.[2]

"Even silence in a lover
Love and passion can discover."

What with the hands? We require, promise, call, dismiss, threaten, pray, supplicate, deny, refuse, interrogate, admire, number, confess, repent, fear, express confusion, doubt, instruct, command, incite, encourage, swear, testify, accuse, condemn, absolve, abuse, despise, defy, provoke, flatter, applaud, bless, submit, mock, reconcile, recommend, exalt, entertain, congratulate, complain, grieve, despair, wonder, exclaim, and what not! And all this with a variety and multiplication, even emulating speech. With the head we invite, remand, confess, deny, give the lie, welcome, honour, reverence, disdain, demand, rejoice, lament, reject, caress, rebuke, submit, huff, encourage, threaten, assure, and inquire. What with the eyebrows?—what with the shoulders? There is not a motion that does not speak, and in an intelligible language without discipline, and a public language that every one understands: whence it should follow, the variety and use distinguished from others considered, that these should rather be judged the property of human nature. I omit what necessity particularly does suddenly suggest to those who are in need;—the alphabets upon the fingers, grammars in gesture, and the sciences which are only by them exercised and expressed; and the nations that Pliny reports have no other language.[3] An ambassador of the city of Abdera, after a long conference with Agis, King of Sparta, demanded of him, "Well, sir, what answer must I return to my fellow-citizens?" "That I have given thee leave," said he, "to say what thou wouldest, and as much as thou wouldest, without ever speaking a word."[4] Is not this a silent speaking, and very easy to be understood?

As to the rest, what is there in us that we do not see in the operations of animals? Is there a polity better ordered, the offices better distributed, and more inviolably observed and maintained, than that of bees? Can we imagine that such, and so regular, a distribution of employments can be carried on without reasoning and deliberation?

The capacity which is observed in the behaviour of the brute part of the creation.

His quidam signis atque hæc exempla sequuti,
Esse apibus partem divinæ mentis, et haustus
Æthereos, dixere.[5]

"Hence to the bee some sages have assigned
Some portion of the god and heavenly mind."

The swallows that we see at the return of the spring, searching all the corners of our houses for the most commodious places wherein to build their nest; do they seek without judgment, and amongst a thousand choose out the most proper for their purpose, without discretion? And in that elegant and admirable contexture of their buildings, can birds rather make choice of a square figure than a round, of an obtuse than of a right angle, without knowing their properties and effects? Do they bring water, and then clay, without knowing that the hardness of the latter grows softer by being wetted? Do they mat their palace with moss or down without foreseeing that their tender young will lie more safe and easy? Do they secure themselves from the wet and rainy winds, and place their lodgings against the east, without knowing the different qualities of the winds, and considering that one is more wholesome than another? Why does the spider make her web tighter in one place, and slacker in another; why now make one sort of knot, and then another, if she has not deliberation, thought, and conclusion? We sufficiently discover in most of their works how much animals excel us, and how unable our art is to imitate them. We see, nevertheless, in our rougher performances, that we employ all our faculties, and apply the utmost power of our souls; why do we not conclude the same of them? Why should we attribute to I know not what natural and servile inclination the works that excel all we can do by nature and art? wherein, without being aware, we give them a mighty advantage over us in making nature, with maternal gentleness and love, accompany and lead them, as it were, by the hand to all the actions and commodities of their life, whilst she leaves us to chance and fortune, and to seek out by art the things that are necessary to our conservation, at the same time denying us the means of being able, by any instruction or effort of understanding, to arrive at the natural sufficiency of beasts; so that their brutish stupidity surpasses, in all conveniences, all that our divine intelligence can do. Really, at this rate, we might with great reason call her an unjust stepmother: but it is nothing so, our polity is not so irregular and unformed.

The superiority of nature to art, an inference which Montaigne draws from this principle in favour of the beasts against men.

Nature has universally cared for all her creatures, and there is not one she has not amply furnished with all means necessary for the conservation of its being. For the common complaints I hear men make (as the license of their opinions one while lifts them up above the clouds, and then again depresses them to the antipodes), that we are the only animal abandoned naked upon the bare earth, tied and bound, not having wherewithal to arm and clothe us but by the spoil of others; whereas nature has covered all other creatures either with shells, husks, bark, hair, wool, prickles, leather, down, feathers, scales, or silk, according to the necessities of their being; has armed them with talons, teeth, or horns, wherewith to assault and defend, and has herself taught them that which is most proper for them, to swim, to run, to fly, and sing, whereas man neither knows how to walk, speak, eat, or do any thing but weep, without teaching;

> Tum porro puer, ut sævis projectus ab undis,
> Navita, nudus humi jacet, infans, indignus omni
> Vitali auxilio, cùm primùm in luminis oras
> Nixibus ex alvo matris natura profudit,
> Vagitusque locum lugubri complet; ut æquum est,
> Cui tantùm in vita restet transire malorum.
> At variæ crescunt pecudes, armenta, feræque,
> Nec crepitacula eis opus est, nec cuiquam adhibenda est
> Almæ nutricis blanda atque infracta loquela;
> Nec varias quærunt vestes pro tempore cœli;
> Denique non armis opus est, non mœnibus altis,
> Queis sua tutentur, quando omnibus omnia largè
> Tellus ipsa parit, naturaque dædala rerum:[1]

> "Like to the wretched mariner, when toss'd
> By raging seas upon the desert coast,
> The tender babe lies naked on the earth,
> Of all supports of life stript by his birth;
> When nature first presents him to the day,
> Freed from the cell wherein before he lay,
> He fills the ambient air with doleful cries,
> Foretelling thus life's future miseries;
> But beasts, both wild and tame, greater and less,
> Do of themselves in strength and bulk increase;
> They need no rattle, nor the broken chat,
> By which the nurse first teaches boys to prate;
> They look not out for different robes to wear,
> According to the seasons of the year;
> And need no arms nor walls their goods to save,
> Since earth and liberal nature ever have,
> And will, in all abundance, still produce
> All things whereof they can have need or use:"

these complaints are false; there is in the polity of the world a greater equality and more uniform relation. Our skins are as sufficient to defend us from the injuries of the weather as theirs are; witness several nations that yet know not the use of clothes. Our ancient Gauls were but slenderly clad, any more than the Irish, our neighbours, though in so cold a climate; but we may better judge of this by ourselves: for all those parts that we are pleased to expose to the air are found very able to endure it: the face, the feet, the hands, the arms, the head, according to the various habit; if there be a tender part about us, and that would seem to be in danger from cold, it should be the stomach where the digestion is; and yet our forefathers were there always open, and our ladies, as tender and delicate as they are, go sometimes half-bare as low as the navel. Neither is the binding or swathing of infants any more necessary; and the Lacedæmonian mothers brought up theirs in all liberty of motion of members, without any ligature at all.[2] Our crying is common with the greatest part of other animals, and there are but few creatures that are not observed to groan, and bemoan themselves a long time after they come into the world; forasmuch as it is a behaviour suitable to the weakness wherein they find themselves. As to the custom of eating, it is in us, as in them, natural, and without instruction;

The skin of a man sufficient proof against weather.

The swathing of infants not necessary.

> Sentit enim vim quisque suam quam possit abuti:[3]

> "For every one soon finds his natural force,
> Which he, or better may employ, or worse."

Who doubts but an infant, arrived to the strength of feeding himself, may make shift to find something to eat. And the earth produces and offers him wherewithal to supply his necessity, without other culture and artifice; and if not at all times, no more does she do it to beasts, witness the provision we see ants and other creatures hoard up against the dead seasons of the year. The late discovered nations, so abundantly furnished with natural meat and drink, without care, or without cookery, may give us to understand that bread is not our only food, and that, without tillage, our mother nature has provided us sufficiently of all we stand in need of: nay, it appears more fully and plentifully than she does at present, now that we have added our own industry:

> Et tellus nitidas fruges, vinetaque læta
> Sponte sua primum mortalibus ipsa creavit;
> Ipsa dedit dulces fœtus, et pabula læta;
> Quæ nunc vix nostro grandescunt aucta labore,
> Conterimusque boves, et vires agricolarum:[4]

> "The earth did first spontaneously afford
> Choice fruits and wines to furnish out the board;
> With herbs and flow'rs unsown in verdant fields,
> But scarce by art so good a harvest yields;
> Though men and oxen mutually have strove,
> With all their utmost force, the soil t' improve:"

the debauchery and irregularity of our appetites outstrips all the inventions we can contrive to satisfy it.

The natural arms of men.

As to arms, we have more natural ones than most other animals, more various motions of limbs, and naturally and without lesson extract more service from them. Those that are trained to fight naked are seen to throw themselves into the like hazards that we do. If some beasts surpass us in this advantage, we surpass many others. And the industry of fortifying the body, and covering it by acquired means, we have by instinct and natural precept. That it is so, the elephant shows, who sharpens and whets the teeth he makes use of in war (for he has particular ones for that service, which he spares, and never employs them at all to any other use); when bulls go to fight, they toss and throw the dust about them; boars whet their tusks; and the ichneumon, when he is about to engage with the crocodile, fortifies his body, and covers and crusts it all over with close-wrought and well-tempered slime, as with a cuirass. Why shall we not say that it is also natural for us to arm ourselves with wood and iron?

The elephant's teeth.

Whether speech is natural to man.

As to speech, it is certain that if it be not natural it is not necessary. Nevertheless I believe that a child which had been brought up in an absolute solitude, remote from all society of men (which would be an experiment very hard to make), would have some kind of speech to express his meaning by. And 'tis not to be supposed that nature should have denied that to us which she has given to several other animals: for what is this faculty we observe in them, of complaining, rejoicing, calling to one another for succour, and inviting each other to love, which they do with the voice, other than speech? And why should they not speak to one another? They speak to us, and we to them. In how many several sorts of ways do we speak to our dogs, and they answer us? We converse with them in another sort of language, and use other appellations, than we do with birds, hogs, oxen, horses, and alter the idiom according to the kind.

The beasts have a language of their own.

> Cosi per entro loro schiera bruna
> S' ammussa l' una con l' altra formica,
> Forse a spiar lor via et lor fortuna.[1]
>
> "Thus from one swarm of ants some sally out,
> To spy another's stock or mark its rout."

Lactantius[2] seems to attribute to beasts not only speech, but laughter also. And the difference of language which is seen amongst us, according to the difference of countries, is also observed in animals of the same kind. Aristotle,[3] in proof of this, instances the various calls of partridges, according to the situation of places:

Risibility attributed to beasts.

> Variæque volucres
> Longè alias alio jaciunt in tempore voces . . . .
> Et partim mutant cum tempestatibus una > Raucisonos cantus.[4]
>
> "And various birds do from their warbling throats,
> At various times, utter quite different notes,
> And some their hoarse songs with the seasons change."

But it is yet to be known what language this child would speak; and of that what is said by guess has no great appearance. If a man will allege to me, in opposition to this opinion, that those who are naturally deaf speak not, I answer that this is not only because they could not receive the instruction of speaking by ear, but rather because the sense of hearing, of which they are deprived, relates to that of speaking, and that these hold together by a natural and inseparable tie, in such manner that what we speak we must first speak to ourselves within, and make it sound in our own ears, before we can utter it to others.

Why those who are born deaf do not speak.

All this I have said to prove the resemblance there is in human things, and to bring us back and join us to the crowd. We are neither above nor below the rest. All that is under heaven, says the sage, runs one law and one fortune:

> Indupedita suis fatalibus omnia vinclis.[5]
>
> "All things remain
> Bound and entangled in one fatal chain."

There is, indeed, some difference,—there are several orders and degrees; but it is under the aspect of one and the same nature:

> Res . . . . quæque suo ritu procedit; et omnes
> Fœdere naturæ certo discrimina servant.[6]
>
> "All things by their own rites proceed, and draw > Towards their ends, by nature's certain law."

Man must be compelled and restrained within the bounds of this polity. Miserable creature! he is not in a condition really to step over the rail. He is fettered and circumscribed, he is subjected to the same necessity that the other creatures of his rank and order are, and of a very mean condition, without any prerogative or true and real pre-eminence. That which he attributes to himself, by vain fancy and opinion, has neither body nor taste. And if it be so, that he only, of all the animals, has this liberty of imagination and irregularity of thoughts, representing to him that which is, that which is not, and that he would have, the false and the true, 'tis an advantage dearly bought, and of which he has very little reason to be proud; for thence springs the principal and original fountain of all the evils that befal him,—sin, sickness, irresolution, affliction, despair. I say, then, to return to my subject, that there is no appearance to induce a man to believe that beasts should, by a natural and forced inclination, do the same things that we do by our choice and industry. We ought from like effects to conclude like faculties, and from greater effects greater faculties; and consequently confess that the same reasoning, and the same ways by which we operate, are common with them, or that they have others that are better. Why should we imagine this natural constraint in them, who experience no such effect in ourselves? added that it is more honourable to be guided and obliged to act regularly by a natural and inevitable condition, and nearer allied to the divinity, than to act regularly by a temerarious and fortuitous liberty, and more safe to entrust the reins of our conduct in the hands of nature than our own. The vanity of our presumption makes us prefer rather to owe our sufficiency to our own exertions than to her bounty, and to enrich the other animals with natural goods, and abjure them in their favour, in order to honour and ennoble ourselves with goods acquired, very foolishly in my opinion; for I should as much value parts and virtues naturally and purely my own as those I had begged and obtained from education. It is not in our power to obtain a nobler reputation than to be favoured of God and nature.

Animals free agents as well as mankind.

For instance, take the fox, the people of Thrace make use of when they wish to pass over the ice of some frozen river, and turn him out before them to that purpose; when we see him lay his ear upon the bank of the river, down to the ice, to listen if from a more remote or nearer distance he can hear the noise of the waters' current, and, according as he finds by that the ice to be of a less or greater thickness, to retire or advance,[1]—have we not reason to believe thence that the same rational thoughts passed through his head that we should have upon the like occasions; and that it is a ratiocination and consequence, drawn from natural sense, that that which makes a noise runs, that which runs is not frozen, what is not frozen is liquid, and that which is liquid yields to impression? For to attribute this to a mere quickness of the sense of hearing, without reason and consequence, is a chimæra that cannot enter into the imagination. We are to suppose the same of the many sorts of subtleties and inventions with which beasts secure themselves from, and frustrate, the enterprizes we plot against them.

And if we will make an advantage even of this, that it is in our power to seize them, to employ them in our service, and to use them at our pleasure, 'tis still but the same advantage we have over one another. We have our slaves upon these terms: the Climacidæ, were they not women in Syria who, squat on all fours,[2] served for a ladder or footstool, by which the ladies mounted their coaches? And the greatest part of free persons surrender, for very trivial conveniences, their life and being into the power of another. The wives and concubines of the Thracians contended who should be chosen to be slain upon their husband's tomb.[3] Have tyrants ever failed of finding men enough vowed to their devotion? some of them moreover adding this necessity, of accompanying them in death as well as life? Whole armies have bound themselves after this manner to their captains.[4] The form of the oath in the rude school of gladiators was in these words: "We swear to suffer ourselves to be chained, burnt, wounded, and killed with the sword, and to endure all that true gladiators suffer from their master, religiously engaging both body and soul in his service:"[5]

Men slaves to other men as well as the brutes are.

> Ure meum, si vis, flamma caput, et pete ferro
> Corpus, et intorto verbere terga seca.[3]
>
> "Wound me with steel, or burn my head with fire,
> Or scourge my shoulders with well-twisted wire."

This was an obligation indeed, and yet there, in one year, ten thousand entered into it, to their destruction. When the Scythians interred their king they strangled upon his body the most beloved of his concubines, his cup-bearer, the master of his horse, his chamberlain, the usher of his chamber, and his cook. And upon the anniversary thereof they killed fifty horses, mounted by fifty pages, that they had impaled all up the spine of the back to the throat, and there left them fixed in triumph about his tomb.[7] The men that serve us do it cheaper, and for a less careful and favourable usage than what we treat our hawks, horses, and dogs withal. To what solicitude do we not submit for the convenience of these? I do not think that servants of the most abject condition would willingly do that for their masters that princes think it an honour to do for their beasts. Diogenes seeing his relations solicitous to redeem him from servitude: "They are fools," said he; "'tis he that keeps and nourishes me that in reality serves me."[8] And they who entertain beasts ought rather to be said to serve them, than to be served by them. And withal in this these have something more generous, in that one lion never submitted to another lion, nor one horse to another, for want of courage. As we go to the chase of beasts, so do tigers and lions to the chase of men, and do the same execution upon one another; dogs upon hares, pikes upon tench, swallows upon grass-hoppers, and sparrow-hawks upon blackbirds and larks:

Serpente ciconia pullos

Et leporem aut capream famulæ Jovis et generosæ

And pathless wilds supports her callow brood,
While Jove's own eagle, bird of noble blood,
Scours the wide country for undaunted food;
Sweeps the swift hare or swifter fawn away,
And feeds her nestlings with the generous prey."

We divide the quarry, as well as the pains and labour of the chase, with our hawks and hounds. And about Amphipolis, in Thrace, the hawkers and wild falcons equally divide the prey in the half.[2] As also along the lake Mæotis, if the fisherman does not honestly leave the wolves an equal share of what he has caught, they presently go and tear his nets in pieces. And as we have a way of sporting that is carried on more by subtlety than force, as springing hares, and angling with line and hook, there is also the like amongst other animals. Aristotle says[3] that the cuttle-fish casts a gut out of her throat as long as a line, which she extends and draws back at pleasure; and as she perceives some little fish approach her she lets it nibble upon the end of this gut, lying herself concealed in the sand or mud, and by little and little draws it in, till the little fish is so near her that at one spring she may catch it.

The strength of man inferior to that of animals.

As to strength, there is no creature in the world exposed to so many injuries as man. We need not a whale, an elephant, or a crocodile, nor any such-like animals, of which one alone is sufficient to dispatch a great number of men, to do our business; lice are sufficient to vacate Sylla's dictatorship;[4] and the heart and life of a great and triumphant emperor is the breakfast of a little contemptible worm!

Beasts distinguish what may be of use to them in their maladies.

Why should we say that it is only for man, by knowledge built up by art and meditation, to distinguish the things useful for his being, and proper for the cure of his diseases, and those which are not; to know the virtues of rhubarb and polypody. When we see the goats of Candia, when wounded with an arrow, among a million of plants choose out dittany for their cure; and the tortoise, when she has eaten a viper, immediately go out to look for origanum to purge her; the dragon to rub and clear his eyes with fennel; the storks to give themselves clysters of sea-water; the elephants to draw not only out of their own bodies, and those of their companions, but out of the bodies of their masters too (witness the elephant of King Porus,[5] whom Alexander defeated), the darts and javelins thrown at them in battle, and that so dexterously that we ourselves could not do it with so little pain to the patient;—why do we not say here also that this is knowledge and reason? For to allege, to their disparagement, that 'tis by the sole instruction and dictate of nature that they know all this, is not to take from them the dignity of knowledge and reason, but with greater force to attribute it to them than to us, for the honour of so infallible a mistress. Chrysippus,[6] though in other things as scornful a judge of the condition of animals as any other philosopher whatever, considering the motions of a dog, who coming to a place where three ways met, either to hunt after his master he has lost, or in pursuit of some game that flies before him, goes snuffing first in one of the ways, and then in another, and, after having made himself sure of two, without finding the trace of what he seeks, dashes into the third without examination, is forced to confess that this reasoning is in the dog: "I have traced my master to this place; he must of necessity be gone one of these three ways; he is not gone this way nor that, he must then infallibly be gone this other;" and that assuring himself by this conclusion, he makes no use of his nose in the third way, nor ever lays it to the ground, but suffers himself to be carried on there by the force of reason. This sally, purely logical, and this use of propositions divided and conjoined, and the right enumeration of parts, is it not every whit as good that the dog knows all this of himself as well as from Trapezuntius?[7]

Animals capable of being instructed.

Animals are not incapable, however, of being instructed after our method. We teach blackbirds, ravens, pies, and parrots, to speak; and the facility wherewith we see they lend us their voices, and render both them and their breath so supple and pliant, to be formed and confined within a certain number of letters and syllables, does evince that they have a reason within, which renders them so docile and willing to learn. Everybody, I believe, is glutted with the several sorts of tricks that tumblers teach their dogs; the dances, where they do not miss any one cadence of the sound they hear; the several various motions and leaps they make them perform by the command of a word. But I observe this effect with the greatest admiration, which nevertheless is very common, in the dogs that lead the blind, both in the country and in cities: I have taken notice how they stop at certain doors, where they are wont to receive alms; how they avoid the encounter of coaches and carts, even there where they have sufficient room to pass; I have seen them, by the trench of a town, forsake a plain and even path and take a worse, only to keep their masters further from the ditch;—how could a man have made this dog understand that it was his office to look to his master's safety only, and to despise his own conveniency to serve him? And how had he the knowledge that a way was wide enough for him that was not so for a blind man? Can all this be apprehended without ratiocination?

I must not omit what Plutarch says[1] he saw of a dog at Rome with the Emperor Vespasian, the father, at the theatre of Marcellus. This dog served a player, that played a farce of several parts and personages, and had therein his part. He had, amongst other things, to counterfeit himself for some time dead, by reason of a certain drug he was supposed to eat. After he had swallowed a piece of bread, which passed for the drug, he began after awhile to tremble and stagger, as if he was taken giddy: at last, stretching himself out stiff, as if dead, he suffered himself to be drawn and dragged from place to place, as it was his part to do; and afterward, when he knew it to be time, he began first gently to stir, as if awaking out of a profound sleep, and lifting up his head looked about him after such a manner as astonished all the spectators.

The oxen that served in the royal gardens of Susa, to water them, and turn certain great wheels to draw water for that purpose, to which buckets were fastened (such as there are many in Languedoc), being ordered every one to draw a hundred turns a day, they were so accustomed to this number that it was impossible by any force to make them draw one turn more; but, their task being performed, they would suddenly stop and stand still.[2] We are almost men before we can count a hundred, and have lately discovered nations that have no knowledge of numbers at all.

There is more understanding required in the teaching of others than in being taught. Now, setting aside what Democritus held[3] and proved, "That most of the arts we have were taught us by other animals," as by the spider to weave and sew; by the swallow to build; by the swan and nightingale music; and by several animals to make medicines:—Aristotle is of opinion[4] "That the nightingales teach their young ones to sing, and spend a great deal of time and care in it;" whence it happens that those we bring up in cages, and which have not had the time to learn of their parents, want much of the grace of their singing: we may judge by this that they improve by discipline and study; and, even amongst the wild, it is not all and every one alike—every one has learnt to do better or worse, according to their capacity. And so jealous are they one of another, whilst learning, that they contend with emulation, and by so vigorous a contention that sometimes the vanquished fall dead upon the place, the breath rather failing than the voice. The younger ruminate pensively and begin to mutter some broken notes; the disciple listens to the master's lesson, and gives the best account he is able; they are silent by turns; one may hear faults corrected and observe some reprehensions of the teacher. "I have formerly seen," says Arrian,[5] "an elephant having a cymbal hung at each leg, and another fastened to his trunk, at the sound of which all the others danced round about him, rising and bending at certain cadences, as they were guided by the instrument; and 'twas delightful to hear this harmony." In the spectacles of Rome there were ordinarily seen elephants taught to move and dance to the sound of the voice, dances wherein were several changes and cadences very hard to learn.[6] And some have been known so intent upon their lesson as privately to practice it by themselves, that they might not be chidden nor beaten by their masters.

But this other story of the pie, of which we have Plutarch himself for a warrant,[7] is very strange. She lived in a barber's shop at Rome, and did wonders in imitating with her voice whatever she heard. It happened one day that certain trumpeters stood a good while sounding before the shop. After that, and all the next day, the pie was pensive, dumb, and melancholic; which every body wondered at, and thought the noise of the trumpets had so stupified and astonished her that her voice was gone with her hearing. But they found at last that it was a profound meditation and a retiring into herself, her thoughts exercising and preparing her voice to imitate the sound of those trumpets, so that the first voice she uttered was perfectly to imitate their strains, stops, and changes; having by this new lesson quitted and taken in disdain all she had learned before.

I will not omit this other example of a dog, also, which the same Plutarch (I am sadly confounding all order, but I do not propose arrangement here any more than elsewhere throughout my book) which Plutarch says he saw on board a ship. This dog being puzzled how to get the oil that was in the bottom of a jar, which he could not reach with his tongue by reason of the narrow mouth of the vessel, went and fetched stones and let them fall into the jar till he made the oil rise so high that he could reach it. What is this but an effect of a very subtle capacity? 'Tis said that the ravens of Barbary do the same, when the water they would drink is too low. This action is somewhat akin to what Juba, a king of their nation, relates of the elephants: "That when, by the craft of the hunter, one of them is trapped in certain deep pits prepared for them, and covered over with brush to deceive them, all the rest, in great diligence, bring a great many stones and logs of wood to raise the bottom so that he may get out." But this animal, in several other effects, comes so near to human capacity that, should I particularly relate all that experience hath delivered to us, I should easily have what I usually maintain granted: namely, that there is more difference betwixt such and such a man than betwixt such a beast and such a man. The keeper of an elephant in a private house of Syria robbed him every meal of the half of his allowance. One day his master would himself feed him, and poured the full measure of barley he had ordered for his allowance into his manger; at which the elephant, casting an angry look at his keeper, with his trunk separated the one-half from the other, and thrust it aside, by that declaring the wrong was done him. And another, having a keeper that mixed stones with his corn to make up the measure, came to the pot where he was boiling meat for his own dinner, and filled it with ashes. These are particular effects: but that which all the world has seen, and all the world knows, that in all the armies of the Levant one of the greatest force consisted in elephants, with whom they did, without comparison, much greater execution than we now do with our artillery; which takes, pretty nearly, their place in a day of battle (as may easily be supposed by such as are well read in ancient history);

Siquidem Tyrio servire solebant
Annibali, et nostris ducibus, regique Molosso,
Horum Majores, et dorso ferre cohortes,
Partem aliquam belli, et euntem in prælia turrim:[1]

"The sires of these huge animals were wont
The Carthaginian Hannibal to mount;
Our leaders also did these beasts bestride,
And mounted thus Pyrrhus his foes defied;
Nay, more, upon their backs they used to bear
Castles with armed cohorts to the war."

They must necessarily have very confidently relied upon the fidelity and understanding of these beasts when they entrusted them with the vanguard of a battle, where the least stop they should have made, by reason of the bulk and heaviness of their bodies, and the least fright that should have made them face about upon their own people, had been enough to spoil all: and there are but few examples where it has happened that they have fallen foul upon their own troops, whereas we ourselves break into our own battalions and rout one another. They had the charge not of one simple movement only, but of many several things to be performed in the battle: as the Spaniards did to their dogs in their new conquest of the Indies,[2] to whom they gave pay and allowed them a share in the spoil; and those animals shewed as much dexterity and judgment in pursuing the victory and stopping the pursuit; in charging and retiring, as occasion required; and in distinguishing their friends from their enemies, as they did ardour and fierceness.

We more admire and value things that are unusual and strange than those of ordinary observation. I had not else so long insisted upon these examples: for I believe whoever shall strictly observe what we ordinarily see in those animals we have amongst us may there find as wonderful effects as those we seek in remote countries and ages. 'Tis one and the same nature that rolls on her course, and whoever has sufficiently considered the present state of things, might certainly conclude as to both the future and the past. I have formerly seen men, brought hither by sea from very distant countries, whose language not being understood by us, and moreover their mien, countenance, and habit, being quite differing from ours; which of us did not repute them savages and brutes? Who did not attribute it to stupidity and want of common sense to see them mute, ignorant of the French tongue, ignorant of our salutations and cringes, our port and behaviour, from which all human nature must by all means take its pattern and example. All that seems strange to us, and that we do not understand, we condemn. The same thing happens also in the judgments we make of beasts. They have several conditions like to ours; from those we may, by comparison, draw some conjecture: but by those qualities that are particular to themselves, what know we what to make of them? The horses, dogs, oxen, sheep, birds, and most of the animals that live amongst us, know our voices, and suffer themselves to be governed by them: so did Crassus's lamprey,[3] and came when he called it; as also do the eels that are found in the Lake Arethusa; and I have seen several ponds where the fishes come to eat at a certain call of those who use to feed them.

Nomen habent, et ad magistri
Vocem quisque sui venit citatus:[1]

"They every one have names, and one and all Straightway appear at their own master's call:"

we may judge of that. We may also say that the elephants have some participation of religion,[2] forasmuch as after several washings and purifications they are observed to lift up their trunk like arms, and, fixing their eyes towards the rising of the sun, continue long in meditation and contemplation, at certain hours of the days, of their own motion, without instruction or precept. But because we do not see any such signs in other animals, we cannot for that conclude that they are without religion, nor make any judgment of what is concealed from us. As we discern something in this action which the philosopher Cleanthes took notice of,[3] because it something resembles our own. He saw, he says, "Ants go from their ant-hill, carrying the dead body of an ant towards another ant-hill, whence several other ants came out to meet them, as if to speak with them; where, after having been a while together, the last returned to consult, you may suppose, with their fellow-citizens, and so made two or three journeys, by reason of the difficulty of capitulation. In the conclusion, the last comers brought the first a worm out of their burrow, as it were for the ransom of the defunct, which the first laid upon their backs and carried home, leaving the dead body to the others." This was the interpretation that Cleanthes gave of this transaction, giving us by that to understand that those creatures that have no voice are not, nevertheless, without intercourse and mutual communication, whereof 'tis through our own defect that we do not participate; and for that reason foolishly take upon us to pass our censure. But they yet produce other effects far beyond our capacity, to which we are so far from being able to arrive by imitation that we cannot so much as by imitation conceive it. Many are of opinion that in the great and last naval engagement that Antony lost to Augustus, his admiral galley was stayed in the middle of her course by the little fish the Latins call remora, by reason of the property she has of staying all sorts of vessels to which she fastens herself.[4] And the Emperor Caligula, sailing with a great navy upon the coast of Romania, his galley only was suddenly stayed by the same fish, which he caused to be taken, fastened as it was to the keel of his ship, very angry that such a little animal could resist both the sea, the wind, and the force of all his oars, by being only fastened by the beak to his galley (for it is a shell-fish); and was moreover, not without great reason, astonished that, being brought to him in the vessel, it had no longer the strength it had without. A citizen of Cyzicus formerly acquired the reputation of a good mathematician for having learnt the quality of the hedge-hog: he has his burrow open in divers places, and to several winds, and, foreseeing the wind that is to come, stops the hole on that side, which that citizen observing, gave the city certain predictions of the wind which was presently to blow.[6] The cameleon takes her colour from the place upon which she is laid;[6] but the polypus gives himself what colour he pleases, according to occasion, either to conceal himself from what he fears, or from what he has a design to seize:[7] in the cameleon 'tis a passive, but in the polypus 'tis an active, change. We have some changes of colour, as in fear, anger, shame, and other passions, that alter our complexions; but it is by the effect of suffering, as with the cameleon. It is in the power of the jaundice, indeed, to make us turn yellow, but 'tis not in the power of our own will. Now these effects that we discover in other animals, much greater than ours, seem to imply some more excellent faculty in them unknown to us; as 'tis to be presumed there are several other qualities and abilities of, theirs, of which no appearances have arrived at us.

Whether elephants have any sentiments of religion.

Amongst all the predictions of elder times, the most ancient and the most certain were those taken from the flight of birds;[8] we have nothing like it, nor any thing to be so much admired. That rule and order of the moving of the wing, whence they derived the consequences of future things, must of necessity be guided by some excellent means to so noble an operation: for to attribute this great effect to any natural disposition, without the intelligence, consent, and meditation of him by whom it is produced, is an opinion evidently false. That it is so, the cramp-fish[9] has this

The flight of birds the most certain way of prediction.

[9] Or Torpedo. Montaigne (observes Mr. Coste) would mislead us here, or, rather, is misled himself; for, because the cramp-fish benumbs the members of those who touch it, and because the cranes, swallows, and the other birds of passage change their climate according to the seasons of the year, it by no means follows that the predictions, pretended to be derived from the flight of birds, are founded on certain faculties, which those birds have, of discovering things future to such as take the pains to watch their various motions. The vivacity of our author's genius has made him, in this place, confound things together that are very different. For the properties of the cramp-fish, cranes, and swallows, appear from sensible effects: but the predictions said to be derived from the flight of certain birds, by virtue of the rule and method of the motion of their wings, are only founded upon human imaginations, the reality whereof was never proved; which have varied according to times and places, and which, at length, have lost all credit with the very people that were most possessed with them; but I am of opinion that Montaigne only makes use here of the divining faculty of the birds, to puzzle those dogmatists who decide so positively that the animals have neither reason nor intellect. In this he has imitated Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrh. Hypot. i. 14, who, attacking the dogmatists on this very article, says ex-quality, not only to benumb all the members that touch her, but even through the nets transmit a heavy dulness into the hands of those that move and handle them; nay, it is further said that if one pour water upon her, he will feel this numbness mount up the water to the hand, and stupify the feeling through the water. This is a miraculous force; but 'tis not useless to the cramp-fish; she knows it, and makes use on't; for, to catch the prey she desires, she will bury herself in the mud, that other fishes swimming over her, struck and benumbed with this coldness of hers, may fall into her power. Cranes, swallows, and other birds of passage, by shifting their abode according to the seasons, sufficiently manifest the knowledge they have of their divining faculty, and put it in use. Huntsmen assure us that to cull out from amongst a great many puppies that which ought to be preserved as the best, the best way is to refer the choice to the mother; as thus, take them and carry them out of the kennel, and the first she brings back will certainly be the best; or if you make a shew as if you would environ the kennel with fire, that one she first catches up to save. By which it appears they have a sort of prognostic which we have not; or that they have some virtue in judging of their whelps other and more certain than we have.

The manner of coming into the world, of engendering, nourishing, acting, moving, living and dying of beasts, is so near to ours that whatever we retrench from their moving causes, and add to our own condition above theirs, can by no means proceed from any meditation of our own reason. For the regimen of our health, physicians propose to us the example of the beasts' manners and way of living; for this saying (out of Plutarch) has in all times been in the mouth of these people: "Keep warm thy feet and head, as to the rest, live like a beast."

The chief of all natural actions is generation: we have a certain disposition of members which is the most proper for us to that end; nevertheless, we are ordered by Lucretius to conform to the gesture and posture of the brutes as the most effectual:

> More ferarum,
> Quadrupedumque magis ritu, plerumque putantur
> Concipere uxores: Quia sic loca sumere possunt, > Pectoribus positis, subtatis semina lumbis;[1]

and the same authority condemns, as hurtful, those indiscreet and impudent motions which the women have added of their own invention, to whom it proposes the more temperate and modest pattern and practice of the beasts of their own sex:

> Nam mulier prohibet se concipere atque repugnat,
> Clunibus ipsa viri Venerem si læta retractet,
> Atque exossato ciet omni pectore fluctus.
> Ejicit enim sulci recta regione viaque
> Vomerem, atque locis avertit seminis ictum.[2]

If it be justice to render to every one their due, the beasts that serve, love, and defend their benefactors, and that pursue and fall upon strangers and those who offend them, do in this represent a certain air of our justice; as also in observing a very equitable equality in the distribution of what they have to their young. And as to friendship, they have it without comparison more lively and constant than men have. King Lysimachus's dog, Hyrcanus, his master being dead, lay on his bed, obstinately refusing either to eat or drink; and, the day that his body was burnt, he took a run and leaped into the fire, where he was consumed.[3] As also did the dog of one Pyrrhus, for he would not stir from off his master's bed from the time he died; and when they carried him away let himself be carried with him, and at last leaped into the pile where they burnt his master's body."[4] There are inclinations of affection which sometimes spring in us, without the consultation of reason; and by a fortuitous temerity, which others call sympathy: of which beasts are as capable as we. We see horses take such an acquaintance with one another that we have much ado to make them eat or travel, when separated: we observe them to fancy a particular colour in those of their own kind, and, where they meet it, run to it with great joy and demonstrations of good will, and have a dislike and hatred for some other colour. Animals have choice, as well as we, in their amours, and cull out their mistresses; neither are they exempt from our jealousies and implacable malice.

The love of dogs to their masters.

Desires are either natural and necessary, as to eat and drink; or natural and not necessary, as the coupling with females; or neither natural nor necessary: of which last sort are almost all the desires of men: they are all superfluous and artificial. For 'tis marvellous how little will satisfy nature, how little she has left us to desire; our ragouts and kickshaws are not of her ordering. The Stoics say that a man may live on an olive a day. The delicacy of our wines is no part of her instruction, nor the refinements we introduce into the indulgence of our amorous appetites:

> Neque illa
> Magno prognatum deposcit consule cunnum.[5]
>
> "Nature, in her pursuit of love, disclaims
> The pride of titles, and the pomp of names."

These irregular desires, that the ignorance of good and a false opinion have infused into us, are so many that they almost exclude all the natural; just as if there were so great a number of strangers in the city as to thrust out the natural inhabitants, or, usurping upon their ancient rights and privileges, should extinguish their authority and introduce new laws and customs of their own. Animals are much more regular than we, and keep themselves with greater moderation within the limits nature has prescribed; but yet not so exactly that they have not sometimes an analogy with our debauchs. And as there have been furious desires that have impelled men to the love of beasts, so there have been examples of beasts that have fallen in love with us, and been seized with monstrous affection betwixt kinds: witness the elephant who was rival to Aristophanes the grammarian in the love of a young herb-wench in the city of Alexandria, who was nothing behind him in all the offices of a very passionate suitor: for going through the market where they sold fruit, he would take some in his trunk and carry them to her. He would as much as possible keep her always in his sight, and would sometimes put his trunk under her handkerchief into her bosom, to feel her breasts.[1] They tell also of a dragon in love with a girl, and of a goose enamoured of a child; of a ram that was suitor to the minstrelless Glaucia, in the town of Asopus;[2] and we see not unfrequently baboons furiously in love with women. We see also certain male animals that are fond of the males of their own kind. Oppian[3] and others give us some examples of the reverence that beasts have to their kindred in their copulations:[4] but experience often shews us the contrary:

Animals more regular than we.

Nec habetur turpe juvencæ
Ferre patrem tergo; fit equo sua filia conjux;
Quæque creavit, init pecudes caper; ipsaque cujus
Semine concepta est, ex illo concipit ales.[5]

"The heifer thinks it not a shame to take
Her lusty sire upon her willing back:
The horse his daughter leaps, goats scruple not
T' increase the herd by those they have begot;
And birds of all sorts do in common live,
And by the seed they have conceived conceive."

And for subtle cunning, can there be a more pregnant example than in the philosopher Thales' mule?[6] who fording a river, laden with salt, and by accident stumbling there, so that the sacks he carried were all wet, perceiving that by the melting of the salt his burden was something lighter, he never failed, so oft as he came to any river, to lie down with his load; till his master, discovering the knavery, ordered that he should be laden with wool: wherein, finding himself mistaken, he ceased to practise that device. There are several that very vividly represent the true image of our avarice; for we see them infinitely solicitous to get all they can, and hide it with exceeding great care, though they never make any use of it at all. As to thrift, they surpass us not only in the foresight and laying up, and saving for the time to come, but they have, moreover, a great deal of the science necessary thereto. The ants bring abroad into the sun their grain and seed to air, refresh and dry them when they perceive them to mould and grow musty, lest they should decay and rot. But the caution and prevention they use in gnawing their grains of wheat surpass all imagination of human prudence: for by reason that the wheat does not always continue sound and dry, but grows soft, thaws and dissolves as if it were steeped in milk, whilst hasting to germination; for fear lest it should shoot and lose the nature and property of a magazine for their subsistence, they nibble off the end by which it should shoot and sprout.

Animals that seem tainted with avarice, and others that are very saving.

As to what concerns war, which is the greatest and most magnificent of human actions, I would very fain know whether we would use it for an argument of some prerogative, or, on the contrary, for a testimony of our weakness and imperfection; as, in truth, the science of undoing and killing one another, and of ruining and destroying our own kind, has nothing in it so tempting as to make it be coveted by beasts who have it not.

The passion for war, a proof of weakness in human beings, is in certain animals.

Quando leoni
Fortior eripuit vitam leo? quo nemore unquam
Expiravit aper majoris dentibus apri?[7]

"No lion drinks a weaker lion's gore,
No boar expires beneath a stronger boar."

Yet are they not universally exempt; witness the furious encounters of bees, and the enterprizes of the princes of the contrary armies:

Wars betwixt bees.

Sæpe duobus

Continuoque animos vulgi, et trepidantia bella
Corda licet longè præsciscere.[8]

"But if contending factions arm the hive,
When rival kings in doubtful battle strive,
Tumultuous crowds the dread event prepare,
And palpitating hearts that beat to war.

I never read this divine description but that, methinks, I there see human folly and vanity represented in their true and lively colours.

all Asia was ruined and destroyed for the lust of Paris : the envy of one single man, a despite, a pleasure, a domestic jealousy, causes that ought not to set two oyster-wenches by the ears, is the mover of all this mighty bustle. Shall we believe those very men who are themselves the principal authors of these mischiefs? Let us then hear the greatest, the most powerful, the most victorious emperor that ever was, turning into a jest, very pleasantly and ingeniously, several battles fought both by sea and land, the blood and lives of five hundred thousand men that followed his fortune, and the strength and riches of two parts of the world drained for the expense of his expeditions :

a contrary blast, the croaking of a flight of ravens, the stumble of a horse, the casual passage of an eagle, a dream, a voice, a sign, a morning mist, are any one of them sufficient to beat down and overturn him. Dart but a sunbeam in his face, he is melted and vanished. Blow but a little dust in his eyes, as our poet says of the bees, and all our ensigns and legions, with the great Pompey himself at the head of them, are routed and crushed to pieces : for it was he, as I take it,[7] that Sertorius beat in Spain with those fine arms, which also served Eumenes against Antigonus, and Surena against Crassus :

Let us but slip our flies after them, and they will have the force and courage to defeat them. Of fresh memory, the Portuguese having besieged the city of Tamly, in the territory of Xiatine, the inhabitants of the place brought a great many hives, of which are great plenty in that place, upon the wall ; and with fire drove the bees so furiously upon the enemy that they gave over the enterprise, not being able to stand their attacks and endure their stings : and so the citizens, by this new [3] This epigram was composed by Augustus, but the luscious Latin conveys such gross and licentious ideas that there would be no excuse for translating the lines without softening them. The following French version, by M. de Fontenelle, in one of his incomparable Dialogues of the Dead, though the language is so very polished, lets us entirely into Augustus's meaning :

Parce qu'Antoine est charmé de Glaphyre
Fulvie a ses beaux yeux me veut assujettir.
Antoine est infidele. Eh bien donc ? Est ce à dire
Que des fautes d'Antoine on me fera patir ?
Qui ? moy ! que je serve Fulvie !
Suffit-il quelle en ait tenire ?
A ce compte, on verroit se retirer vers moi
Mille epouses mal satisfaites.
Aime moy, me dit elle, ou combattons. Mais quoy ?
Elle est bien laide ! Allons, sonnez, trompettes.

" 'Cause Anthony is fired with Glaphire's charms,
Fain would his Fulvia tempt me to her arms.
If Anthony be false, what then ? must I
Be slave to Fulvia's lustful tyranny ?
Then would a thousand wanton, waspish wives,
Swarm to my bed like bees into their hives.
Declare for love, or war, she said ; and frown'd :
No love I'll grant : to arms bid trumpets sound."[2a] sort of relief, gained liberty and the victory with so wonderful a fortune, that at the return of their defenders from the battle they found they had not lost so much as one. The souls of emperors and cobblers are cast in the same mould: the weight and importance of the actions of princes considered, we persuade ourselves that they must be produced by some as weighty and important causes: but we are deceived; for they are pushed on, and pulled back in their motions, by the same springs that we are in our little undertakings. The same reason that makes us wrangle with a neighbour causes a war betwixt princes; the same reason that makes us whip a lacquey, falling into the hands of a king makes him ruin a whole province. They are as lightly moved as we, but they are able to do more. In a gnat and an elephant the passion is the same.

As to fidelity, there is no animal in the world so treacherous as man. Our histories have recorded the violent pursuits that dogs have made after the murderers of their masters. King Pyrrhus observing a dog that watched a dead man's body, and understanding that he had for three days together performed that office, commanded that the body should be buried, and took the dog along with him. One day, as he was at a general muster of his army, this dog, seeing his master's murderers, with great barking and extreme signs of anger flew upon them, and by this first accusation awakened the revenge of this murder, which was soon after perfected by form of justice.[1] As much was done by the dog of the wise Hesiod, who convicted the sons of Ganictor of Naupactus of the murder committed on the person of his master.[2] Another dog being to guard a temple at Athens, having spied a sacrilegious thief carrying away the finest jewels, fell to barking at him with all his force; but the warders not awaking at the noise, he followed him, and, day being broke, kept off at a little distance, without losing sight of him: if he offered him anything to eat he would not take it, but would wag his tail at all the passengers he met, and took whatever they gave him; and if the thief laid down to sleep, he likewise stayed upon the same place. The news of this dog being come to the warders of the temple they put themselves upon the pursuit, inquiring of the colour of the dog, and at last found him in the city of Cromyon, and the thief also, whom they brought back to Athens, where he got his reward: and the judges, in consideration of this good office, ordered a certain measure of corn for the dog's daily sustenance at the public charge, and the priests to take care of it. Plutarch delivers this story for a certain truth, and that it happened in the age wherein he lived.[3]

Dogs revenge the death of their masters.

The fidelity of a dog in pursuing a sacrilegious person.

As to gratitude (for I think we need bring this word into a little repute), this one example, which Apion[4] reports himself to have been an eye-witness of, shall suffice. "One day," says he, "at Rome, they entertained the people with the sight of the fighting of several strange beasts, and principally of lions of an unusual size: there was one amongst the rest who, by his furious deportment, by the strength and largeness of his limbs, and by his loud and dreadful roaring, attracted the eyes of all the spectators. Amongst other slaves that were presented to the people in this combat of beasts there was one Androdus, of Dacia, belonging to a Roman lord of consular dignity. This lion having seen him at a distance first made a sudden stop, as it were in a wondering posture, and then softly approached nearer in a gentle and peaceable manner, as if it were to enter into acquaintance with him. This being done, and being now assured of what he sought for, he began to wag his tail, as dogs do when they flatter their masters, and to kiss and lick the hands and thighs of the poor wretch, who was beside himself, and almost dead with fear. Androdus being by this kindness of the lion a little come to himself, and having taken so much heart as to consider and know him, it was a singular pleasure to see the joy and caresses that passed betwixt them. At which the people breaking into loud acclamations of joy, the emperor caused the slave to be called, to know from him the cause of so strange an event; who thereupon told him a new and a very strange story: "My master," said he, "being pro-consul in Africa, I was constrained, by his severity and cruel usage, being daily beaten, to steal from him and run away; and, to hide myself secretly from a person of so great authority in the province, I thought it my best way to fly to the solitudes, sands, and uninhabitable parts of that country, resolving that in case the means of supporting life should chance to fail me, to make some shift or other to kill myself. The sun being excessively hot at noon, and the heat intolerable, I lit upon a private and almost inaccessible cave, and went into it. Soon after there came in to me this lion, with one foot wounded and bloody, complaining and groaning with the pain he endured. At his coming I was exceeding afraid; but he having spied me hid in the corner of his den, came gently to me, holding out and showing me his wounded foot, as if he demanded my assistance in his distress. I then drew out a great splinter he had got there, and, growing a little more familiar with him, squeezing the wound thrust out the matter, dirt, and gravel which was got into it, and wiped and cleansed it the best I could. He, finding himself something better, and much eased of his pain, laid him down to rest, and presently fell asleep with his foot in my hand. From that time forward he and I lived together in this cave three whole years upon one and the same diet; for of the beasts that he killed in hunting he always brought me the best pieces, which I roasted in the sun for want of fire, and so ate it. At last, growing weary of this wild and brutish life, the lion being one day gone abroad to hunt for our ordinary provision, I departed thence, and the third day after was taken by the soldiers, who brought me from Africa to this city to my master, who presently condemned me to die, and to be thus exposed to the wild beasts. Now, by what I see, this lion was also taken soon after, who has now sought to recompense me for the benefit and cure that he received at my hands." This is the story that Androdus told the emperor, which he also conveyed from hand to hand to the people: wherefore, at the general request, he was absolved from his sentence and set at liberty, and the lion was, by order of the people, presented to him. "We afterwards saw," says Apion, "Androdus leading this lion, in nothing but a small leash, from tavern to tavern at Rome, and receiving what money everybody would give him, the lion being so gentle as to suffer himself to be covered with the flowers that the people threw upon him, every one that met him saying, 'There goes the lion that entertained the man; there goes the man that cured the lion.'"

Weeping of beasts for the loss of those they love.

We often lament the loss of beasts we love, and so do they the loss of us:

Post, bellator equus, positis insignibus, Æthon
It lacrymans, guttisque humectat grandibus ora.[1]

"To close the pomp, Æthon, the steed of state,
Is led, the fun'ral of his lord to wait.
Stripped of his trappings, with a sullen pace
He walks, and the big tears run rolling down his face."

As some nations have their wives in common, and some others have every one his own, is not the same seen among beasts, and marriages better kept than ours? As to the society and confederation they make amongst themselves, to league together and to give one another mutual assistance, is it not known that oxen, hogs, and other animals, at the cry of any of their kind that we offend, all the herd run to his aid and embody for his defence? The fish Scarus, when he has swallowed the angler's hook, his fellows all crowd about him and gnaw the line in pieces; and if, by chance, one be got into the bow-net, the others present him their tails on the outside, which he holding fast with his teeth, they after that manner disengage and draw him out.[2]

Society amongst beasts.

Mullets, when one of their companions is engaged, cross the line over their back, and, with a fin they have there, indented like a saw, cut and saw it asunder.[3] As to the particular offices that we receive from one another for the service of life, there are several like examples amongst them. 'Tis said that the whale never moves that she has not always before her a little fish like the sea-gudgeon, for this reason called the guide-fish, whom the whale follows, suffering himself to be led and turned with as great facility as the rudder guides the ship: in recompense of which service also, whereas all the other things, whether beast or vessel, that enter into the dreadful gulf of this monster's mouth, are immediately lost and swallowed up, this little fish retires into it in great security, and there sleeps, during which time the whale never stirs: but so soon as ever it goes out he immediately follows it; and if by accident he loses the sight of his little guide, he goes wandering here and there, and strikes his sides against the rocks like a ship that has lost her helm: which Plutarch affirms to have seen in the island of Anticyra.[4] There is a like society betwixt the little bird called the wren and the crocodile. The wren serves for a centinel over this great animal; and if the ichneumon, his mortal enemy, approach to fight him, this little bird, for fear lest he should surprise him asleep, both with his voice and bill rouses him and gives him notice of his danger. He feeds of this monster's leavings, who receives him familiarly into his mouth, suffering him to peck in his jaws and betwixt his teeth, and thence to pick out the bits of flesh that remain; and when he has a mind to shut his mouth, he first gives the bird warning to go out by closing it by little and little, and without bruising or doing it any harm at all.[5] The shell-fish called the naker lives in the same intelligence with the shrimp, a little sort of animal of the lobster kind, which serves him in the nature of a porter, sitting at the opening of the shell, which the naker keeps always gaping and open till the shrimp sees some little fish, proper for their prey, within the hollow of the shell, where she enters too, and pinches the naker so to the quick that she is forced to close her shell, where they two together devour the prey they have trapped in their fort.[6] In the manner of living of the tunnies we observe a singular knowledge of the three parts of mathematics. As to astrology, they teach it men, for they stay in the place where they are surprised by the brumal solstice, and never stir thence till the next equinox: for which reason Aristotle himself attributes to them this science. As to geometry and arithmetic, they always form their numbers in the figure of a cube, every way square, and make up the body of a battalion, solid, close, and environed round with six equal sides, and swim in this square order, as large behind as before; so that whoever in seeing them can count one rank may easily number the whole troop, by reason that the depth is equal to the breadth, and the breadth to the length.[1]

Magnanimity of an Indian dog.

As to magnanimity, it will be hard to exhibit a better instance of it than in the example of the great dog sent to Alexander the Great from the Indies. They first brought him a stag to encounter, next a boar, and after that a bear, all which he slighted, and disdained to stir from his place; but when he saw a lion he then immediately roused himself, evidently manifesting that he declared that alone worthy to enter the lists with him.[2] Touching repentance and the acknowledgment of faults, 'tis reported of an elephant that, having in the impetuosity of his rage killed his keeper, he fell into so extreme a sorrow that he would never after eat, but starved himself to death.[3] And as to clemency, 'tis said of a tiger, the most cruel of all beasts, that a kid having been put in to him, he suffered a two days' hunger rather than hurt it, and the third broke the grate he was shut up in, to seek elsewhere for prey; so unwilling he was to fall upon the kid, his familiar and his guest.[4] And as to the laws of familiarity and agreement, formed by conversation, it ordinarily happens that we bring up cats, dogs, and hares, tame together.

Repentance of an elephant.

But that which seamen by experience know, and particularly in the Sicilian Sea, of the quality of the halcyons, surpasses all human thought. Of what kind of animal has nature even so much honoured the birth? The poets indeed say that one only island, Delos, which was before a floating island, was fixed for the service of Latona's lying-in: but God has ordered that the whole ocean should be stayed, made stable and smooth, without waves, without winds or rain, whilst the halcyon produces her young, which is just about the solstice, the shortest day of the year; so that by her privilege we have seven days and seven nights in the very heart of winter wherein we may sail without danger. Their females never have to do with any other male but their own, whom they serve and assist all their lives, without ever forsaking him. If he becomes weak and broken with age, they take him upon their shoulders and carry him from place to place, and serve him till death. But the most inquisitive into the secrets of nature could never yet arrive at the knowledge of the wonderful fabric wherewith the halcyon builds her nest for her little ones, nor guess at the materials. Plutarch,[5] who has seen and handled many of them, thinks it is the bones of some fish which she joins and binds together, interlacing them, some lengthwise and others across, and adding ribs and hoops in such manner that she forms at last a round vessel fit to launch; which being done, and the building finished, she carries it to the beach, where the sea beating gently against it shows where she is to mend what is not well jointed and knit, and where better to fortify the seams that are leaky, that open at the beating of the waves; and, on the contrary, what is well built and has had the due finishing, the beating of the waves does so close and bind together that it is not to be broken or cracked by blows either of stone or iron without very much ado. And that which is more to be admired is the proportion and figure of the cavity within, which is composed and proportioned after such a manner as not to receive or admit any other thing than the bird that built it: for to anything else it is so impenetrable, close, and shut, nothing can enter, not so much as the water of the sea. This is a very clear description of this building, and borrowed from a very good hand; and yet methinks it does not give us sufficient light into the difficulty of this architecture. Now from what vanity can it proceed to despise and look down upon, and disdainfully to interpret, effects that we can neither imitate nor comprehend?

The faculty of imagination common to the beasts as well as human beings.

To pursue a little further this equality and correspondence betwixt us and beasts, the privilege our soul so much glorifies herself upon, of bringing all things she conceives to her own law, of stripping all things that come to her of their mortal and corporeal qualities, of ordering and placing things she conceives worthy her taking notice of, stripping and divesting them of their corruptible qualities, and making them to lay aside length, breadth, depth, weight, colour, smell, roughness, smoothness, hardness, softness, and all sensible accidents, as mean and superfluous vestments, to accommodate them to her own immortal and spiritual condition; as Rome and Paris, for example, that I have in my fancy, Paris that I imagine, I imagine and comprehend it without greatness and without place, without stone, without plaster, and without wood: this very same privilege, I say, seems evidently to be in beasts; for a courser accustomed to trumpets, to musket-shots, and battles, whom we see start and tremble in his sleep and stretched upon his litter, as if he were in a fight; it is almost certain that he conceives in his soul the beat of a drum without noise, and an army without arms and without body:

the watch-dogs, that we often observe to snarl in their dreams, and afterwards bark out, and start up as if they perceived some stranger at hand; the stranger that their soul discerns is a man spiritual and imperceptible, without dimension, without colour, and without being :

What constitutes beauty.

As to the beauty of the body, before I proceed any further I should know whether or no we are agreed about the description. 'Tis likely we do not well know what beauty is in nature and in general, since to our own human beauty we give so many divers forms, of which, were there any natural rule and prescription, we should know it in common, as the heat of the fire. But we fancy the forms according to our own appetite and liking :

Turpis Romano Belgicus ore color :[4]

" A German hue ill suits a Roman face."

Beauty of the Indians.

The Indians paint it black and tawny, with great swelled lips, wide flat noses, and load the cartilage betwixt the nostrils with great rings of gold, to make it hang down to the mouth ; as also the under lip with great hoops, enriched with precious stones, that weigh them down to fall upon the chin, it being with them a singular grace to show their teeth, even below the roots. In Peru the greatest ears are the most beautiful, which they stretch out as far as they can by art. And a man now living says that he has seen in an eastern nation this care of enlarging them in so great repute, and the ear loaded with so ponderous jewels, that he did with great ease put his arm, sleeve and all, through the hole of an ear. There are elsewhere nations that take great care to black their teeth, and hate to see them white, whilst others paint them red. The women are reputed more beautiful, not only in Biscay, but elsewhere, for having their heads shaved ; and, which is more, in certain frozen countries, as Pliny reports.[5] The Mexicans esteem a low forehead a great beauty, and though they shave all other parts, they nourish hair on the forehead and increase it by art, and have great breasts in so great reputation that they affect to give their children suck over their shoulders. We should paint deformity so. The Italians fashion it gross and massy ; the Spaniards gaunt and slender ; and amongst us one has it white, another brown ; one soft and delicate, another strong and vigorous ; one will have his mistress soft and gentle, others haughty and majestic. Just as the preference in beauty that Plato attributes to the spherical figure the Epicureans gave rather to the pyramidal or square, and cannot swallow a god in the form of a bowl.[6] But, be it how it will, nature has no more privileged us in this from her common laws than in the rest. And if we will judge ourselves aright, we shall find that, if there be some animals less favoured in this than we, there are others, and in greater number, that are more : a multis animalibus decore vincimur,[7] " Many animals surpass us in beauty," even among the terrestrial, our compatriots : for as to those of sea, setting the figure aside, which cannot fall into any manner of proportion, being so much another thing in colour, clearness, smoothness, and arrangement, we sufficiently give place to them ; and no less, in all qualities, to the aërial. And this prerogative that the poets make such a mighty matter of, our erect stature, looking towards heaven our original,

White teeth despised.

Men are not privileged, in point of beauty, above the beasts.

Pronaque cùm spectent animalia cætera terram,
Os homini sublime dedit, cœlumque tueri

" Whilst all the brutal creatures downward bend
Their sight, and to their earthly mother tend,
He set man's face aloft, that, with his eyes
Uplifted, he might view the starry skies," is truly poetical ; for there are several little beasts who have their sight absolutely turned towards heaven ; and I find the gesture of camels and ostriches much higher raised and more erect than ours. What animals have not their faces above and not before, and do not look opposite, as we do; and that do not in their natural posture discover as much of heaven and earth as man? And what qualities of our bodily constitution, in Plato and Cicero,[1] may not indifferently serve a thousand sorts of beasts? Those that most resemble us are the most despicable and deformed of all the herd: for those, as to outward appearance and form of visage, are baboons:

Simia quam similis, turpissima bestia, nobis?[2]

"How like to man, in visage and in shape,
Is, of all beasts the most uncouth, the ape?"

as to the internal and vital parts, the hog. In earnest, when I consider man stark naked, even in that sex which seems to have the greatest share of beauty, his defects, natural subjection, and imperfections, I find that we have more reason than any other animal to cover ourselves; and are to be excused from borrowing of those to whom nature has in this been kinder than to us, to trick ourselves out with their beauties, and hide ourselves under their spoils, their wool, feathers, hair, and silk. Let us observe, as to the rest, that man is the sole animal whose nudities offend his own companions, and the only one who in his natural actions withdraws and hides himself from his own kind. And really 'tis also an effect worth consideration, that they who are masters in the trade prescribe, as a remedy for amorous passions, the full and free view of the body a man desires; for that to cool the ardour there needs no more but freely and fully to see what he loves:

Man has more reason to be covered than any other animal.

Ille quod obscenas in aperto corpore partes
Viderat, in cursu qui fuit hæsit amor."[3]

"The love that's tilting when those parts appear Open to view, flags in the hot career."

And, although this receipt may peradventure proceed from a nice and cold humour, it is notwithstanding a very great sign of our deficiencies that use and acquaintance should make us disgust one another. It is not modesty, so much as cunning and prudence, that makes our ladies so circumspect to refuse us admittance into their cabinets before they are painted and tricked up for the public view:

Nec Veneres nostras hoc fallit; quo magis ipsæ
Omnia summopere hos vitæ postscenia celant,
Quos retinere volunt, adstrictoque esse in amore:[3]

"Of this our ladies are full well aware,
Which make them, with such privacy and care,
Behind the scene all those defects remove,
Likely to check the flame of those they love."

whereas in several animals there is nothing that we do not love, and that does not please our senses; so that from their very excrements we do not only extract wherewith to heighten our sauces, but also our richest ornaments and perfumes. This discourse reflects upon none but the ordinary sort of women, and is not so sacrilegious as to comprehend those divine, supernatural, and extraordinary beauties, which we see shine occasionally among us like stars under a corporeal and terrestrial veil.

As to the rest, the very share that we allow to beasts of the bounty of nature, by our own confession, is very much to their advantage. We attribute to ourselves imaginary and fantastic good, future and absent good, for which human capacity cannot of herself be responsible: or good, that we falsely attribute to ourselves by the license of opinion, as reason, knowledge, and honour, and leave to them for their dividend, essential, durable, and palpable good, as peace, repose, security, innocence, and health: health, I say, the fairest and richest present that nature can make us. Insomuch that philosophy, even the Stoic,[4] is so bold as to say, "That Heraclitus and Pherecides, could they have trucked their wisdom for health, and have delivered themselves, the one of his dropsy, and the other of the lousy disease that tormented him, they had done well." By which they set a greater value upon wisdom, comparing and putting it into the balance with health, than they do with this other proposition, which is also theirs: they say that if Circe had presented Ulysses with the two potions, the one to make a fool become a wise man, and the other to make a wise man become a fool, that Ulysses ought rather to have chosen the last, than consent to that by which Circe changed his human figure into that of a beast; and say that wisdom itself would have spoke to him after this manner: "Forsake me, let me alone, rather than lodge me under the body and figure of an ass." How! the philosophers then will abandon this great and divine wisdom for this corporeal and terrestrial covering? It is then no more by reason, by discourse, and by the soul, that we excel beasts; 'tis by our beauty, our fair complexion, and our fine symmetry of parts, for which we must quit our intelligence, our prudence, and all the rest. Well, I accept this open and free confession: certainly they knew that those parts, upon which we so much value ourselves, are no other than vain fancy. If beasts then had all the virtue, knowledge, wisdom, and stoical perfection, they would still be beasts, and would not be comparable to man, miserable, wicked, mad, man. For, in short, whatever is not as we are is nothing worth; and God, to procure himself an esteem among us, must put himself into that shape, as we shall shew anon. By which it appears that it is not upon any true ground of reason, but by a foolish pride and vain opinion, that we prefer ourselves before other animals, and separate ourselves from their society and condition.

But to return to what I was upon before: we have for our part inconstancy, irresolution, incertitude, sorrow, superstition, solicitude of things to come, even after we shall be no more, ambition, avarice, jealousy, envy, irregular, frantic, and untamed appetites, war, lying, disloyalty, detraction, and curiosity. Doubtless, we have strangely over-paid this fine reason, upon which we so much glorify ourselves, and this capacity of judging and knowing, if we have bought it at the price of this infinite number of passions to which we are eternally subject. Unless we shall also think fit, as even Socrates does,[1] to add to the counterpoise that notable prerogative above beasts, "That whereas nature has prescribed them certain seasons and limits for the delights of Venus, she has given us the reins at all hours and all seasons." Ut vinum ægrotis, quia prodest rarò, nocet sæpissimè, melius est non adhibere omnino, quam, spe dubiæ salutis, in apertam perniciem incurrere: sic haud scio an melius fuerit, humano generi motum istum celerem cogitationis, acumen, solertiam, quam rationem vocamus, quoniam pestifera sint multis, admodum paucis salutaria, non dari omnino, quam tam munificè et tam largè dari.[2] "As it falls out that wine often hurting the sick, and very rarely doing them good, it is better not to give them any at all than to run into an apparent danger out of hope of an uncertain benefit, so I know not whether it had not been better for mankind that this quick motion, this penetration, this subtlety that we call reason, had not been given to man at all; considering how pestiferous it is to many, and useful but to few, than to have been conferred in so abundant manner, and with so liberal a hand." Of what advantage can we conceive the knowledge of so many things was to Varro and Aristotle? Did it exempt them from human inconveniences? Were they by it freed from the accidents that lay heavy upon the shoulders of a porter? Did they extract from their logic any consolation for the gout? Or, for knowing how this humour is lodged in the joints, did they feel it the less? Did they enter into composition with death by knowing that some nations rejoice at his approach: or with cuckoldry, by knowing that in some parts of the world wives are in common? On the contrary, having been reputed the greatest men for knowledge, the one amongst the Romans, and the other amongst the Greeks, and in a time when learning did most flourish, we have not heard, nevertheless, that they had any particular excellence in their lives; nay, the Greek had enough to do to clear himself from some notable blemishes in his. Have we observed that pleasure and health have a better relish with him that understands astrology and grammar than with others?

I have known in my time a hundred artisans, a hundred labourers, wiser and more happy than the rectors of the university, and whom I had much rather have resembled. Learning, methinks, has its place amongst the necessary things of life, as glory, nobility, dignity, or at the most, as beauty, riches, and such other qualities, which indeed are useful to it, but remotely, and more by opinion than by nature. We stand very little more in need of offices, rules, and laws of living in our society, than cranes and ants do in theirs; and yet we see that these carry themselves very regularly without erudition. If man was wise, he would take the true value of every thing according as it was useful and proper to his life. Whoever will number us by our actions and deportments will find many more excellent men amongst the ignorant than among the learned; aye, in all sorts of virtue. Old Rome seems to me to have been of much greater value, both for peace and war, than that learned Rome that ruined itself. And, though all the rest should be equal, yet integrity and innocency would remain to the ancients, for they cohabit singularly well with simplicity. But I will leave this discourse, that would lead me farther than I am willing to follow; and shall only say this farther, 'tis only humility and submission that can make a complete good man. We are not to leave the knowledge of his duty to every man's own judgment; we are to prescribe it to him, and not suffer him to choose it at his own discretion: otherwise, according to the imbecility, and infinite variety of our reasons and opinions, we should at large forge ourselves duties that would, as Epicurus says,[5] enjoin us to eat one another.

Humility and submission the parents of virtue.

The first law that ever God gave to man was a law of pure obedience: it was a commandment naked and simple, wherein man had nothing to inquire after, nor to dispute; foras-much as to obey is the proper office of a rational soul, acknowledging a heavenly superior and benefactor. From obedience and submission spring all other virtues, as all sin does from self-opinion. And, on the contrary, the first temptation that by the devil was offered to human nature, its first poison, insinuated itself into us by the promise made us of knowledge and wisdom: Eritis sicut Dii, scientes bonum et malum.[1] "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." And the syrens, in Homer, to allure Ulysses, and draw him within the danger of their snares, offered to give him knowledge.[2] The plague of man is the opinion of wisdom; and for this reason it is that ignorance is so recommended to us, by our religion, as proper to faith and obedience: Cavete ne quis vos decipiat per philosophiam et inanes seductiones, secundum elementa mundi.[3] "Take heed, lest any man deceive you by philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, and the rudiments of the world." There is in this a general consent amongst all sorts of philosophers, that the sovereign good consists in the tranquillity of the soul and body: but where shall we find it?

> Ad summum, sapiens uno minor est Jove, dives,
> Liber, honoratus, pulcher, rex denique regum;
> Præcipue sanus, nisi cum pituita molesta est:
>
> "In short, the wise is only less than Jove,
> Rich, free, and handsome; nay, a king above
> All earthly kings; with health supremely blest,
> Excepting when a cold disturbs his rest!"

It seems, in truth, that nature, for the consolation of our miserable and wretched state, has only given us presumption for our inheritance. 'Tis as Epictetus says, that man has nothing properly his own, but the use of his opinion:[4] we have nothing but wind and smoke for our portion. The gods have health in essence, says philosophy, and sickness in intelligence. Man, on the contrary, possesses his goods by fancy, his ills in essence. We have reason to magnify the power of our imagination; for all our goods are only in dream. Hear this poor calamitous animal huff! "There is nothing," says Cicero, "so charming as the employment of letters; of letters, I say, by means whereof the infinity of things, the immense grandeur of nature, the heavens, even in this world, the earth, and the seas are discovered to us: 'tis they that have taught us religion, moderation, and the grandeur of courage, and that have rescued our souls from darkness, to make her see all things, high, low, first, last, and middling: 'tis they that furnish us wherewith to live happily and well, and conduct us to pass over our lives without displeasure, and without offence."[5] Does not this man seem to speak of the condition of the ever-living and almighty God? But as to effects, a thousand little countrywomen have lived lives more equal, more sweet, and constant than his.

> Deus ille fuit, deus, inclyte Memmi,
> Qui princeps vitæ rationem invenit eam, quæ
> Nunc appellatur sapientia; quique per artem
> Fluctibus è tantis vitam, tantisque tenebris,
> In tam tranquilla et tam clara luce locavit:[6]
>
> "That god, great Memmus, was a god no doubt,
> Who, prince of life, first found that reason out
> Now wisdom called; and by his art, who did
> That life in tempests tost, and darkness hid,
> Place in so great a calm, and clear a light:"

here are brave ranting words: but a very slight accident put this man's[7] understanding in a worse condition than that of the meanest shepherd, notwithstanding this instructing god, this divine wisdom. Of the same stamp and impudence is the promise of Democritus's book: "I am going to speak of all things:"[8] and that foolish title that Aristotle prefixes to one of his, Of the Mortal Gods;[9] and the judgment of Chrysippus, that "Dion was as virtuous as God;"[10] and my Seneca himself says, that "God had given him life; but that to live well was his own;" conformably to this other, In virtute verè gloriamur; quod non contingeret, si id donum à Deo, non à nobis haberemus:[11] "We truly glory in our virtue: which would not be, if it was given us of God, and not by ourselves:" this is also Seneca's saying: "that the wise man hath fortitude equal with God, but that his is in spite of human frailty, wherein therefore he more than equals God."[12] There is nothing so ordinary as to meet with sallies of the like temerity: there is none of us, who take so much offence to see himself equalled with God, as he does to see himself undervalued by being ranked with other creatures; so much more are we jealous of our own interest than that of our Creator.

Temerity and presumption of some philosophers.

But we must trample under foot this foolish vanity, and briskly and boldly shake the ridiculous foundation upon which these false opinions are founded. So long as man shall believe he has any means and power of himself, he will never acknowledge what he owes to his Maker;

his eggs shall always be chickens, as the saying is: we must therefore strip him to his shirt. Let us see some notable examples of the effects of his philosophy: Posidonius being tormented with a disease so painful as made him writhe his arms and gnash his teeth, thought he sufficiently scorned the dolour, by crying out against it:—"Thou mayst do thy worst, I will not confess that thou art an evil."[1] He was as sensible of the pain as my footman, but he made a bravado of bridling his tongue, at least, and restraining it within the laws of his sect: Re succumbere non oportebat, verbis gloriantem.[2] "It did not become him, that spoke so big, to confess his frailty when he came to the test." Arcesilas being ill of the gout, and Carneades, who had come to see him, going away troubled at his condition, he called him back, and showing him his feet and breast:—"There is nothing comes thence hither," said he.[3] This has something a better grace, for he feels himself in pain, and would be disengaged from it; but his heart, notwithstanding, is not conquered nor subdued by it. The other stands more obstinately to his point, but, I fear, rather verbally than really. And Dionysius Heracleotes, afflicted with a vehement smarting in his eyes, was reduced to quit these stoical resolutions.[4] But even though knowledge should, in effect, do as they say, and could blunt the point, and dull the edge, of the misfortunes that attend us, what does she, more than what ignorance does more purely and evidently?—The philosopher Pyrrho, being at sea in very great danger, by reason of a mighty storm, presented nothing to the imitation of those who were with him, in that extremity, but a hog they had on board, that was fearless and unconcerned at the tempest.[5] Philosophy, when she has said all she can, refers us at last to the example of a gladiator, wrestler, or muleteer, in which sort of people we commonly observe much less apprehension of death, sense of pain, and other inconveniences, and more of endurance, than ever knowledge furnished any one withal, that was not born and bred to hardship. What is the cause that we make incisions, and cut the tender limbs of an infant, and those of a horse, more easily than our own—but ignorance only? How many has mere force of imagination made sick? We often see men cause themselves to be let blood, purged, and physicked, to be cured of diseases they only feel in opinion.—When real infirmities fail us, knowledge lends us her's: that colour, that complexion, portend some catarrhous defluxion: this hot season threatens us with a fever: this breach in the life-line of your left hand gives you notice of some near and dangerous indisposition; and at last she roundly attacks health itself; saying, this sprightliness and vigour of youth cannot continue in this posture; there must be blood taken, and the heat abated, lest it turn against yourself. Compare the life of a man subjected to such imaginations, to that of a labourer that suffers himself to be led by his natural appetite, measuring things only by the present sense, without knowledge, and without prognostic, that feels no pain or sickness, but when he is really ill. Whereas the other has the stone in his soul, before he has it in his bladder: as if it were not time enough to suffer the evil when it shall come, he must anticipate it by fancy, and run to meet it.

Diseases caused by imagination.

What I say of physic may generally serve in example for all other sciences. Thence is derived that ancient opinion of the philosophers[6] that placed the sovereign good in the discovery of the weakness of our judgment. My ignorance affords me as much occasion of hope as of fear; and having no other rule for my health than that of the examples of others, and of events I see elsewhere upon the like occasion, I find of all sorts, and rely upon those which by comparison are most favourable to me. I receive health with open arms, free, full and entire, and by so much the more whet my appetite to enjoy it, by how much it is at present less ordinary and more rare: so far am I from troubling its repose and sweetness with the bitterness of a new and constrained manner of living. Beasts sufficiently shew us how much the agitation of our minds brings infirmities and diseases upon us. That which is told us of those of Brazil, that they never die but of old age, is attributed to the serenity and tranquillity of the air they live in; but I rather attribute it to the serenity and tranquillity of their souls, free from all passion, thought, or employment, extended or unpleasing, a people that pass over their lives in a wonderful simplicity and ignorance, without letters, without law, without king, or any manner of religion. And whence comes that, which we find by experience, that the heaviest and dullest men are most able, and the most to be desired in amorous performances; and that the love of a muleteer often renders itself more acceptable than that of a gentleman, if it be not that the agitation of the soul in the latter disturbs his physical ability, dissolves and tires it, as it also ordinarily troubles and tires itself. What puts the soul beside itself, and more usually throws it into madness, but her own promptness, vigour, and agility, and, finally, her own proper force? Of what is the most subtle folly made but of the most subtle wisdom? As great friendships spring from great enmities, and vigorous health from mortal diseases, so from the rare and vivid agitations of our souls proceed the most wonderful and most distracted frenzies; 'tis but half a turn of the toe from the one to the other. In the actions of madmen we see how infinitely madness resembles the most vigorous operations of the soul. Who does not know how indiscernible the difference is betwixt folly and the sprightly elevations of a free soul, and the effects of a supreme and extraordinary virtue? Plato says that melancholy persons are the most capable of discipline, and the most excellent; and accordingly in none is there so great a propension to madness. Great wits are ruined by their own proper force and pliability: into what a condition, through his own agitation and promptness of fancy, is one of the most judicious, ingenious, and nearest formed, of any other Italian poet, to the air of the ancient and true poesy, lately fallen? Has he not vast obligation to this vivacity that has destroyed him? to this light that has blinded him? to this exact and subtle apprehension of reason that has put him beside his own? to this curious and laborious search after sciences, that has reduced him to imbecility? and to this rare aptitude to the exercises of the soul, that has rendered him without exercise and without soul? I was more angry, if possible, than compassionate, to see him at Ferrara in so pitiful a condition surviving himself, forgetting both himself and his works, which, without his knowledge, though before his face, have been published unformed and incorrect.[1]

Would you have a man healthy, would you have him regular, and in a steady and secure posture? Muffle him up in the shades of stupidity and sloth. We must be made beasts to be made wise, and hoodwinked before we are fit to be led. And if one shall tell me that the advantage of having a cold and dull sense of pain and other evils, brings this disadvantage along with it, to render us consequently less sensible also in the fruition of good and pleasure, this is true; but the misery of our condition is such that we have not so much to enjoy as to avoid, and that the extremest pleasure does not affect us to the degree that a light grief does: Segnius homines bona quam mala sentiunt.[2] We are not so sensible of the most perfect health as we are of the least sickness.

Stupidity accompanied by vigour and health.

Pungit

In cute vix summa violatum plagula corpus;

This only pleases me, that spleen nor gout
Neither offend my side nor wring my foot;
Excepting these, scarce any one can tell,
Or e'er observes, when he's in health and well."

Our well-being is nothing but the not being ill. Which is the reason why that sect of philosophers, which sets the greatest value upon pleasure, has yet fixed it chiefly in unconsciousness of pain. To be freed from ill is the greatest good that man can hope for or desire; as Ennius says,

Nimium boni est cui nihil est mali;[4]

for that every tickling and sting which are in certain pleasures, and that seem to raise us above simple health and passiveness, that active, moving, and, I know not how, itching and biting pleasure; even that very pleasure itself aims at nothing but insensibility as its mark. The appetite that carries us headlong to women's embraces has no other end but only to cure the torment of our ardent and furious desires, and only requires to be glutted and laid at rest, and delivered from the fever. And so of the rest. I say, then, that if simplicity conducts us to a state free from evil, she leads us to a very happy one according to our condition. And yet we are not to imagine it so stupid an insensibility as to be totally without sense: for Crantor had very good reason to controvert the insensibility of Epicurus, if founded so deep that the very first attack and birth of evils were not to be perceived: "I do not approve such an insensibility as is neither possible nor to be desired. I am very well content not to be sick; but if I am, I would know that I am so; and if a caustic be applied, or incisions made in any part, I would feel them."[5] In truth, whoever would take away the knowledge and sense of evil, would at the same time eradicate the sense of pleasure, and finally annihilate man himself: Istud nihil dolere non sine magna mercede contingit immanitatis in animo, stuporis in corde.[6] "An insensibility that is not to be purchased but at the price of inhumanity in the soul, and of stupidity of the body." Evil appertains to man of course. Neither is pain always to be avoided, nor pleasure always pursued.

Perfect insensibility neither possible nor desirable.

'Tis a great advantage to the honour of ignorance that knowledge itself throws us into its arms, when she finds herself puzzled to fortify us against the weight of evil; she is constrained to come to this composition, to give us the reins, and permit us to fly into the lap of the other, and to shelter ourselves under her protection from the strokes and injuries of fortune. For what else is her meaning when she instructs us to divert our thoughts from the ills that press upon us, and entertain them with the meditation of pleasures past and gone; to comfort ourselves in present afflictions with the remembrance of fled delights, and to call to our succour a vanished satisfaction, to oppose it to the discomfort that lies heavy upon us? Levationes ægritudinum in avocatione à cogitanda molestia, et revocatione ad contemplandas voluptates, ponit;[1] "he directs us to alleviate our grief and pains by rejecting unpleasant thoughts, and recalling agreeable ideas;" if it be not that where her power fails she would supply it with policy, and make use of sleight of hand where force of limbs will not serve her turn? For not only to a philosopher, but to any man in his right wits, when he has upon him the thirst of a burning fever, what satisfaction can it be to him to remember the pleasure he took in drinking Greek wine a month ago? It would rather only make matters worse to him:

Knowledge refers us to ignorance to screen us from the injuries of fortune.

[1] Montaigne here refers to Tasso, whom he saw at Ferrara, in November, 1580, confined in the Hospital of St. Anne, where he remained from March, 1579, till July, 1586. Curiously enough, Montaigne does not mention the circumstance in his journey. It is almost equally curious that Mr. Cotton refers his reader to Ariosto, instead of Tasso, though Ariosto was 59 years old when Montaigne came into the world.

Che ricordarsi il ben doppia la noia.[2]

"The thinking of pleasure doubles trouble."

Of the same stamp is this other counsel that philosophy gives, only to remember the happiness that is past, and to forget the misadventures we have undergone: as if we had the science of oblivion in our own power, and counsel, wherein we are yet no more to seek.

Suavis laborum est præteritorum memoria.[3]

"Sweet is the memory of by-gone pain."

How does philosophy, that should arm me to contend with fortune, and steel my courage to trample all human adversities under foot, arrive to this degree of cowardice to make me hide my head at this rate, and save myself by these pitiful and ridiculous shifts? For the memory represents to us not what we choose, but what she pleases; nay, there is nothing that so much imprints anything in our memory as a desire to forget it. And 'tis a good way to retain and keep anything safe in the soul to solicit her to lose it. And this is false: Est situm in nobis, ut et adversa quasi perpetua oblivione obruamus, et secunda jucunde et suaviter meminerimus;[4] "it is in our power to bury, as it were, in a perpetual oblivion all adverse accidents, and to retain a pleasant and delightful memory of our successes;" and this is true: Memini etiam quæ nolo; oblivisci non possum quæ volo.[5] "I do also remember what I would not; but I cannot forget what I would." And whose counsel is this? His,[6] qui se unus sapientem profiteri sit ausus;[7] "who alone durst profess himself a wise man."

Qui genus humanum ingenio superavit, et omnes
Præstinxit, stellas exortus uti æthereus Sol.[8]

"Who from mankind the prize of knowledge won,
And put the stars out like the rising sun."

To empty and disfurnish the memory, is not this the true way to ignorance?

Iners malorum remedium ignorantia est.[9]

"Ignorance is but a dull remedy for evils."

We find several other like precepts, whereby we are permitted to borrow frivolous appearances from the vulgar, where we find the strongest reason will not answer the purpose, provided they administer satisfaction and comfort. Where they cannot cure the wound they are content to palliate and benumb it. I believe they will not deny this, that if they could add order and constancy in a state of life that could maintain itself in ease and pleasure by some debility of judgment, they would accept it:

Potare, et spargere flores
Incipiam, patiarque vel inconsultus haberi.[10]

"Give me to drink, and, crown'd with flowers, despise
The grave disgrace of being thought unwise."

There would be a great many philosophers of Lycas's mind; this man, being otherwise of very regular manners, living quietly and contentedly in his family, and not failing in any office of his duty, either towards his own or strangers, and very carefully preserving himself from hurtful things, became, nevertheless, by some distemper in his brain, possessed with a conceit that he was perpetually in the theatre, a spectator of the finest sights and the best comedies in the world; and being cured by the physicians of his frenzy, was hardly prevented from endeavouring by suit to compel them to restore him again to his pleasing imagination:

Pol! me occidistis, amici,
Non servastis, ait; cui sic extorta voluptas,
Et demptus per vim mentis gratissimus error;[11]

"By heaven! you've killed me, friends, outright,
And not preserved me; since my dear delight
And pleasing error, by my better sense
Unhappily return'd, is banished hence:"

with a madness like that of Thrasylaus the son of Pythodorus, who made himself believe that all the ships that weighed anchor from the port of Piræus, and that came into the haven, only made their voyages for his profit: congratulating them upon their successful navigation, and receiving them with the greatest joy; and when his brother Crito caused him to be restored to his better understanding, he infinitely regretted that sort of condition wherein he had lived with so much delight and free from all anxiety of mind.[12] 'Tis according to the old Greek verse, that "there is a great deal of convenience in not being over-wise:"

Even that to which philosophy consents in general, that last remedy which she applies to all sorts of necessities, to put an end to the life we are not able to endure. Placet?—Pare. Non placet?—Quacumque vis, exi[2]—Pungit dolor?—Vel fodiat sane. Si nudus es, da jugulum; sin tectus armis Vulcaniis, id est fortitudine, resiste;[3] "Does it please?—Obey it. Not please?—Go where thou wilt. Does grief prick thee,—nay, stab thee?—If thou art naked present thy throat: if covered with the arms of Vulcan, that is fortitude, resist it." And this word, so used in the Greek festivals, aut bibat aut abeat,[4] "either drink or go," which sounds better upon the tongue of a Gascon,[5] who naturally changes the b into v, than on that of Cicero:

> Vivere si recte nescis, decede peritis.
> Lusisti satis, edisti satis, atque bibisti;
> Tempus abire tibi est, ne potum largius æquo
> Rideat, et pulset lasciva decentius ætas.[6]
>
> "If to live well and right thou dost not know,
> Give way, and leave thy place to those that do.
> Thou'st eaten, drunk, and play'd to thy content,
> 'Tis time to make thy parting compliment,
> Lest youth, more decent in their follies, scoff
> The nauseous scene, and hiss thee reeling off:"

What is it other than a confession of his impotency, and a sending back not only to ignorance, to be there in safety, but even to stupidity, insensibility, and non-entity?

> Democritum postquam matura vetustas

>
> "Soon as, through age, Democritus did find
> A manifest decadence in his mind,
> He thought he now surviv'd to his own wrong,
> And went to meet his death, that stay'd too long."

'Tis what Antisthenes said, "That a man should either make provision of sense to understand, or of a halter to hang himself;"[8] and what Chrysippus[9] alleged upon this saying of the poet Tyrtæus:

> "Or to arrive at virtue or at death:"

and Crates said, "That love would be cured by hunger, if not by time; and whoever disliked these two remedies, by a rope."[10] That Sextius,[11] of whom both Seneca and Plutarch speak with so high an encomium, having applied himself, all other things set aside, to the study of philosophy, resolved to throw himself into the sea, seeing the progress of his studies too tedious and slow. He ran to find death, since he could not overtake knowledge. These are the words of the law upon the subject: "If peradventure some great inconvenience happen, for which there is no remedy, the haven is near, and a man may save himself by swimming out of his body, as out of a leaky skiff; for 'tis the fear of dying, and not the love of life, that ties the fool to his body."

How love is to be cured.

As life renders itself by simplicity more pleasant, so more innocent and better, also it renders it as I was saying before: "The simple and ignorant," says St. Paul, "raise themselves up to heaven and take possession of it; and we, with all our knowledge, plunge ourselves into the infernal abyss." I am neither swayed by Valentinian,[12] a professed enemy to all learning and letters, nor by Licinius, both Roman emperors, who called them the poison and pest of all political government; nor by Mahomet, who, as 'tis said, interdicted all manner of learning to his followers: but the example of the great Lycurgus, and his authority, with the reverence of the divine Lacedæmonian policy, so great, so admirable, and so long flourishing in virtue and happiness, without any institution or practice of letters, ought certainly to be of very great weight. Such as return from the new world discovered by the Spaniards in our fathers' days testify to us how much more honestly and regularly those nations live, without magistrate and without law, than ours do, where there are more officers and lawyers than there are of other sorts of men and business:

garlick, but their stomachs were perfumed with a good conscience:[1] and that, on the contrary, those of his time were all sweet odour without, but stunk within of all sorts of vices; that is to say, as I interpret it, that they abounded with learning and eloquence, but were very defective in moral honesty. Incivility, ignorance, simplicity, roughness, are the natural companions of innocence: curiosity, subtlety, knowledge, bring malice in their train: humility, fear, obedience, and affability, which are the principal things that support and maintain human society, require an empty and docile soul, and little presuming upon itself. Christians have a particular knowledge, how natural and original an evil curiosity is in man; the thirst of knowledge, and the desire to become more wise, was the first ruin of man, and the way by which he precipitated himself into eternal damnation. Pride was his ruin and corruption. 'Tis pride that diverts him from the common path, and makes him embrace novelties, and rather choose to be head of a troop, lost and wandering in the path of error; to be a master and a teacher of lies, than to be a disciple in the school of truth, suffering himself to be led and guided by the hand of another, in the right and beaten road. 'Tis peradventure, the meaning of this old Greek saying, that superstition follows pride, and obeys it as if it were a father: ἡ δεισιδαιμονία καθάπερ πατρί τῷ τυφῷ πείθεται.[2] Ah! presumption, how much dost thou hinder us?

Fatal effects of curiosity and pride.

After that Socrates was told that the god of wisdom had assigned to him the title of sage, he was astonished at it, and, searching and examining himself throughout, could find no foundation for this divine judgment. He knew others as just, temperate, valiant, and learned as himself; and more eloquent, more handsome, and more profitable to their country than he. At last he concluded that he was not distinguished from others, nor wise, but only because he did not think himself so; and that his God considered the opinion of knowledge and wisdom as a singular absurdity in man; and that his best doctrine was the doctrine of ignorance, and simplicity his best wisdom.[3] The sacred word declares those miserable among us who have an opinion of themselves: "Dust and ashes," says it to such, "what hast thou wherein to glorify thyself?" And, in another place, "God has made man like unto a shadow," of whom who can judge, when by removing the light it shall be vanished? Man is a thing of nothing.

Our force is so far from being able to comprehend the divine height that, of the works of our Creator, those best bear his mark, and are with better title his, which we the least understand. To meet with an incredible thing is an occasion to Christians to believe; and it is so much the more according to reason, by how much it is against human reason.

Too curious an inquiry into the divine nature is to be condemned.

If it were according to reason, it would be no more a miracle; and if it were according to example, it would be no longer a singular thing. Melius scitur Deus, nesciendo:[4] "God is better known by not knowing him," says St. Austin: and Tacitus,[5] Sanctius est ac reverentius de actis Deorum credere, quam scire; "it is more holy and reverent to believe the works of God than to know them;" and Plato thinks there is something of impiety in inquiring too curiously into God, the world, and the first causes of things: Atque illum quidem parentem hujus universitatis invenire, difficile; et quum jam in veneris, indicare in vulgus, nefas:[6] "to find out the parent of the world is very difficult; and when found out, to reveal him to the vulgar is sin," says Cicero.

What our notions of the divine Being amount to.

We talk indeed of power, truth, justice; which are words that signify some great thing; but that thing we neither see nor conceive at all. We say that God fears, that God is angry, that God loves,

Immortalia mortali sermone notantes:[7]

"Giving to things immortal mortal names:"

These are all agitations and emotions that cannot be in God, according to our form, nor can we imagine them, according to his. It only belongs to God to know himself, and to interpret his own works; and he does it in our language, going out of himself, to stoop to us who grovel upon the earth. How can prudence, which is the choice between good and evil, be properly attributed to him whom no evil can touch? How can reason and intelligence, which we make use of, to arrive by obscure at apparent things; seeing that nothing is obscure to him? How justice, which distributes to every one what appertains to him, a thing begot by the society and community of men, how is that in God? How temperance, which is the moderation of corporal pleasures, that have no place in the Divinity? Fortitude to support pain, labour, and dangers, as little appertains to him as the rest; these three things have no access to him."[8] For which reason Aristotle[9] holds him equally exempt from virtue and vice: Neque gratia, neque ira teneri potest; quod quæ talia essent, imbecilla essent omnia.[10] "He can neither be affected with favour nor indignation, because both these are the effects of frailty."

Whence comes our knowledge of the truth.

The participation we have in the knowledge of truth, such as it is, is not acquired by our own force: God has sufficiently given us to understand that, by the witnesses he has chosen out of the common people, simple and ignorant men, that he has been pleased to employ to instruct us in his admirable secrets. Our faith is not of our own acquiring; 'tis purely the gift of another's bounty: 'tis not by meditation, or by virtue of our own understanding, that we have acquired our religion, but by foreign authority and command; wherein the imbecility of our own judgment does more assist us than any force of it; and our blindness more than our clearness of sight: 'tis more by the mediation of our ignorance than of our knowledge that we know any thing of the divine wisdom. 'Tis no wonder if our natural and earthly parts cannot conceive that supernatural and heavenly knowledge: let us bring nothing of our own, but obedience and subjection; for, as it is written, "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that, in the wisdom of God, the world knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe."[1]

Finally, should I examine whether it be in the power of man to find out that which he seeks, and if that quest, wherein he has busied himself so many ages, has enriched him with any new force, or any solid truth; I believe he will confess, if he speaks from his conscience, that all he has got by so long inquiry is only to have learned to know his own weakness. We have only by a long study confirmed and verified the natural ignorance we were in before. The same has fallen out to men truly wise, which befals the ears of corn; they shoot and raise their heads high and pert, whilst empty; but when full and swelled with grain in maturity, begin to flag and droop. So men, having tried and sounded all things, and having found in that mass of knowledge, and provision of so many various things, nothing solid and firm, and nothing but vanity, have quitted their presumption, and acknowledged their natural condition. 'Tis what Velleius reproaches Cotta withal and Cicero, "that they had learned of Philo, that they had learned nothing."[2] Pherecydes, one of the seven sages, writing to Thales upon his death-bed, "I have," said he, "given order to my people, after my interment, to carry my writings to thee. If they please thee and the other sages, publish; if not, suppress them. They contain no certainty with which I myself am satisfied. Neither do I pretend to know the truth, or to attain to it. I rather open than discover things."[3] The wisest man that ever was, being asked what he knew, made answer, "He knew this, that he knew nothing."[4] By which he verified what has been said, that the greatest part of what we know is the least of what we do not; that is to say, that even what we think we know is but a piece, and a very little one, of our ignorance. We know things in dreams, says Plato, and are ignorant of them in truth. Omnes pene veteres, nihil cognosci, nihil percipi, nihil sciri posse dixerunt; angustos sensus, imbecilles animos, brevia curricula vitæ.[5] "Almost all the ancients have declared that there is nothing to be known, nothing to be perceived or understood: the senses are too limited, men's minds too weak, and the course of life too short." And of Cicero himself, who stood indebted to his learning for all he was worth, Valerius says,[6] "That he began to disrelish letters in his old age; and when at his studies, it was with great independency upon any one party; following what he thought probable, now in one sect, and then in another, evermore wavering under the doubts of the academy." Dicendum est, sed ita ut nihil affirmem, quæram omnia, dubitans plerumque, et mihi diffidens.[7] "Something I must say, but so as to affirm nothing: I inquire into all things, but for the most part in doubt and distrust of myself."

I should have too fair a game should I consider man in his common way of living and in gross; yet I might do it by his own rule, who judges truth not by weight, but by the number of votes. Let us set the people aside,

> Qui vigilans stertit,
> Mortua cui vita est prope jam, vivo atque videnti;[8]
>
> "Half of his life by lazy sleep's possess'd,
> And when awake his soul but nods at best;"

who neither feel nor judge, and let most of their natural faculties lie idle: I will take man in his highest ground. Let us consider him in that little number of men, excellent and culled out from the rest, who, having been endowed with a remarkable and particular natural force, have moreover hardened and whetted it by care, study, and art, and raised it to the highest pitch of wisdom to which it can possibly arrive. They have adjusted their souls to all ways and all biases; have propped and supported them with all foreign helps proper for them, and enriched and adorned them with all they could borrow for their advantage, both within and without the world: 'tis in these is placed the utmost and most supreme height to which human nature can attain. They have regulated the world with policies and laws. They have instructed it with arts and sciences, and by the example of their admirable manners. I shall make account of none but such men as these, their testimony, and experience. Let us examine how far they have proceeded, and where they stopped. The errors and defects that we shall find amongst these men the world may boldly avow as their own.

All philosophy divided into three kinds.

Whoever goes in search of any thing must come to this, either to say that he has found it, or that it is not to be found, or that he is yet upon the search. All philosophy is divided into these three kinds; her design is to seek out truth, knowledge, and certainty. The Peripatetics, Epicureans, Stoics, and others, have thought they have found it. These established the sciences we have, and have treated of them as of certain knowledge. Clitomachus, Carneades, and the Academics, have despaired in their search, and concluded that truth could not be conceived by our understandings. The result of these is weakness and human ignorance. This sect has had the most and the most noble followers. Pyrrho, and other sceptics or epechists, whose dogmas are held by many of the ancients to be taken from Homer, the seven sages, and from Archilochus and Euripides, and to whose number these are added, Zeno, Democritus, and Xenophanes, say that they are yet upon the enquiry after truth. These conclude that the others, who think they have found it out, are infinitely deceived; and that it is too daring a vanity in the second sort to determine that human reason is not able to attain unto it; for this establishing a standard of our power, to know and judge the difficulty of things, is a great and extreme knowledge, of which they doubt whether man is capable:[1]

> Nil sciri si quis putat, id quoque nescit
> An sciri possit quo se nil scire fatetur.[2]
>
> "He that says nothing can be known, o'erthrows
> His own opinion, for he nothing knows,
> So knows not that."

The ignorance that knows itself, judges and condemns itself, is not an absolute ignorance: to be such, it must be ignorant of itself; so that the profession of the Pyrrhonians is to waver, doubt, and enquire, not to make themselves sure of, or responsible to themselves for any thing. Of the three actions of the soul, imaginative, appetitive, and consentive, they receive the two first; the last they kept ambiguous, without inclination or approbation, either of one thing or another, so light as it is. Zeno represented the motion of his imagination upon these divisions of the faculties of the soul thus: "An open and expanded hand signified appearance; a hand half shut, and the fingers a little bending, consent; a clenched fist, comprehension; when with the left he yet thrust the right fist closer, knowledge."[3] Now this situation of their judgment upright and inflexible, receiving all objects without application or consent, leads them to their ataraxy, which is a peaceable condition of life, temperate, and exempt from the agitations we receive by the impression of opinion and knowledge that we think we have of things: whence spring fear, avarice, envy, immoderate desires, ambition, pride, superstition, love of novelty, rebellion, disobedience, obstinacy, and the greatest part of bodily ills; nay, and by that they are exempt from the jealousy of their discipline: for they debate after a very gentle manner; they fear no requital in their disputes; when they affirm that heavy things descend they would be sorry to be believed, and love to be contradicted, to engender doubt and suspense of judgment, which is their end.

Doubt and suspense of judgment the principle of Pyrrhonism.

They only put forward their propositions to contend with those they think we have in our belief. If you take their arguments, they will as readily maintain the contrary: 'tis all one to them, they have no choice. If you maintain that snow is black, they will argue on the contrary that it is white; if you say it is neither the one nor the other, they will maintain that it is both. If you hold, of certain judgment, that you know nothing, they will maintain that you do. Yea, and if by an affirmative axiom you assure them that you doubt, they will argue against you that you doubt not; or that you cannot judge and determine that you doubt. And by this extremity of doubt, which justles itself, they separate and divide themselves from many opinions, even of those they have several ways maintained, both concerning doubt and ignorance. "Why shall not they be allowed to doubt," say they, "as well as the dogmatists, one of whom says green, another yellow? Can any thing be proposed to us to grant, or deny, which it shall not be permitted to consider as ambiguous?" And where others are carried away, either by the custom of their country, or by the instruction of parents, or by accident, as by a tempest, without judgment and without choice, nay, and for the most part before the age of discretion, to such and such an opinion, to the sect whether Stoic or Epicurean, with which they are prepossessed, enslaved, and fast bound, as to a thing they cannot forsake: Ad quamcumque disciplinam, velut tempestate, delati, ad eam, tanquam ad saxum, adhærescunt;[1] "every one cleaves to the doctrine he has happened upon, as to a rock against which he has been thrown by tempest;" why shall not these likewise be permitted to maintain their liberty, and consider things without obligation or slavery? hoc liberiores et solutiores, quod integra illis est judicandi potestas:[2] "in this more unconstrained and free, because they have the greater power of judging." Is it not of some advantage to be disengaged from the necessity that curbs others? Is it not better to remain in suspense than to entangle one's-self in the innumerable errors that human fancy has produced? Is it not much better to suspend one's persuasion than to intermeddle with these wrangling and seditious divisions: "What shall I choose?" "What you please, provided you will choose."[3] A very foolish answer; but such a one, nevertheless, as all dogmatism seems to point at, and by which we are not permitted to be ignorant of what we are ignorant of.

[1] In this very style does Sextus Empiricus, the famous Pyrrhonian, from whom Montaigne has taken many things, begin his treatise of the Pyrrhonian hypothesis; and infers, as Montaigne does, that there are three general methods of philosophising, the one dogmatic, the other academic, and the other sceptic. The first affirm they have found the truth, the next declare it to be above our comprehension, and the others are still in quest of it.

Take the most eminent side, that of the greatest reputation; it will never be so sure that you shall not be forced to attack and contend with a hundred and a hundred adversaries to defend it. Is it not better to keep out of this hurly-burly? You are permitted to embrace Aristotle's opinions of the immortality of the soul with as much zeal as your honour and life, and to give the lie to Plato thereupon, and shall they be interdicted to doubt him? If it be lawful for Panætius[4] to maintain his opinion about augury, dreams, oracles, vaticinations, of which the Stoics made no doubt at all; why may not a wise man dare to do the same in all things that he dared to do in those he had learned of his masters, established by the common consent of the school, whereof he is a professor and a member? If it be a child that judges, he knows not what it is; if a wise man, he is prepossessed. They have reserved for themselves a marvellous advantage in battle, having eased themselves of the care of defence. If you strike them, they care not, provided they strike too, and they turn every thing to their own use. If they overcome, your argument is lame; if you, theirs; if they fall short, they verify ignorance; if you fall short, you do it; if they prove that nothing is known, 'tis well; if they cannot prove it, 'tis also well: Ut quum in eadem re paria contrariis in partibus momenta inveniuntur, facilius ab utraque parte assensio sustineatur:[5] "That when like sentiments happen pro and con in the same thing, the assent may on both sides be more easily suspended." And they make account to find out, with much greater facility, why a thing is false than why 'tis true; that which is not, than that which is; and what they do not believe, than what they do. Their way of speaking is:—

The common style of the Pyrrhonians.

"I assert nothing; it is no more so than so, or than neither one nor t'other: I understand it not. Appearances are every where equal: the law of speaking, pro or con, is the same. Nothing seems true, that may not seem false." Their sacramental word is ἐπέχω, that is to say, "I hold, I stir not." This is the burden of their song, and others of like stuff. The effect of which is a pure, entire, perfect, and absolute suspension of judgment. They make use of their reason to inquire and debate, but not to fix and determine. Whoever shall imagine a perpetual confession of ignorance, a judgment without bias, propension, or inclination, upon any occasion whatever, conceives a true idea of Pyrrhonism. I express this fancy as well as I can, by reason that many find it hard to conceive, and the authors themselves represent it a little variously and obscurely.

Their manner of life.

As to what concerns the actions of life, they are in this of the common fashion. They yield and give up themselves to their natural inclinations,[6] to the power and impulse of passions, to the constitution of laws and customs, and to the tradition of arts: Non enim nos Deus ista scire, sed tantummodo uti voluit.[7] "For God would not have us know, but only use those things." They suffer their ordinary actions to be guided by those things, without any dispute or judgment. For which reason I cannot consent to what is said of Pyrrho, by those[8] who represent him heavy and immovable, leading a kind of savage and unsociable life, standing the justle of carts, going upon the edge of precipices, and refusing to accommodate himself to the laws. This is to enhance upon his discipline: he would never make himself a stock or a stone, he would show himself a living man, discoursing, reasoning, enjoying all reasonable conveniences and pleasures, employing and making use of all his corporal and spiritual faculties in rule and reason. The fantastic, imaginary, and false privileges that man had usurped of lording it, ordaining, and establishing, he has utterly quitted and renounced. Yet there is no sect but is constrained to permit her sage to follow several things not comprehended, perceived, or consented to, if he means to live. And if he goes to sea, he follows that design, not knowing whether his voyage shall be successful or no; and only insists upon the tightness of the vessel, the experience of the pilot, and the convenience of the season, and such probable circumstances; after which he is bound to go, and suffer himself to be governed by appearances, provided there be no express and manifest contrariety in them. He has a body, he has a soul; the senses push them, the mind spurs them on. And although he does not find in himself this proper and singular sign of judging, and that he perceives that he ought not to engage his consent, considering that there may be some false, equal to these true, appearances, yet does he not, for all that, fail of carrying on the offices of his life with great liberty and convenience. How many arts are there that profess to consist more in conjecture than knowledge; that decide not on true and false, and only follow that which seems so! There are, say they, true and false, and we have in us wherewith to seek it; but not to make it stay when we touch it. We are much more prudent, in letting ourselves be regulated by the order of the world, without inquiry. A soul clear from prejudice has a marvellous advance towards tranquillity and repose. Men that judge and control their judges, do never duly submit to them.

What minds are best disposed to submit to religion, and the rules of vernment.

How much more docile and easy to be governed, both by the laws of religion and civil polity, are simple and incurious minds, than those over-vigilant wits, that will still be prating of divine and human causes! There is nothing in human invention that carries so great a show of likelihood and utility as this; this presents man, naked and empty, confessing his natural weakness, fit to receive some foreign force from above, unfurnished of human, and therefore more apt to receive into him the divine knowledge, making nought of his own judgment, to give more room to faith; neither disbelieving nor establishing any dogma against common observances; humble, obedient, disciplinable, and studious; a sworn enemy of heresy; and consequently freeing himself from vain and irreligious opinions, introduced by false sects. 'Tis a blank paper prepared to receive such forms from the finger of God as he shall please to write upon it. The more we resign and commit ourselves to God, and the more we renounce ourselves, of the greater value we are. "Take in good part," says Ecclesiastes, "the things that present themselves to thee, as they seem and taste from hand to mouth: the rest is out of thy knowledge."[1] Dominus novit cogitationes hominum, quoniam vanæ sunt: "The Lord knoweth the hearts of men, that they are but vanity."[2]

Thus we see that of the three general sects of philosophy, two make open profession of doubt and ignorance; and in that of the dogmatists, which is the third, it is easy to discover that the greatest part of them only assume this face of confidence and assurance that they may produce the better effect; they have not so much thought to establish any certainty for us, as to show us how far they have proceeded in their search of truth: Quam docti fingunt magis quam norunt:[3] "Which the learned rather feign than know." Timæus, being to instruct Socrates in what he knew of the gods, the world, and men, proposes to speak to him as a man to a man; and that it is sufficient, if his reasons are probable as those of another; for that exact reasons were neither in his nor any other mortal hand; which one of his followers has thus imitated: Ut potero explicabo: nec tamen, ut Pythius Apollo, certa ut sint et fixa quæ dixero; sed, ut homunculus, probabilia conjectura sequens;[4] "I will, as well as I am able, explain; affirming, yet not as the Pythian oracle, that what I say is fixed and certain, but like a mere man, that follows probabilities by conjecture." And this, upon the natural and common subject of the contempt of death: he has elsewhere translated from the very words of Plato: Si forte, de Deorum natura ortuque mundi disserentes, minus id quod habemus in animo consequimur, haud erit mirum: æquum est enim meminisse, et me, qui disseram, hominem esse, et vos, qui judicetis, ut, si probabilia dicentur, nihil ultra requiratis.[5] "If perchance, when we discourse of the nature of God, and the world's original, we cannot do it as we desire, it will be no great wonder. For it is just you should remember that both I who speak and you who are to judge, are men: so that if probable things are delivered, you shall require and expect no more." Aristotle ordinarily heaps up a great number of other men's opinions and beliefs, to compare them with his own, and to let us see how much he has gone beyond them, and how much nearer he approaches to the likelihood of truth; for truth is not to be judged by the authority and testimony of others; which made Epicurus religiously avoid quoting them in his writings. This is the prince of all dogmatists, and yet we are told by him that the more we know the more we have room for doubt.[6] In earnest, we sometimes see him shroud and muffle up himself in so thick and so inextricable an obscurity that we know not what to make of his advice; it is, in effect, a Pyrrhonism under a resolutive form. Hear Cicero's protestation, who expounds to us another's fancy by his own: Qui requirunt quid de quaque re ipsi sentiamus curiosius id faciunt quam necesse est. . . Hæc in philosophia ratio contra omnia disserendi, nullamque

This practice in philosophy of disputing against every thing, and of absolutely concluding nothing, begun by Socrates, repeated by Arcesilaus, and confirmed by Carneades, has continued in use even to our own times. We are they who declare that there is so great a mixture of things false amongst all that are true, and they so resemble one another, that there can be in them no certain mark to direct us either to judge or assent." Why hath not Aristotle only, but most of the philosophers, affected difficulty, if not to set a greater value upon the vanity of the subject, and amuse the curiosity of our minds by giving them this hollow and fleshless bone to pick? Clitomachus affirmed "That he could never discover by Carneades's writings what opinion he was of."[2] This was it that made Epicurus affect to be abstruse, and that procured Heraclitus the epithet of σκοτεινὸς.[3] Difficulty is a coin the learned make use of, like jugglers, to conceal the vanity of their art, and which human sottishness easily takes for current pay.

Cicero[5] reprehends some of his friends for giving more of their time to the study of astrology, logic, and geometry, than they were really worth; saying that they were by these diverted from the duties of life, and from more profitable and proper studies. The Cyrenaick philosophers, in like manner, despised physics and logic. Zeno, in the very beginning of the books of the commonwealth, declared all the liberal arts of no use.[6] Chrysippus said "That what Plato and Aristotle had writ, concerning logic, they had only done in sport, and by way of exercise;" and could not believe that they spoke in earnest of so vain a thing.[7] Plutarch says the same of metaphysics. And Epicurus would have said as much of rhetoric, grammar, poetry, mathematics, and, natural philosophy excepted, of all the sciences; and Socrates of them all, excepting that which treats of manners and of life. Whatever any one required to be instructed in, by him, he would ever, in the first place, demand an account of the conditions of his life present and past, which he examined and judged, esteeming all other learning subsequent to that and supernumerary: Parum mihi placeant eæ litteræ, quæ ad virtutem doctoribus nihil profuerunt.[8] "That learning is in small repute with me which nothing profited the teachers themselves to virtue." Most of the arts have been in like manner decried by the same knowledge; but they did not consider that it was from the purpose to exercise their wits in those very matters wherein there was no solid advantage.

The liberal arts despised by some of the sects of the philosophers.

As to the rest, some have looked upon Plato as a dogmatist, others as a doubter, others in some things the one, and in other things the other. Socrates, the conductor of his dialogues, is eternally upon questions and stirring up disputes, never determining, never satisfying, and professes to have no other science but that of opposing himself. Homer, their author, has equally laid the foundations of all the sects of philosophy, to shew how indifferent it was which way we should choose. 'Tis said that

[1] Cicero, de Nat. Deor. i. 5.

[2] Montaigne (remarks Mr. Coste) has supposed this to be the meaning of Cicero, whose words are these:—"The opinion of which Calliphon Carneades so studiously defended that he even seemed to approve of it, although Clitomachus affirmed that he never could understand what was approved by Carneades."—Acad. Quæst. x. 45. But this is not saying "That Clitomachus asserted that, by the writings of Carneades, he could never discover his opinion." The dispute is not what were the opinions of Carneades in the general, but what he used to say in defence of Calliphon's private opinion concerning what constitutes man's chief good. Forasmuch as Carneades was an Academician, he could not advance any thing positive or clearly decisive upon this important question, which was the reason that Clitomachus never could understand what was the opinion of Carneades in this matter. Calliphon made the chief good consist in pleasure and virtue both together, which, says Cicero, Carneades also was not willing to contradict, "not that he approved it, but that he might oppose the Stoics; not to decide the thing, but to embarrass the Stoics."—Acad. Quæst. iv. 42. In this same book Cicero explains to us several of Carneades's opinions; and, what is very remarkable, he only does it as they are set forth by Clitomachus. "Having," says he, "explained all that Carneades says upon this subject, all those opinions of Antiochus (the Stoic) will fall to the ground. But, for fear lest I should be suspected of making him say what I think, I shall deliver nothing but what I collect from Clitomachus, who passed his life with Carneades till he was an old man, and, being a Carthaginian, was a man of great penetration, very studious, moreover, and very exact." Acad. Quæst. iv. 31. "I have," says Cicero, "a little before explained to you, from the words of Clitomachus, in what sense Carneades declared these matters." These very things Cicero repeats afterwards, where he transcribes them from a book which Clitomachus had composed and addressed to the poet Lucilius. After this, how could Cicero make Clitomachus say that, by the writings of Carneades in general he could never discover what were his sentiments? The truth is that Clitomachus had not read the writings of Carneades; for, except some letters that he wrote to Anarathes, king of Cappadocia, which ran in his name, the rest of his opinions, as Diogenes Laertius says expressly, were preserved in the books of his disciples.—In Vita Carneadis. The same historian tells us that Clitomachus, who composed above 400 volumes, applied himself above all things to illustrate the sentiments of Carneades, whom he succeeded.

ten several sects sprung from Plato; yet, in my opinion, never did any instruction halt and stumble, if his does not.[1]

Socrates said that midwives,[2] in taking upon them the trade of helping others to bring forth, left the trade of bringing forth themselves; and that by the title of a wise man or sage, which the gods had conferred upon him, he was disabled, in his virile and mental love, of the faculty of bringing forth, contenting himself to help and assist those that could; to open their nature, anoint the passes, and facilitate their birth; to judge of the infant, baptize, nourish, fortify, swath, and circumcise it, exercising and employing his understanding in the perils and fortunes of others.

It is so with the most part of this third sort of authors, as the ancients have observed in the writings of Anaxagoras, Democritus, Parmenides, Xenophanes, and others. They have a way of writing, doubtful in substance and design, rather enquiring than teaching, though they mix their style with some dogmatical periods. Is not the same thing seen in Seneca and Plutarch? How many contradictions are there to be found if a man pry narrowly into them! So many that the reconciling lawyers ought first to reconcile them every one to themselves. Plato seems to have affected this method of philosophising in dialogues; to the end that he might with greater decency, from several mouths, deliver the diversity and variety of his own fancies. It is as well to treat variously of things as to treat of them conformably, and better, that is to say, more copiously and with greater profit. Let us take example from ourselves: judgments are the utmost point of all dogmatical and determinative speaking; and yet those arrêts that our parliaments give the people, the most exemplary of them, and those most proper to nourish in them the reverence due to that dignity, principally through the sufficiency of the persons acting, derive their beauty not so much from the conclusion, which with them is quotidian and common to every judge, as from the dispute and heat of divers and contrary arguments that the matter of law and equity will permit. And the largest field for reprehension that some philosophers have against others is drawn from the diversities and contradictions wherein every one of them finds himself perplexed, either on purpose to shew the vacillation of the human mind concerning every thing, or ignorantly compelled by the volubility and incomprehensibility of all matter; which is the meaning of the maxim—"In a slippery and sliding place let us suspend our belief;" for, as Euripides says,

"God's various works perplex the thoughts of men."[3]

Like that which Empedocles, as if transported with a divine fury, and compelled by truth, often strewed here and there in his writings: "No, no, we feel nothing, we see nothing; all things are concealed from us; there is not one thing of which we can positively say what it is;"[4] according to the divine saying: Cogitationes mortalium timidæ, et incertæ ad inventiones nostræ et providentiæ.[5] "For the thoughts of mortal men are doubtful; and our devices are but uncertain." It is not to be thought strange if men, despairing to overtake what they hunt after, have not however lost the pleasure of the chace; study being of itself so pleasant an employment; and so pleasant that amongst the pleasures, the Stoics forbid that also which proceeds from the exercise of the mind, will have it cubred, and find a kind of intemperance in too much knowledge.

The search of truth a very agreeable occupation.

Democritus having eaten figs[6] at his table that tasted of honey, fell presently to considering with himself whence they should derive this unusual sweetness; and, to be satisfied in it, was about to rise from the table to see the place whence the figs had been gathered; which his maid observing, and having understood the cause, smilingly told him that "he need not trouble himself about that, for she had put them into a vessel in which there had been honey." He was vexed at this discovery, and that she had deprived him of the occasion of this enquiry, and robbed his curiosity of matter to work upon: "Go thy way," said he, "thou hast done me an injury; but, for all that, I will seek out the cause as if it were natural;" and would willingly have found out some true reason for a false and imaginary effect. This story of a famous and great philosopher very clearly represents to us that studious passion that puts us upon the pursuit of things, of the acquisition of which we despair. Plutarch gives a like example of some one who would not be satisfied in that whereof he was in doubt, that he might not lose the pleasure of enquiring into it: like the other who would not that his physician should allay the thirst of his fever, that he might not lose the pleasure of quenching it by drinking. Satius est supervacua discere, quam nihil.[7] "'Tis better to learn more than necessary than nothing at all." As in all sorts of feeding, the pleasure of eating is very often single and alone, and that what we take, which is acceptable to the palate, is not always nourishing or wholesome; so that which our minds extract from science does not cease to be pleasant, though there be nothing in it either nutritive or healthful. Thus they say: "The consideration of nature is a diet proper for our minds, it raises and elevates us, makes us disdain low and terrestrial things, by comparing them with those that are celestial and high. The mere inquisition into great and occult things is very pleasant, even to those who acquire no other benefit than the reverence and fear of judging it." This is what they profess.[1] The vain image of this sickly curiosity is yet more manifest in this other example which they so often urge. "Eudoxus wished and begged of the gods that he might once see the sun near at hand, to comprehend the form, greatness, and beauty of it; even though he should thereby be immediately burned."[2] He would at the price of his life purchase a knowledge, of which the use and possession should at the same time be taken from him: and for this sudden and vanishing knowledge lose all the other knowledge he had in present, or might afterwards have acquired.

The atoms of Epicurus, the ideas of Plato, the numbers of Pythagoras, to what end they were advanced.

I cannot easily persuade myself that Epicurus, Plato, and Pythagoras, have given us their atoms, ideas, and numbers, for current pay. They were too wise to establish their articles of faith upon things so disputable and uncertain. But in that obscurity and ignorance in which the world then was, every one of these great men endeavoured to present some kind of image or reflection of light, and worked their brains for inventions that might have a pleasant and subtle appearance; provided that, though false, they might make good their ground against those that would oppose them. Unicuique ista pro ingenio finguntur, non ex scientiæ vi.[3] "These things every one fancies according to his wit, and not by any power of knowledge."

What is true philosophy. Conduct of the philosophers with regard to religion and to the laws.

One of the ancients, who was reproached, "That he professed philosophy, of which he nevertheless in his own judgment made no great account," made answer, "That this was truly to philosophize." They wished to consider all, to balance every thing, and found that an employment well suited to our natural curiosity. Some things they wrote for the benefit of public society, as their religions; and for that consideration it was but reasonable that they should not examine public opinions to the quick, that they might not disturb the common obedience to the laws and customs of their country.

Plato treats of this mystery with a raillery manifest enough: for where he writes according to his own method he gives no certain rule. When he plays the legislator he borrows a magisterial and positive style, and boldly there foists in his most fantastic inventions, as fit to persuade the vulgar, as impossible to be believed by himself; knowing very well how fit we are to receive all sorts of impressions, especially the most immoderate and preposterous: and yet, in his Laws, he takes singular care that nothing be sung in public but poetry, of which the fiction and fabulous relations tend to some advantageous end; it being so easy to imprint all sorts of phantasms in human minds, that it were injustice not to feed them rather with profitable untruths than with untruths that are unprofitable and hurtful. He says very roundly, in his Republic,[4] "That it is often necessary, for the benefit of men, to deceive them." It is very easy to distinguish that some of the sects have more followed truth, and the others utility, by which the last have gained their reputation. 'Tis the misery of our condition that often that which presents itself to our imagination for the truest does not appear the most useful to life. The boldest sects, as the Epicurean, Pyrrhonian, and the new Academic, are yet constrained to submit to the civil law at the end of the account.

There are other subjects that they have tumbled and tossed about, some to the right and others to the left, every one endeavouring, right or wrong, to give them some kind of colour; for, having found nothing so abstruse that they would not venture to speak of, they are very often forced to forge weak and ridiculous conjectures; not that they themselves looked upon them as any foundation, or establishing any certain truth, but merely for exercise. Non tam id sensisse quod dicerent, quam exercere ingenia materiæ difficultate videntur voluisse. "They seem not so much themselves to have believed what they said, as to have had a mind to exercise their wits in the difficulty of the matter." And if we did not take it thus, how should we palliate so great inconstancy, variety, and vanity of opinions, as we see have been produced by those excellent and admirable men? As, for example, what can be more vain than to imagine, to guess at God, by our analogies and conjectures? To direct and govern him and the world by our capacities and our laws? And to serve ourselves, at the expense of the divinity, with that small portion of capacity he has been pleased to impart to our natural condition; and because we cannot extend our sight to his glorious throne, to have brought him down to our corruption and our miseries?

The most probable of all human opinions touching religion.

Of all human and ancient opinions concerning religion, that seems to me the most likely and most excusable, that acknowledged God as an incomprehensible power, the original and preserver of all things, all goodness, all perfection, receiving and taking in good part the honour and reverence that man paid him, under what method, name, or ceremonies soever:

> "Jove, the almighty, author of all things,
> The father, mother, of both gods and kings."

This zeal has universally been looked upon from heaven with a gracious eye. All governments have reaped fruit from their devotion: impious men and actions have everywhere had suitable events. Pagan histories acknowledge dignity, order, justice, prodigies, and oracles, employed for their profit and instruction in their fabulous religions: God, through his mercy, vouchsafing, by these temporal benefits, to cherish the tender principles of a kind of brutish knowledge that natural reason gave them of him, through the deceiving images of their dreams. Not only deceiving and false, but impious also and injurious, are those that man has forged from his own invention; and of all the religions that St. Paul found in repute at Athens, that which they had dedicated "to the unknown God seemed to him the most to be excused.[2]

What the knowledge of God was among the Pagans.

The unknown God adored at Athens.

Pythagoras shadowed the truth a little more closely, judging that the knowledge of this first cause and being of beings ought to be indefinite, without limitation, without declaration; that it was nothing else than the extreme effort of our imagination towards perfection, every one amplifying the idea according to the talent of his capacity. But if Numa attempted to conform the devotion of his people to this project; to attach them to a religion purely mental, without any prefixed object and material mixture, he undertook a thing of no use: the human mind could never support itself floating in such an infinity of inform thoughts; there is required some certain image to be presented according to its own model. The divine majesty has thus, in some sort, suffered himself to be circumscribed in corporal limits for our advantage. His supernatural and celestial sacraments have signs of our earthly condition; his adoration is by sensible offices and words; for 'tis man that believes and prays. I shall omit the other arguments upon this subject: but a man would have much ado to make me believe that the sight of our crucifixes, that the picture of our Saviour's passion, that the ornaments and ceremonious motions of our churches, that the voices accommodated to the devotion of our thoughts, and that emotion of the senses, do not warm the souls of the people with a religious passion of very advantageous effect.

Of those to whom they have given a body, as necessity required in that universal blindness, I should, I fancy, most incline to those who adored the sun:

> La Lumiére commune,
> L'œil du monde; et si Dieu au chef porte des yeulx,
> Les rayons du soleil sont ses yeulx radieux,
> Qui donnent vie a touts, nous maintiennent et gardent;
> Et les faicts des humains en ce monde regardent:
> Ce beau, ce grand soleil, qui nous faict les saisons,
> Selon qu'il entre ou sort de ses douze maisons;
> Qui remplit l'univers de ses vertus cogneues;
> Qui d'un traict de ses yeulx nous dissipe les nues:
> L'esprit, l'ame du monde, ardent et flamboyant,
> En la course d'un jour tout le Ciel tournoyant;
> Plein d'immense grandeur, rond, vagabond, et ferme;
> Lequel tient dessoubs luy tout le monde pour terme:
> En repos, sans repos; oysif, et sans sejour;
> Fils aisné de nature, et le pere du jour:[3]

forasmuch as, beside this grandeur and beauty of his, 'tis the only piece of this machine that we discover at the remotest distance from us; and by that means so little known that they were pardonable for entering into so great admiration and reverence of it.

Thales,[4] who first inquired into this sort of matter, believed God to be a Spirit that made all things of water; Anaximander, that the gods were always dying and entering into life again; and that there were an infinite number of worlds; Anaximines, that the air was God, that he was procreate and immense, always moving. Anaxagoras the first, was of opinion that the description and manner of all things were conducted by the power and reason of an infinite spirit. Alcmæon gave divinity to the sun, moon, and stars, and to the soul. Pythagoras made God a spirit, spread over the nature of all things, whence our souls are extracted; Parmenides, a circle surrounding the heaven, and supporting the world by the ardour of light. Empedocles pronounced the four elements, of which all things are composed, to be gods; Protagoras had nothing to say, whether they were or were not, or what they were; Democritus was one while of opinion that the images and their circuitions were gods; another while, the nature that darts out those images; and then, our science and intelligence. Plato divides his belief into several opinions: he says, in his Timæus, that the Father of the World cannot be named; in his Laws, that men are not to inquire into his being; and elsewhere, in the very same books, he makes the world, the heavens, the stars, the earth, and our souls, gods; admitting, moreover, those which have been received by ancient institution in every republic. Xenophon reports a like perplexity in Socrates's doctrine; one while that men are not to inquire into the form of God, and presently makes him maintain that the sun is God, and the soul God; that there is but one God, and then that there are many. Speusippus, the nephew of Plato, makes God a certain power governing all things, and that he has a soul. Aristotle one while says it is the spirit, and another the world; one while he gives the world another master, and another while makes God the heat of heaven. Zenocrates makes eight, five named amongst the planets; the sixth composed of all the fixed stars, as of so many members; the seventh and eighth, the sun and moon. Heraclides Ponticus does nothing but float in his opinion, and finally deprives God of sense, and makes him shift from one form to another, and at last says that it is heaven and earth. Theophrastus wanders in the same irresolution amongst his fancies, attributing the superintendency of the world one while to the understanding, another while to heaven, and then to the stars. Strato says that 'tis nature, she having the power of generation, augmentation, and diminution, without form and sentiment. Zeno says 'tis the law of nature, commanding good and prohibiting evil; which law is an animal; and takes away the accustomed gods, Jupiter, Juno, and Vesta. Diogenes Apolloniates, that 'tis air.[1] Zenophanes makes God round, seeing and hearing, not breathing, and having nothing in common with human nature. Aristo thinks the form of God to be incomprehensible, deprives him of sense, and knows not whether he be an animal or something else; Cleanthes, one while supposes it to be reason, another while the world, another the soul of nature, and then the supreme heat rolling about, and environing all. Perseus, Zeno's disciple, was of opinion that men have given the title of gods to such as have been useful, and have added any notable advantage to human life, and even to profitable things themselves. Chrysippus made a confused heap of all the preceding theories, and reckons, amongst a thousand forms of gods that he makes, the men also that have been deified. Diagoras and Theodorus flatly denied that there were any gods at all. Epicurus makes the gods shining, transparent, and perflable, lodged as betwixt two forts, betwixt two worlds, secure from blows, clothed in a human figure, and with such members as we have; which members are to them of no use:

> Ego Deum genus esse semper dixi, et dicam cœlitum;
> Sed eos non curare opinor, quid agat humanum genus.[2]
>
> "I ever thought that gods above there were,
> But do not think they care what men do here."

Trust to your philosophy, my masters; and brag that you have found the bean in the cake when you see what a rattle is here with so many philosophical heads! The perplexity of so many worldly forms has gained this over me, that manners and opinions contrary to mine do not so much displease as instruct me; nor so much make me proud as they humble me, in comparing them. And all other choice than what comes from the express and immediate hand of God seems to me a choice of very little privilege. The policies of the world are no less opposite upon this subject than the schools, by which we may understand that fortune itself is not more variable and inconstant, nor more blind and inconsiderate, than our reason. The things that are most unknown are most proper to be deified; wherefore to make gods of ourselves, as the ancients did, exceeds the extremest weakness of understanding. I would much rather have gone along with those who adored the serpent, the dog, or the ox: forasmuch as their nature and being is less known to us, and that we have more room to imagine what we please of those beasts, and to attribute to them extraordinary faculties. But to have made gods of our own condition, of whom we ought to know the imperfections; and to have attributed to them desire, anger, revenge, marriages, generation, alliances, love, jealousy, our members, and bones, our fevers and pleasures, our death and obsequies; this must needs have proceeded from a marvellous inebriety of the human understanding;

To make gods of men is the utmost degree of extravagance.

> Quæ procul usque adeo divino ab numine distant,
> Inque Deum numero quæ sint indigna videri;[3]
>
> "From divine natures these so distant are,
> They are unworthy of that character."

Formæ, ætates, vestitus, ornatus noti sunt; genera, conjugia, cognationes, omniaque traducta ad similitudinem imbecillitatis humanæ: nam et perturbatis animis inducuntur; accipimus enim deorum cupiditates, ægritudines, ira-

[1] This word having been misprinted age in the earlier editions of the Essays, the blunder has been hitherto carefully retained, though one of the most obvious description. Cicero himself, from whom Montaigne is quoting, says expressly elsewhere (De Nat. Deor. i. 12.), that "air is the god of Diogenes Apolloniates;" with him agrees St. Austin, in his book de Civitate Dei, viii. 2. from whom it also appears that this philosopher ascribed sense to the air, and that he called it the matter out of which all things were formed, and that it was endowed with divine reason, without which nothing could be made. M. Bayle, in his dictionary at the article of "Diogenes of Apollonia," infers, "that he made a whole, or a compound, of air and the divine virtue, in which, if air was the matter, the divine virtue was the soul and form; and that, by consequence, the air, animated by the divine virtue, ought, according to that philosopher, to be styled God. As for the rest, this philosopher, by ascribing understanding to the air, differed from his master Anaximenes, who thought the air inanimate." Montaigne himself says, further on in the chapter, "Either the infinity of nature of Anaximander, or the air of Diogenes, or the numbers and symmetries of Pythagoras."

cundias;[1] "Their forms, ages, clothes, and ornaments are known: their descents, marriages, and kindred, and all adapted to the similitude of human weakness; for they are represented to us with anxious minds, and we read of the lusts, sickness, and anger of the gods;" as having attributed divinity not only to faith, virtue, honour, concord, liberty, victory, and piety; but also to voluptuousness, fraud, death, envy, old age, misery; to fear, fever, ill fortune, and other injuries of our frail and transitory life:

> Quid juvat hoc, templis nostros inducere mores?
> O curvæ in terris animæ, et cœlestium inanes!"[2]
>
> "O earth-born souls! by earth-born passions led,
> To every spark of heav'nly influence dead!
> Think ye that what man values will inspire
> In minds celestial the same base desire?"

The Egyptians, with an impudent prudence, interdicted, upon pain of hanging, that any one should say that their gods, Serapis and Isis, had formerly been men; and yet no one was ignorant that they had been such; and their effigies, represented with the finger upon the mouth, signified, says Varro,[3] that mysterious decree to their priests, to conceal their mortal original, as it must by necessary consequence cancel all the veneration paid to them. Seeing that man so much desired to equal himself to God, he had done better, says Cicero,[4] to have attracted those divine conditions to himself, and drawn them down hither below, than to send his corruption and misery up on high: but, to take it right, he has several ways done both the one and the other, with like vanity of opinion.

Whether the philosophers were serious in treating of the hierarchy of their gods, and of the condition of men in another life.

When philosophers search narrowly into the hierarchy of their gods, and make a great bustle about distinguishing their alliances, offices, and power, I cannot believe they speak as they think. When Plato describes Pluto's orchard to us, and the bodily conveniences or pains that attend us after the ruin and annihilation of our bodies, and accommodates them to the feeling we have in this life:

> Secreti celant calles, et myrtea circum
> Sylva tegat; curæ non ipsa in morte relinquunt;[5]
>
> "In secret vales and myrtle groves they lie, > Nor do cares leave them even when they die."

when Mahomet promises his followers a Paradise hung with tapestry, gilded and enamelled with gold and precious stones, furnished with wenches of excelling beauty, rare wines, and delicates dishes; it is easily discerned that these are deceivers that accommodate their promises to our sensuality, to attract and allure us by hopes and opinions suitable to our mortal appetites. And yet some amongst us are fallen into the like error, promising to themselves after the resurrection a terrestrial and temporal life, accompanied with all sorts of worldly conveniences and pleasures. Can we believe that Plato, he who had such heavenly conceptions, and was so well acquainted with the Divinity as thence to derive the name of the Divine Plato, ever thought that the poor creature, man, had any thing in him applicable to that incomprehensible power? and that he believed that the weak holds we are able to take were capable, or the force of our understanding sufficient, to participate of beatitude or eternal pains? We should then tell him from human reason: "If the pleasures thou dost promise us in the other life are of the same kind that I have enjoyed here below, this has nothing in common with infinity; though all my five natural senses should be even loaded with pleasure, and my soul full of all the contentment it could hope or desire, we know what all this amounts to, all this would be nothing: if there be any thing of mine there, there is nothing divine; if this be no more than what may belong to our present condition, it cannot be of any value. All contentment of mortals is mortal. Even the knowledge of our parents, children, and friends, if that can affect and delight us in the other world, if that still continues a satisfaction to us there, we still remain in earthly and finite conveniences. We cannot as we ought conceive the greatness of these high and divine promises, if we could in any sort conceive them: to have a worthy imagination of them we must imagine them unimaginable, inexplicable, and incomprehensible, and absolutely another thing than those of our miserable experience. "Eye hath not seen," saith St. Paul, "nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him."[6] And if, to render us capable, our being were reformed and changed (as thou, Plato, sayest, by thy purifications), it ought to be so extreme and total a change that, by physical doctrine it will be no more us;

What must be the change of our being to qualify us for eternal happiness.

> Hector erat tunc cum bello certabat; at ille
> Tractus ab Æmonio non erat Hector equo;[7]

> "He Hector was whilst he could fight, but when > Dragg'd by Achilles' steeds, no Hector then;"

it must be something else that must receive these recompenses:

> Quod mutatur . . . dissolvitur; interit ergo:
> Trajiciuntur enim partes, atque ordine migrant.[8]
>
> "Things changed dissolved are, and therefore die;
> Their parts are mix'd, and from their order fly."

the change of habitation that he imagined in souls, can we believe that the lion, in whom the soul of Cæsar is enclosed, does espouse Cæsar's passions, or that the lion is he? For if it was still Cæsar, they would be in the right who, controverting this opinion with Plato, reproach him that the son might be seen to ride his mother transformed into a mule, and the like absurdities. And can we believe that in the mutations that are made of the bodies of animals into others of the same kind, the new comers are not other than their predecessors? From the ashes of a phœnix, a worm, they say, is engendered, and from that another phœnix;[1] who can imagine that this second phœnix is no other than the first? We see our silk-worms, as it were, die and wither; and from this withered body a butterfly is produced; and from that another worm; how ridiculous would it be to imagine that this was still the first! That which once has ceased to be is no more:

> Nec, si materiam nostram collegerit ætas
> Post obitum, rursumque redegerit, ut sita nunc est,
> Atque iterum nobis fuerint data lumina vitæ,
> Pertineat quidquam tamen ad nos id quoque factum,
> Interrupta semel cum sit repetentia nostra.[2]
>
> "Neither tho' time should gather and restore
> Our matter to the form it was before,
> And give again new light to see withal,
> Would that new figure us concern at all;
> Or we again ever the same be seen,
> Our being having interrupted been."

And, Plato, when thou sayest in another place that it shall be the spiritual part of man that will be concerned in the fruition of the recompense of another life, thou tellest us a thing whereon there is as little appearance of truth:

> Scilicet, avolsis radicibus, ut nequit ullam
> Dispicere ipsa oculus rem, seorsum corpore toto;[3]
>
> "No more than eyes once from their optics torn,
> Can ever after any thing discern;"

for, by this account, it would no more be man, nor consequently us, who would be concerned in this enjoyment: for we are composed of two principal essential parts, the separation of which is the death and ruin of our being:

> Inter enim jecta est vitæ pausa, vageque
> Decerrarunt passim motus ab sensibus omnes;[4]
>
> "When once that pause of life is come between,
> 'Tis just the same as we had never been;"

we cannot say that the man suffers when the worms feed upon his members, and that the earth consumes them:

> Et nihil hoc ad nos, qui coitu conjugioque
> Corporis atque animæ consistimus uniter apti.[5]
>
> "What's that to us? for we are only we,
> While soul and body in one frame agree."

Moreover, upon what foundation of their justice can the gods take notice of or reward man after his death for his good and virtuous actions, since it was themselves that put them in the way and mind to do them? And why should they be offended at or punish him for wicked ones, since themselves have created in him so frail a condition, and when, with one glance of their will, they might prevent him from falling? Might not Epicurus, with great colour of human reason, object this to Plato, did he not often save himself with this sentence: "That it is impossible to establish any thing certain of the immortal nature by the mortal?" She does nothing but err throughout, but especially when she meddles with divine things. Who does more evidently perceive this than we? For although we have given her certain and infallible principles; and though we have enlightened her steps with the sacred lamp of truth that it has pleased God to communicate to us; we daily see, nevertheless, that if she swerve never so little from the ordinary path; and that she stray from, or wander out of the way set out and beaten by the church, how soon she loses, confounds and fetters herself, tumbling and floating in this vast, turbulent, and waving sea of human opinions, without restraint, and without any determinate end: so soon as she loses that great and common road, she enters into a labyrinth of a thousand several paths.

The foundation of rewards and punishments in another life.

Man cannot be anything but what he is, nor imagine beyond the reach of his capacity. "'Tis a greater presumption," says Plutarch,[6] "in them who are but men to attempt to speak and discourse of the gods and demi-gods than it is in a man utterly ignorant of music to give an opinion of singing; or in a man who never saw a camp to dispute about arms and martial affairs, presuming by some light conjecture to understand the effects of an art he is totally a stranger to." Antiquity, I believe, thought to put a compliment upon, and to add something to, the divine grandeur in assimilating it to man, investing it with his faculties, and adorning it with his ugly humours and most shameful necessities: offering it our aliments to eat, presenting it with our dances, mummeries, and farces, to divert it; with our vestments to cover it, and our houses to inhabit, coaxing it with the odour of incense and the sounds of music, with festoons and nosegays; and to accommodate it to our vicious passions, flattering its justice with inhuman vengeance, and with the ruin and dissipation of things by it created and preserved: as Tiberius Sempronius,[7] who burnt the rich spoils and arms he had gained from the enemy in Sardinia for a sacrifice to Vulcan; and Paulus Æmilius,[1] those of Macedonia, to Mars and Minerva; and Alexander,[2] arriving at the Indian Ocean, threw several great vessels of gold into the sea, in honour of Thetes; and moreover loading her altars with a slaughter not of innocent beasts only, but of men also, as several nations, and ours among the rest, were commonly used to do; and I believe there is no nation under the sun that has not done the same:

The Getæ[4] hold themselves to be immortal, and that their death is nothing but a journey to their god Zamolxis. Every five years they dispatch some one among them to him, to entreat of him such necessaries as they stand in need of. This envoy is chosen by lot, and the form of dispatching him, after he has been instructed by word of mouth what he is to deliver, is that of the assistants, three hold up as many javelins, upon which the rest throw his body with all their force. If he happen to be wounded in a mortal part, and that he immediately dies, 'tis held a certain argument of divine favour; but if he escapes he is looked upon as a wicked and execrable wretch, and another is dismissed after the same manner in his stead. Amestris,[5] the mother of Xerxes, being grown old, caused at once fourteen young men, of the best families of Persia, to be buried alive, according to the religion of the country, to gratify some infernal deity. And even to this day the idols of Themixtitan are cemented with the blood of little children, and they delight in no sacrifice but of these pure and infantine souls; a justice thirsty of innocent blood:

Sacrifice of fourteen young men.

Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum.[6]

"Such impious use was of religion made,
So many demon acts it could persuade."

The Carthaginians immolated their own children to Saturn; and those who had none of their own bought of others, the father and mother being in the mean time obliged to assist at the ceremony with a gay and contented countenance.[7]

Carthaginian children sacrificed to Saturn.

It was a strange fancy to think to gratify the divine bounty with our afflictions; like the Lacedæmonians,[8] who regaled their Diana with the tormenting of young boys, whom they caused to be whipped for her sake, very often to death. It was a savage humour to imagine to gratify the architect by the subversion of his building, and to think to take away the punishment due to the guilty by punishing the innocent: and that poor Iphigenia, at the port of Aulis, should by her death and immolation acquit, towards God, the whole army of the Greeks from all the crimes they had committed,

Et casta incesto, nubendi tempore in ipso,
Hostia concideret mactatu mœsta parentis;[9]

"That the chaste virgin in her nuptial band Should die by an unnat'ral father's hand;"

and that the two noble and generous souls of the two Decii, the father and the son, to incline the favour of the gods to be propitious to the affairs of Rome, should throw themselves headlong into the thickest of the enemy: Quæ fuit tanta deorum iniquitas, ut placari populo Romano non possent nisi tales viri occidissent?[10] "How great an injustice in the gods was it that they could not be reconciled to the people of Rome unless such men perished?" To which may be added, that it is not for the criminal to cause himself to be scourged according to his own measure nor at his own time, but that it purely belongs to the judge, who considers nothing as chastisements but the penalty that he appoints, and cannot call that punishment which proceeds from the consent of him that suffers. The divine vengeance pre-supposes an absolute dissent in us, both for its justice and for our own penalty. And therefore it was a ridiculous humour of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos,[11] who, to interrupt the continued course of his good fortune, and to balance it, went and threw the dearest and most precious jewel he had into the sea, believing that by this voluntary and antedated mishap he bribed and satisfied the revolution and vicissitude of fortune; and she, to mock his folly, ordered it so that the same jewel came again into his hands, found in the belly of a fish. And then to what end were those tearings and dismemberments of the Corybantes, the Menades, and, in our times, of the Mahometans, who slash their faces, bosoms, and limbs, to gratify their prophet; seeing that the offence lies in the will, not in the breast, eyes, genitals, roundness of form, the shoulders, or the throat? Tantus est perturbatæ mentis, et sedibus suis pulsæ, furor, ut sic dii placentur, quemadmodum ne homines quidem sæviunt.[12] "So great is the fury and madness of troubled minds when once displaced from the seat of reason, as if the gods should be appeased with what even men are not so cruel as to approve." The use of this natural contexture has not only respect to us, but also to the service of God and other men; 'tis as unjust for us voluntarily to wound or hurt it as to kill ourselves upon any pretence whatever: it seems to be great cowardice and treason to exercise cruelty upon, and to destroy, the functions of the body that are stupid and servile, to spare the soul the solicitude of governing them according to reason: Ubi iratos deos timent, qui sic propitios habere merentur? In regiæ libidinis voluptatem castrati sunt quidam; sed nemo sibi, ne vir esset, jubente domino, manus intulit.[1] "Where are they so afraid of the anger of the gods as to merit their favour at that rate? Some, indeed, have been made eunuchs for the lust of princes: but no man at his master's command has put his own hand to unman himself." So did they fill their religion with several ill effects:

Sæpius olim
Religio peperit scelerosa atque impia facta.[2]

"In elder times
Religion did commit most fearful crimes."

The folly of judging of the power and perfections of God according to our conceptions.

Now nothing of ours can in any sort be compared or likened unto the divine nature, which will not blemish and stain it with much imperfection. How can that infinite beauty, power, and goodness admit of any correspondence or similitude to such abject things as we are, without extreme wrong and manifest dishonour to his divine greatness? Infirmum dei fortius est hominibus; et stultum dei sapientius est hominibus. "For the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men."[3] Stilpo, the philosopher, being asked, "Whether the gods were delighted with our adorations and sacrifices?"—"You are indiscreet," answered he; "let us withdraw apart, if you would talk of such things."[4] Nevertheless we prescribe him bounds, we keep his power besieged by our reasons (I call our ravings and dreams reason, with the dispensation of philosophy, which says, "That the wicked man, and even the fool, go mad by reason, but a particular form of reason"), we would subject him to the vain and feeble appearances of our understandings, —him who has made both us and our knowledge. Because that nothing is made of nothing, God therefore could not make the world without matter. What! has God put into our hands the keys and most secret springs of his power? Is he obliged not to exceed the limits of our knowledge? Put the case, O man! that thou hast been able here to mark some footsteps of his effects: dost thou therefore think that he has employed all he can, and has crowded all his forms and ideas in this work? Thou seest nothing but the order and revolution of this little cave in which thou art lodged, if, indeed, thou dost see so much: whereas his divinity has an infinite jurisdiction beyond. This part is nothing in comparison of the whole:

Omnia cum cælo, terraque, marique,
Nil sunt ad summam summai totius omnem.[5]

"The earth, the sea, and skies, from pole to pole,
Are small, nay, nothing to the mighty WHOLE."

'Tis a municipal law that thou allegest, thou knowest not what is universal. Tie thyself to that to which thou art subject, but not him; he is not of thy brotherhood, thy fellow-citizen, or companion. If he has in some sort communicated himself unto thee, 'tis not to debase himself unto thy littleness, nor to make thee comptroller of his power: the human body cannot fly to the clouds: rules are for thee. The sun runs every day his ordinary course: the bounds of the sea and the earth cannot be confounded: the water is unstable and without firmness: a wall, unless it be broken, is impenetrable to a solid body: a man cannot preserve his life in the flames; he cannot be both in heaven and upon earth, and corporally in a thousand places at once. 'Tis for thee that he has made these rules; 'tis thee that they concern: he has manifested to Christians that he has enfranchised himself from them all when it pleased him. And in truth, why, almighty as he is, should he have limited his power within any certain bounds? In favour of whom should he have renounced his privilege? Thy reason has in no other thing more of likelihood and foundation than in that wherein it persuades thee that there is a plurality of worlds:

Terramque, et solem, lunam, mare, cætera quæ sunt,
Non esse unica, sed numero magis innumerali.[6]

"That earth, sun, moon, sea, and the rest that are,
Not single, but innumerable were."

The plurality of the worlds no new opinion.

The most eminent minds of elder times believed it; and some of this age of ours, compelled by the appearances of human reason, do the same: forasmuch as in this fabric that we behold there is nothing single and one,

Cum in summa res nulla sit una,
Unica quæ gignatur, et unica solaque crescat;[7]

"Since nothing's single in this mighty place,
That can alone beget, alone increase;"

and that all the kinds are multiplied in some number; by which it seems not to be likely that God should have made this work only without a companion; and that the matter of this form should have been totally drained in this individual.

"Wherefore 'tis necessary to confess
That there must elsewhere be the like congress
Of the like matter, which the airy space
Holds fast within its infinite embrace."

Especially if it be a living creature, which its motions render so credible that Plato affirms it,[1] and that many of our people do either confirm, or dare not deny it: no more than that ancient opinion that the heavens, the stars, and other members of the world, are creatures composed of body and soul, mortal in respect of their composition, but immortal by the determination of the Creator. Now if there be many worlds, as Democritus, Epicurus, and almost all philosophy has believed, what do we know that the principles and rules of this of ours in like manner concern the rest. They may peradventure have another form and another polity. Epicurus[2] supposes them either like or unlike. We see in this world an infinite difference and variety, only by distance of places; neither corn, wine, nor any of our animals are to be seen in that new corner of the world discovered by our fathers; 'tis all there another thing; and, in times past, do but consider in how many parts of the world they had no knowledge either of Bacchus or Ceres. If Pliny and Herodotus are to be believed, there are in certain places kinds of men very little resembling us,[3] mongrel and ambiguous forms, betwixt the human and brutal natures: there are countries where men are born without heads, having their mouth and eyes in their breast: where they are all hermaphrodites; where they go on all four; where they have but one eye in the forehead, and a head more like a dog than like ours: where they are half fish the lower part, and live in the water: where the women bear at five years old, and live but eight: where the head and the skin of the forehead is so hard that a sword will not touch it, but rebounds again: where men have no beards: nations that know not the use of fire: others that eject seed of a black colour. What shall we say of those that naturally change themselves into wolves, colts, and then into men again? And if it be true, as Plutarch says,[4] that in some place of the Indies there are men without mouths, who nourish themselves with the smell of certain odours, how many of our descriptions are false? He is no longer risible, nor, perhaps, capable of reason and society. The disposition and cause of our internal composition would then for the most part be to no purpose, and of no use.

Moreover, how many things are there in our own knowledge that oppose those fine rules we have cut out for and prescribe to nature? And yet we must undertake to circumscribe thereto God himself! How many things do we call miraculous and contrary to nature? This is done by every nation, and by every man, according to the proportion of his ignorance. How many occult properties and quintessences do we daily discover? For, for us to go "according to nature," is no more but to go "according to our understanding," as far as that is able to follow, and as far as we are able to see into it: all beyond that is, forsooth, monstrous and irregular. Now, by this account, all things shall be monstrous to the wisest and most understanding men; for human reason has persuaded them that there was no manner of ground nor foundation, not so much as to be assured that snow is white, and Anaxagoras affirmed it to be black;[5] if there be any thing, or if there be nothing; if there be knowledge or ignorance, which Metrodorus of Chios denied that man was able to determine;[6] or whether we live, as Euripides doubts whether the life we live is life, or whether that we call death be not life:

Many things in nature contrary to the rules we have prescribed to nature.

Τίς δ' οἶδεν εἰ ζῆν τοῦθ', ὃ κέκληται θανεῖν
Τὸ ζῆν δὲ, θνήσκειν ἔστι;[7] and not without some appearance. For why do we derive the title of being from this instant, which is but a flash in the infinite course of an eternal night, and so short an interruption of our perpetual and natural condition, death possessing all the before and after this moment, and also a good part of the moment itself. Others swear there is no motion at all,[8] as the followers of Melissus, and that nothing stirs. For if there be but one, neither can that spherical motion be of any use to him, nor motion from one place to another, as Plato proves: "That there is neither generation nor corruption in nature." Protagoras says[9] that there is nothing in nature but doubt; that a man may equally dispute of all things; and even of this, whether a man can equally dispute of all things: Nausiphanes,[10] that of things which seem to be, nothing is more than it is not; that there is nothing certain but uncertainty: Parmenides,[11] that of that which seems, there is no one thing in general; that there is but one thing: Zeno, that one same is not, and that Motion of things below denied.

[3] The following instances are taken from the 3rd and 4th Books of Herodotus, and the 6th, 7th, and 8th of Pliny. But the larger portion of these traditions are stated doubtingly by both authors. Pliny expressly says that a person who can be persuaded that men were ever metamorphosed into wolves, and afterwards into men again, will be ready to give his credit to all the fables that have been invented for so many ages past; and having then quoted some stories of such pretended metamorphoses, cries out—"It is astonishing how far the Greeks have extended their credulity. there is nothing; if there were one thing, it would either be in another or in itself; if it be in another, they are two; if it be in itself, they are yet two; the comprehending, and the comprehended.[1] According to these doctrines the nature of things is no other than a shadow, either false or vain.

This way of speaking in a Christian man has ever seemed to me very indiscreet and irreverent. "God cannot die; God cannot contradict himself; God cannot do this or that." I do not like to have the divine power so limited by the laws of men's mouths; and the idea which presents itself to us in those propositions ought to be more religiously and reverently expressed.

Our speaking has its failings and defects, as well as all the rest. Most of the occasions of disturbance in the world are grammatical ones: our suits only spring from disputes as to the interpretation of laws; and most wars proceed from the inability of ministers clearly to express the conventions and treaties of amity of princes. How many quarrels, and of how great importance, has the doubt of the meaning of this syllable hoc, created in the world?[2] Let us take the clearest conclusion that logic itself presents us withal: if you say, "It is fine weather," and that you say true, it is then fine weather. Is not this a very certain form of speaking? And yet it will deceive us; that it will do so, let us follow the example: If you say, "I lie," if you say true, you do lie.[3] The art, the reason, and force of the conclusion of this, are the same with the other, and yet we are gravelled. The Pyrrhonian philosophers, I see, cannot express their general conception in any kind of speaking; for they would require a new language on purpose: ours is all formed of affirmative propositions, which are totally antartic to them; insomuch that when they say "I doubt," they are presently taken by the throat, to make them confess that at least they know and are assured that they do doubt. By which means they have been compelled to shelter themselves under this medical comparison, without which their humour would be inexplicable: when they pronounce, "I know not," or, "I doubt," they say that this proposition carries off itself with the rest, no more nor less than rhubarb, that drives out the ill humours, and carries itself off with them.[4] This fancy will be more certainly understood by interrogation: "What do I know?" as I bear it, with the emblem of a balance.

Human language very defective.

See what use they make of this irreverent way of speaking[5] in the present disputes about our religion, if you press its adversaries too hard, they will roundly tell you, "that it is not in the power of God to make it so, that his body should be in paradise and upon earth, and in several places at once." And see, too, what advantage the old scoffer[6] made of this. "At least," says he, "it is no little consolation to man to see that God cannot do all things: for he cannot kill himself, though he would; which is the greatest privilege we have in our condition; he cannot make mortal immortal, nor revive the dead; nor make it so, that he who has lived has not; nor that he who has had honours has not had them; having no other right to the past than that of oblivion." And that the comparison of man to God may yet be made out by jocose examples: "He cannot order it so," says he, "that twice ten shall not be twenty." This is what he says, and what a Christian ought to take heed shall not escape his lips. Whereas, on the contrary, it seems as if men studied this foolish daring of language, to reduce God to their own measure:

Cras vel atra
Nube polum Pater occupato,
Vel sole puro, non tamen irritum
Quodcumque retro est, efficiet, neque
Diffinget, infectumque reddet,
Quod fugiens semel hora vexit.[7]

"To-morrow, let it shine or rain,
Yet cannot this the past make vain:
Nor uncreate and render void
That which was yesterday enjoyed."

When we say that the infinity of ages, as well past as to come, are but one instant with God; that his goodness, wisdom, and power are the same with his essence; our mouths speak it, but our understandings apprehend it not; and yet, such is our vain opinion of ourselves, that we must make the Divinity to pass through our sieve; and thence proceed all the dreams and errors with which the world abounds, whilst we reduce and weigh in our balance a thing so far above our poise.[8] Mirum quo procedat improbitas cordis humani, parvulo aliquo invitata successu.[9] "'Tis wonderful to what the wickedness of man's heart will proceed, if elevated with the least success." How magisterially and insolently does Epicurus reprove the Stoics, for maintaining that the truly good and happy being appertained only to God, and that the wise man had nothing but a shadow and resemblance of it? How temerariously have they bound God to destiny (a thing which, by my consent, none that bears the name of a Christian shall ever do again)! and Thales, Plato, and Pythagoras have enslaved him to necessity. This arrogance of attempting to discover God with our eyes has been the cause that an eminent person among us[1] has attributed to the Divinity a corporal form; and is the reason of what happens to us every day, of attributing to God important events, by a particular assignment. Because they weigh with us, they conclude that they also weigh with him, and that he has a more intent and vigilant regard to them than to others of less moment to us or of ordinary course: Magna Dii curant, parva negligunt:[2] "The gods are concerned at great matters, but slight the small." Listen to him; he will clear this to you by his reason: Nec in regnis quidem reges omnia minima curant:[3] "Neither indeed do kings in their administration take notice of all the least concerns." As if to that King of kings it were more or less to subvert a kingdom, or to move the leaf of a tree; or as if his providence acted after another manner in inclining the event of a battle than in the leap of a flea. The hand of his government is laid upon every thing after the same manner, with the same power and order: our interest does nothing towards it; our inclinations and measures sway nothing with him. Deus ita artifex magnus in magnis, ut minor non sit in parvis:[4] "God is so great an artificer in great things, that he is no less in the least." Our arrogancy sets this blasphemous comparison ever before us. Because our employments are a burden to us, Strato has courteously been pleased to exempt the gods from all offices, as their priests are; he makes nature produce and support all things; and with her weights and motions make up the several parts of the world, discharging human nature from the awe of divine judgments: Quod beatum æternumque sit, id nec habere negotii quidquam, nec exhibere alteri:[5] "What is blessed and eternal has neither any business itself nor gives any to another." Nature will that in like things there should be a like relation. The infinite number of mortals, therefore, concludes a like number of immortals; the infinite things that kill and destroy pre-supposes as many that preserve and profit. As the souls of the gods, without tongue, eye, or ear, do every one of them feel amongst themselves what the other feels, and judge our thoughts; so the souls of men, when at liberty and loosed from the body, either by sleep or some ecstasy, divine, foretel, and see things, which, whilst joined to the body, they could not see. "Men," says St. Paul, "professing themselves to be wise, they become fools; and change the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like corruptible man."[6] Do but take notice of the juggling in the ancient deifications. After the great and stately pomp of the funeral, so soon as the fire began to mount to the top of the pyramid, and to catch hold of the couch where the body lay, they at the same time turned out an eagle, which flying upward, signified that the soul went into Paradise.[7] We have a thousand medals, and particularly of the worthy Faustina, where this eagle is represented carrying these deified souls to heaven with their heels upwards. 'Tis pity that we should fool ourselves with our own fopperies and inventions,

[8] Montaigne in this passage somewhat contradicts the author whom he is defending. "L'homme," says Sebonde, in Montaigne's translation, c. 121, "est par sa nature, en tant qu'il est homme, la vraye et vive image de Dieu. Tout ainsi que le cachet engrave sa figure dans la cire, ainsi Dieu empreint en l'homme sa semblance," &c.

> Quod finxere, timent,
>
> "They fear their own inventions,"

like children who are frighted with the same face of their play-fellow, that they themselves have smeared and smutted. Quasi quidquam infelicius sit homine, cui sua figmenta dominantur:[8] "As if any thing could be more unhappy than man, who is insulted over by his own imagination." 'Tis far from honouring him who made us, to honour him that we have made. Augustus had more temples than Jupiter, served with as much religion and belief of miracles. The Thracians, in return of the benefits they had received from Agesilaus, came to bring him word that they had canonized him: "Has your nation," said he to them, "the power to make gods of whom they please? Pray first deify some one amongst yourselves, and when I shall see what advantage he has by it, I will thank you for your offer."[9] Man is certainly stark mad; he cannot make a worm, and yet he will be making gods by dozens. Hear Trismegistus in praise of our sufficiency: "Of all the wonderful things, it surmounts all wonder that man could find out the divine nature and make it."[10] And take here the arguments of the school of philosophy itself:

> Nosse cui divos et cœli numina soli
> Aut soli nescire, datum.[11]
>
> "To whom to know the deities of heaven,
> Or know he knows them not, alone 'tis given."

"If there is a God, he is a living creature;[12] if he be a living creature, he has sense; and if he has sense, he is subject to corruption. If he be without a body, he is without a soul, and consequently without action; and if he has a body, it is perishable." Is not here a triumph? we are incapable of having made the world; there must then be some more excellent nature that has put a hand to the work. It were a foolish and ridiculous arrogance to esteem ourselves the most perfect thing of the universe. There must then be something that is better, and that must be God. When you see a stately and stupendous edifice, though you do not know who is the owner of it, you would yet conclude it was not built for rats. And this divine structure that we behold of the celestial palace, have we not reason to believe that it is the residence of some possessor, who is much greater than we? Is not the most supreme always the most worthy? but we are in the lowest form. Nothing without a soul and without reason can produce a living creature capable of reason. The world produces us; the world then has soul and reason. Every part of us is less than we. We are part of the world, the world therefore is endued with wisdom and reason, and that more abundantly than we. 'Tis a fine thing to have a great government: the government of the world then appertains to some happy nature. The stars do us no harm; they are then full of goodness. We have need of nourishment: then so have the gods also, and feed upon the vapours of the earth. Worldly goods are not goods to God; therefore they are not goods to us; offending and being offended are equally testimonies of imbecility; 'tis therefore folly to fear God. God is good by his nature; man by his industry, which is more. The divine and human wisdom have no other distinction, but that the first is eternal; but duration is no accession to wisdom, therefore we are companions. We have life, reason, and liberty; we esteem goodness, charity, and justice: these qualities are then in him. In conclusion, building and destroying, the conditions of the Divinity, are forged by man, according as they relate to himself. What a pattern, and what a model! let us stretch, let us raise and swell human qualities as much as we please: puff up thyself, poor man, yet more and more, and more;

Heaven God's palace.

The government of the world.

Non si tu ruperis, inquit.[1]

"Not if thou burst," said he.

Profecto non Deum, quem cogitare non possunt, sed semet ipsos pro illo cogitantes, non illum, sed seipsos, non illi, sed sibi comparant. "Certainly they do not imagine God, whom they cannot imagine; but they imagine themselves in his stead: they do not compare him, but themselves, not to him, but to themselves." In natural things the effects do but half relate to their causes. What's this to the purpose? His condition is above the order of nature, too elevated, too remote, and too mighty, to permit itself to be bound and fettered by our conclusions. 'Tis not through ourselves that we arrive at that place: our ways lie too low. We are no nearer heaven on the top of Mount Cenis than at the bottom of the sea; take the distance with your astrolabe. They debase God even to the carnal knowledge of women, to so many times, and so many generations. Paulina, the wife of Saturninus, a matron of great reputation at Rome, thinking she lay with the god Serapis,[2] found herself in the arms of an amoroso of hers, through the pandarism of the priests of his temple. Varro, the most subtle and most learned of all the Latin authors, in his book of theology, writes,[3] that the sexton of Hercules's temple, throwing dice with one hand for himself, and with the other for Hercules, played after that manner with him for a supper and a wench; if he won, at the expense of the offerings; if he lost, at his own. The sexton lost, and paid the supper and the wench. Her name was Laurentina, who saw by night this god in her arms, who moreover told her, that the first she met the next day, should give her a heavenly reward: which proved to be Taruncius,[4] a rich young man, who took her home to his house, and in time left her his inheritrix. She, in her turn, thinking to do a thing that would be pleasing to the god, left the people of Rome heirs to her; and therefore had divine honours attributed to her. As if it had not been sufficient that Plato was originally descended from the gods by a double line, and that he had Neptune for the common father of his race, it was certainly believed at Athens, that Aristo, having a mind to enjoy the fair Perictione, could not, and was warned by the god Apollo, in a dream, to leave her unpolluted and untouched, till she should first be brought to-bed. These were the father and mother of Plato.[5] How many ridiculous stories are there of like cuckoldings, committed by the gods against poor mortal men! And how many husbands injuriously scandaled in favour of the children! In the Mahometan religion there are Merlins enough found by the belief of the people; that is to say, children without fathers, spiritual, divinely conceived in the wombs of virgins, and carry names that signify so much in their language.

We are to observe that to every thing nothing is more dear and estimable than its being (the lion, the eagle, the dolphin, prize nothing above their own kind); and that every thing assimilates the qualities of all other things to its own proper qualities, which we may indeed extend or contract, but that's all; for beyond that relation and principle our imagination cannot go, can guess at nothing else, nor possibly go out thence, nor stretch beyond it; whence spring these ancient conclusions:—of all forms the most beautiful is that of man; therefore God must be of that form. No one can be happy without virtue, nor virtue be without reason,

Nothing that both man and beast is fonder of than its species.

[3] St. Austin, de Civit. Dei, vi. 7.

[4] Or Tarutius, according to St. Austin: but according to Plutarch, who relates the same story in the life of Romulus, the first man who met Laventia (as he calls her) was one Tarrutius, a very old man.

and reason cannot inhabit anywhere but in a human shape: God is therefore clothed in a human figure. Ita est informatum anticipatumque mentibus nostris, ut humini, quum de Deo cogitet, forma occurrat humana.[1] "It is so imprinted in our minds, and the fancy is so prepossessed with it, that when a man thinks of God, a human figure ever presents itself to the imagination." Therefore it was that Xenophanes pleasantly said, "That if beasts frame any gods to themselves, as 'tis likely they do, they make them certainly such as themselves are, and glorify themselves in it, as we do. For why may not a goose say thus: 'All the parts of the universe I have an interest in: the earth serves me to walk upon; the sun to light me; the stars have their influence upon me: I have such an advantage by the winds and such by the waters; there is nothing that yon heavenly roof looks upon so favourably as me; I am the darling of nature! Is it not man that keeps, lodges, and serves me? 'Tis for me that he both sows and grinds; if he eats me he does the same by his fellow-men, and so do I the worms that kill and devour him."[2] As much might be said by a crane, and with greater confidence, upon the account of the liberty of his flight, and the possession of that high and beautiful region. Tam blanda conciliatrix, et tam sui est lena ipsa natura.[3] "So flattering and wheedling a bawd is nature to herself."[4]

Man imagines all things were made for him.

Now by the same consequence, the destinies are then for us; for us the world; it shines, it thunders for us; creator and creatures, all are for us: 'tis the mark and point to which the universality of things aims. Look into the records that philosophy has kept for two thousand years and more, of the affairs of heaven: the gods all that while have neither acted nor spoken but for man. She does not allow them any other consultation or occupation. See them here against us in war:

> Domitosque Herculea manu
> Telluris juvenes, unde periculum
> Fulgens contremuit domus
> Saturnis veteris.[5]
>
> "The brawny sons of earth, subdu'd by hand
> Of Hercules on the Phlegræan strand,
> Where the rude shock did such an uproar make,
> As made old Saturn's sparkling palace shake."

And here you shall see them participate of our troubles, to make a return for our having so often shared in theirs:

> Neptunus muros, magnoque emota tridenti
> Fundamenta quatit, totamque à sedibus urbem
> Eruit: hic Juno Scæas sævissima portas
> Prima tenet.[6]
>
> "Amidst that smother Neptune holds his place,
> Below the walls' foundation drives his mace,
> And heaves the city from its solid base.
> See where in arms the cruel Juno stands,
> Full in the Scæan gate."

The Caunians, jealous of the authority of their own proper gods, armed themselves on the days of their devotion, and through the whole of their precincts ran cutting and slashing the air with their swords, by that means to drive away and banish all foreign gods out of their territory.[7] Their powers are limited according to our necessity: this cures horses, that men, that the plague, that the scurf, that the phthisic; one cures one sort of itch, another another: Adio minimis etiam rebus prava religio inserit Deos.[8] "At such a rate does false religion create gods for the most contemptible uses." This one makes grapes grow, that onions; this has the presidence over lechery, that over merchandise; for every sort of artisan a god; this has his province and reputation in the east; that his in the west:

Power of the gods limited to certain things.

> Hic illius arma, hic currus fuit.[9]
>
> "Here lay her armour, here her chariot stood."

> O sancte Apollo, qui umbilicum certum terrarum obtines,[10]
>
> "O sacred Phœbus, who with glorious ray,
> From the earth's centre, dost thy light display."

> Pallada Cecropidæ, Minoia Creta Dianam,
> Vulcanum tellus Hipsipylæa colit,
> Junonem Sparte, Pelopeiadesque Mycenæ;
> Pinigerum Fauni Mœnalis ora caput;
> Mars Latio venerandus erat.[11]
>
> "Th' Athenians Pallas, Cynthia Crete adore,
> Vulcan is worshipped on the Lemnian shore,
> Proud Juno's altars are by Spartans fed,
> Th' Arcadians worship Faunus, and 'tis said
> To Mars, by Italy, is homage paid."

This has only one town or one family in his possession; that lives alone; that in company, either voluntary or upon necessity:

> Junctaque sunt magno templa nepotis avo.[12]
>
> "And temples to the nephew joined are,
> To those were reared to the great grandfather."

4 Here Montaigne is again in contradiction with him whose apology he is writing. Sebond, in our author's translation of his work, says: "Le ciel te dit (a l'homme)—Je te fournis de lumiere le jour, afin que tu veilles; d'ombre la nuit afin que tu dormes et repose: pour ta recreation et commodite, je renouvelle les saisons, je te donne la fleurissante douceur du printems, la chaleur de l'eté, la fertilité de l'automne, les froideurs de l'hiver . . l'air—je te communique la respiration vitale, et offre à ton beissance tout le genre de mes oiseaux; l'eau—je te fournis de quoi boire, de quoi te laver. La terre—je te soutiens; tu as de moi le pain de quoi se nourissent tes forces, le vin de quoi tu esjouis tes esprits," &c.

There are some so wretched and mean (for the number amounts to six and thirty thousand[1]) that they must pack five or six together, to produce one ear of corn, and thence take their several names; three to a door—that of the plank, that of the hinge, and that of the threshold. Four to a child—protectors of his swathing-clouts, his drink, meat, and sucking. Some certain, some uncertain and doubtful, and some that are not yet entered Paradise:

Quos quoniam cœli nondum dignamur honore,
Quas dedimus, certe terras habitare sinamus:[2]

"Whom, since we yet not worthy think of heaven,
We suffer to possess the earth we've given."

There are amongst them physicians, poets, and civilians. Some of a mean betwixt the divine and human nature; mediators betwixt God and us, adorned with a certain second and diminutive sort of adoration; infinite in titles and offices; some good, others ill; some old and decrepid, and some that are mortal. For Chrysippus[3] was of opinion that in the last conflagration of the world all the gods were to die but Jupiter. Man makes a thousand pretty societies betwixt God and him; is he not his countryman?

Jovis incunabula Creten.[4]

"Crete, the cradle of Jupiter."

And this is the excuse that, upon consideration of this subject, Scævola, a high priest, and Varro, a great theologian in their times, make us: "That it is necessary that the people should be ignorant of many things that are true, and believe many things that are false." Quam veritatem qua liberetur inquirat credatur ei expedire, quod fallitur.[5] "Seeing he enquires into the truth, by which he would be made free, 'tis fit he should be deceived." Human eyes cannot perceive things but by the forms they know: and we do not remember what a leap miserable Phaeton took for attempting to guide his father's horses with a mortal hand. The mind of man falls into as great a depth, and is after the same manner bruised and shattered by his own rashness. If you ask of philosophy of what matter the heavens and the sun are? what answer will she return, if not that it is iron, or, with Anaxagoras,[6] stone, or some other matter that she makes use of? If a man enquire of Zeno what nature is? "A fire," says he, "an artisan, proper for generation, and regularly proceeding." Archimedes, master of that science which attributes to itself the precedency before all others for truth and certainty; "the sun," says he, "is a god of red-hot iron." Was not this a fine imagination, extracted from the inevitable necessity of geometrical demonstrations? Yet not so inevitable and useful but that Socrates[7] thought it was enough to know so much of geometry only as to measure the land a man bought or sold; and that Polyænus,[8] who had been a great and famous doctor in it, despised it, as full of falsity and manifest vanity, after he had once tasted the delicate fruits of the lozelly gardens of Epicurus. Socrates in Xenophon,[9] concerning this affair, says of Anaxagoras, reputed by antiquity learned above all others in celestial and divine matters, "That he had cracked his brain, as all other men do who too immoderately search into knowledges which nothing belong to them:" when he made the sun to be a burning stone, he did not consider that a stone does not shine in the fire; and, which is worse, that it will there consume: and in making the sun and fire one, that fire does not turn the complexions black in shining upon them: that we are able to look fixedly upon fire: and that fire kills herbs and plants. 'Tis Socrates's opinion, and mine too, that the best judging of heaven is not to judge of it at all. Plato having occasion, in his Timæus, to speak of the demons, "This undertaking," says he, "exceeds my ability." We are therefore to believe those ancients who said they were begotten by them: 'tis against all reason to refuse a man's faith to the children of the gods, though what they say should not be proved by any necessary or probable reasons; seeing they engage to speak of domestic and familiar things.

Geometry how far useful.

Let us see if we have a little more light in the knowledge of human and natural things. Is it not a ridiculous attempt for us to forge for those to whom, by our own confession, our knowledge is not able to attain, another body, and to lend a false form of our own invention: as is manifest in this motion of the planets; to which, seeing our wits cannot possibly arrive, nor conceive their natural conduct, we lend them material, heavy, and substantial springs of our own by which to move:

The sum of our knowledge of natural things.

Temo aureus, aurea summæ
Curvatura rotæ, radiorum argenteus ordo.[10]

"Gold was the axle, and the beam was gold;
The wheels with silver spokes on golden circles roll'd."

You would say that we had had coach-makers, carpenters, and painters, that went up on high to make engines of various motions, and to range the wheelwork and interlacings of the heavenly bodies of differing colours about the axis of necessity, according to Plato:[11]

"The world's a mansion that doth all things hold,
Which thundering zones, in number five enfold,
Through which a girdle, painted with twelve signs,
And that with sparkling constellations, shines,
In heaven's arch marks the diurnal course
For the sun's chariot and his fiery horse."

These are all dreams and fanatic follies. Why will not nature please for once to lay open her bosom to us, and plainly discover to us the means and conduct of her movements, and prepare our eyes to see them? Good God, what abuse, what mistakes should we discover in our poor science! I am mistaken if that weak knowledge of ours holds any one thing as it really is, and I shall depart hence more ignorant of all other things than my own ignorance.

Philosophy is only poetry sophisticated.

Have I not read in Plato this divine saying, that "nature is nothing but an enigmatic poesy!"[2] As if a man might perhaps see a veiled and shady picture, breaking out here and there with an infinite variety of false lights to puzzle our conjectures: Latent ista omnia crassis occultata et circumfusa tenebris; ut nulla acies humani ingenii tanta sit, quæ penetrare in cœlum, terram intrare possit.[3] "All those things lie concealed and involved in so dark an obscurity that no point of human wit can be so sharp as to pierce heaven or penetrate the earth." And certainly philosophy is no other than sophisticated poetry. Whence do the ancient writers extract their authorities but from the poets? and the first of them were poets themselves, and writ accordingly. Plato is but a poet unripped. Timon[4] calls him, insultingly, "a monstrous forger of miracles." All super-human sciences make use of the poetic style. Just as women make use of teeth of ivory where the natural are wanting, and instead of their true complexion make one of some artificial matter; as they stuff themselves out with cotton to appear plump, and in the sight of every one do paint, patch, and trick up themselves with a false and borrowed beauty: so does science (and even our law itself has, they say, legitimate fictions, whereon it builds the truth of its justice); she gives us in pre-supposition, and for current pay, things which she herself informs us were invented; for these epycicles, eccentrics, and concentrics, which astrology makes use of to carry on the motions of the stars, she gives us for the best she could invent upon that subject; as also, in all the rest, philosophy presents us not that which really is, or what she really believes, but what she has contrived with the greatest and most plausible likelihood of truth, and the quaintest invention. Plato,[5] upon the discourse of the state of human bodies and those of beasts, says, "I should know that what I have said is truth, had I the confirmation of an oracle; but this I will affirm, that what I have said is the most likely to be true of any thing I could say."

The confused idea which man has of himself.

'Tis not to heaven only that art sends her ropes, engines, and wheels; let us consider a little what she says of us ourselves, and of our contexture. There is not more retrogradation, trepidation, accession, recession, and astonishment, in the stars and celestial bodies, than they have found out in this poor little human body. In earnest, they have good reason, upon that very account, to call it the little world, so many tools and parts have they employed to erect and build it. To assist the motions they see in man, and the various functions that we find in ourselves, in how many parts have they divided the soul, in how many places lodged it? in how many orders have they divided, and to how many stories have they raised this poor creature, man, besides those that are natural and to be perceived? And how many offices and vocations have they assigned him? They make it an imaginary public thing. 'Tis a subject that they hold and handle; and they have full power granted to them to rip, place, displace, piece, and stuff it, every one according to his own fancy, and yet they possess it not. They cannot, not in reality only, but even in dreams, so govern it that there will not be some cadence or sound that will escape their architecture, as enormous as it is, and botched with a thousand false and fantastic patches. And it is not reason to excuse them; for though we are satisfied with painters when they paint heaven, earth, seas, mountains, and remote islands, that they give us some slight mark of them, and, as of things unknown, are content with a faint and obscure description; yet when they come and draw us after life, or any other creature which is known and familiar to us, we then require of them a perfect and exact representation of lineaments and colours, and despise them if they fail in it.

I am very well pleased with the Milesian girl,[6] who observing the philosopher Thales to be always contemplating the celestial arch, and to have his eyes ever gazing upward, laid something in his way that he might stumble over, to put him in mind that it would be time to

[2] Montaigne has here mistaken Plato's sense, whose words, in the second Alcibiades, ii. are:—"Ἐξ τε φύσει ποιητικὴ ἡ ανμπᾶσα αἰνιγματώδης;"—"All poetry is in its nature enigmatical." Plato says this by reason of a verse in Homer's Margites, which he explains, and which indeed has something in it that is enigmatical.

[6] She was not a Milesian, but a Thracian, according to Plato, from whose Theetetes this story is taken; but he does not say that he stumbled at anything laid in his way by his servant; but that as he was walking along, with his eyes lifted up to the stars, he fell into a well.

take up his thoughts about things that are in the clouds when he had provided for those that were under his feet. Doubtless she advised him well, rather to look to himself than to gaze at heaven; for, as Democritus says, by the mouth of Cicero,—

> Quod est ante pedes, nemo spectat: Cœli scrutantur plagas.[1]
> "No man regards what is under his feet; they are always prying towards heaven."

But our condition will have it so, that the knowledge of what we have in hand is as remote from us, and as much above the clouds, as that of the stars. As Socrates says, in Plato,[2] "That whoever meddles with philosophy may be reproached as Thales was by the woman, that he sees nothing of that which is before him. For every philosopher is ignorant of what his neighbour does; aye, and of what he does himself, and is ignorant of what they both are, whether beasts or men."

Those people, who find Sebond's arguments too weak, that are ignorant of nothing, that govern the world, that know all,—

> Quæ mare compescant causæ, quid temperet annum; Stellæ sponte sua, jussæve, vagentur et errent; Quid premat obscurum lunæ, quid proferat orbem; Quid velit et possit rerum concordia discors;[3]
>
> "What governs ocean's tides,
> And through the various year the seasons guides;
> Whether the stars by their own proper force,
> Or foreign power, pursue their wand'ring course;
> Why shadows darken the pale queen of night;
> Whence she renews her orb and spreads her light;—
> What nature's jarring sympathy can mean;"

have they not sometimes in their writings sounded the difficulties they have met with of knowing their own being? We see very well that the finger moves, that the foot moves, that some parts assume a voluntary motion of themselves without our consent, and that others work by our direction; that one sort of apprehension occasions blushing; another paleness; such an imagination works upon the spleen only, another upon the brain; one occasions laughter, another tears; another stupifies and astonishes all our senses, and arrests the motion of all our members; at one object the stomach will rise, at another a member that lies something lower; but how a spiritual impression should make such a breach into a massy and solid subject, and the nature of the connexion and contexture of these admirable springs and movements, never yet man knew: Omnia incerta ratione, et in naturæ majestate abdita. "All uncertain in reason, and concealed in the majesty of nature," says Pliny.[4] And St. Austin,[5] Modus, quo corporibus adhærent spiritus . . . omnino mirus est, nec comprehendi ab homine potest; et hoc ipse homo est. "The manner whereby souls adhere to bodies is altogether wonderful, and cannot be conceived by man, and yet this is man." And yet it is not so much as doubted; for the opinions of men are received according to the ancient belief, by authority and upon trust, as if it were religion and law. 'Tis received as gibberish which is commonly spoken; this truth, with all its clutter of arguments and proofs, is admitted as a firm and solid body, that is no more to be shaken, no more to be judged of; on the contrary, every one, according to the best of his talent, corroborates and fortifies this received belief with the utmost power of his reason, which is a supple utensil, pliable, and to be accommodated to any figure; and thus the world comes to be filled with lies and fopperies. The reason that men doubt of divers things is that they never examine common impressions; they do not dig to the root, where the faults and defects lie; they only debate upon the branches; they do not examine whether such and such a thing be true, but if it has been so and so understood; it is not inquired into whether Galen has said anything to purpose, but whether he has said so or so. In truth it was very good reason that this curb to the liberty of our judgments, and that tyranny over our opinions, should be extended to the schools and arts. The god of scholastic knowledge is Aristotle; 'tis irreligion to question any of his decrees, as it was those of Lycurgus at Sparta; his doctrine is a magisterial law, which, peradventure, is as false as another. I do not know why I should not as willingly embrace either the ideas of Plato, or the atoms of Epicurus, or the plenum or vacuum of Leucippus and Democritus, or the water of Thales, or the infinity of nature of Anaximander, or the air of Diogenes,[6] or the numbers and symmetry of Pythagoras, or the infinity of Parmenides, or the One of Musæus, or the water and fire of Apollodorus, or the similar parts of Anaxagoras, or the discord and friendship of Empedocles, or the fire of Heraclitus, or any other opinion of that infinite confusion of opinions and determinations, which this fine human reason produces by its certitude and clear-sightedness in everything it meddles withal, as I should the opinion of Aristotle upon this subject of the principles of natural things; which principles he builds of three pieces—matter, form, and privation. And what can be more vain than to make inanity itself the cause of the production of things? Privation is a negative; of what humour could he then make the cause and original of things that are? And yet that were not to be controverted but for the exercise of logic; there is How it happens that men scarce doubt of things.
